LITERATURE

Among Cannibals: an Account of Four Years' Travels in Australia and of Camp Life with the Aborigines of Queensland. By Carl Lumholtz, M.A. With Maps, Coloured Plates, and 122 Illustrations. (Murray.)

THE experiences recorded in this volume are almost unique, for though the life and habits of the natives of Australia have been studied by various observers, very few, if any Europeans—at all events, with the same capacity to understand and to describe what they saw—have lived among them on such intimate terms as the author. His narrative accordingly is of great value and interest, describing as it does the intimate daily life, with probably some real glimpses into the thoughts and feelings, of a race of men still in a most "primitive" condition. The depth of the gulf between them and us is well shown in the intolerable strain felt by this hardy and energetic explorer, undergoing no very severe physical exertion, after a few months of native life. No doubt, meminisse juvabit, but we hope we may assume, from the cheerful way in which the author records his daily trials, that even at the time a perception of their humorous side was not altogether wanting.

After some months' sojourn near Rockhampton, Mr. Lumholtz made a long journey thence into the interior, intending to proceed ultimately to the northern coast. The journey, however, was prematurely interrupted by severe illness and suffering, from what sounds a proverbially insignificant cause, viz., fleabites! It seems strange that a country where the bites of insects, or even an abrasure of the skin, will often produce serious results, should be at the same time one of the healthiest of tropical or sub-tropical residences, even for European children. Returning to Rockhampton, Mr. Lumholtz sailed northwards, and devoted his time to the exploration of a district on the Herbert River, in about 18° north latitude, his adventures and researches there forming the main subject of this work. Having established his headquarters in a deserted cattle-station by the permission of the proprietor, he entered into relations with some of the neighbouring blacks, and made with them a series of expeditions lasting for several months, living as nearly as possible their life. Politically and socially their existence is almost the simplest conceivable. They form isolated groups or tribes of very small extent; they have no towns or villages, or even permanent houses, constructing temporary huts of less pretension than the nests of some of the neighbouring birds; they have no clothing, and few ornaments; even the rudiments of agriculture or pastoral work are unknown—for this, however, in a country almost destitute of grain plants and without cattle, they are hardly to be reproached;—and finally, as for diet, they are cannibals ("in the evenings," the writer says, "this was the leading topic of their conversation, which finally both disgusted and irritated me"), and nearly omnivorous—white men and leeches being apparently the only exceptions to this. The traveller's supply of salt beef and flour was soon exhausted, and the straits to which he was put are best understood from the fact that the native dish he most appreciated consisted of the larvæ of certain insects.

"One night we spent in a cave near the brook. The cave was not large, and was low, cold, and damp, and thus not very inviting. We had but its naked stones for a couch, for there was of course no grass to be found in the scrub. A big fire was kindled; outside it was pitch dark. My blacks had found in a large fallen tree some larvæ of beetles (Coleoptera) on which we feasted. There are several varieties of these edible larvæ, and all have a different taste. The best one is glittering white, of the thickness of a finger, and is found in the acacia-trees. The others live in the scrubs, and are smaller, and not equal to the former in flavour. The blacks are so fond of them that they even eat them alive, while they pick them out of the decayed trunk of a tree—a not very attractive spectacle. The larvæ were usually collected in baskets and so taken to the camp. The Australian does not as a rule eat raw animal food; the only exception I know of being these coleoptera larvæ. The large fire crackled lustily in the cave while we sat round it preparing the larvæ. We simply placed them in the red-hot ashes, where they at once became brown and crisp, and the fat fairly bubbled in them while they were being thus prepared. After being turned once or twice they were thrown out from the ashes with a stick, and were ready to be eaten. Strange to say, these larvæ were the best food the natives were able to offer me, and the only kind which I really enjoyed. If such a larva is broken in two, it will be found to consist of a yellow and tolerably compact mass rather like an omelette. In taste it resembles an egg, but it seemed to me that the best kind, namely the acacia larva, which has the flavour of nuts, tasted even better than a European omelette. The natives always consumed the entire larva, while I usually bit off the head and threw aside the skin, but my men always consumed my leavings with great gusto. They also ate the beetles as greedily as the larvæ, simply removing the hard wings before roasting them."

They also find plenty of honey in the trees, but it is not, the author says, altogether wholesome. The natives usually mix it with water:—

"This mixture of honey and water is not drunk, as one would suppose, but is consumed in a peculiar manner. The blacks take a little fine grass and chew it, thus making a tuft which they dip in the trough and from which they suck the honey as from a sponge. When they eat they sit crouching round the trough, and as each one tries to get as much as possible, the contents quickly disappear. Where spoons are wanting this would seem a natural and practical invention, and is surely calculated to secure an equitable division of the honey, as in this way it is difficult for any one person to get more than his share. After the meal the tufts are placed in the basket, where they are carried as long as they are fit for use."

For hunting purposes the author found that dogs would be an assistance, but to his surprise he found that dingoes are much rarer here than further to the south:—

"On Herbert River there are rarely more than one or two dingoes in each tribe, and as a rule they are of pure blood. The natives find them as puppies in the hollow trunks of trees, and rear them with greater care than they bestow on their own children. The dingo is an important member of the family; it sleeps in the huts and gets plenty to eat, not only of meat, but also of fruit. Its master never strikes, but merely threatens it. He caresses it like a child, eats the fleas off it, and then kisses it on the snout. Though the dingo is treated so well it often runs away, especially in the pairing season, and at such times it never returns. Thus it never becomes perfectly domesticated. Sometimes it refuses to go any further, and its owner has then to carry it on his shoulders, a luxury of which it is very fond."

We cannot do more than allude to the various interesting facts in natural history, and the curious customs of the natives. The author's final verdict on their character is that their "only noble quality" is kindness to their sick, but they seem also generous and liberal, kind to their children, and not addicted to cruelty. They were extraordinarily timid, not probably without cause. On one occasion they fancied he had fired off his gun in sign of anger, and sought to propitiate him by presenting him with the prettiest girl in the tribe. Fear alone, he thought, prevented them from killing him, and too great generosity or bad shooting on his part engendered contempt, and contempt danger. Civilization for them consisted mainly in the possession of a short pipe or a shirt, or even a hat; and their contempt then for their simpler brethren, whom they call "myall"—i.e., bushmen, "myall" being the name for an acacia—is very great.

Of the treatment of the natives by the white population the writer speaks in very plain terms. They are still, he says, being shot, poisoned, or otherwise made away with, and he quotes many instances of horrible barbarity. "That inhuman institution, the native police," is sent for on the slightest pretext to "disperse"—i.e., slaughter—its wretched countrymen. And though a more humane spirit seemed to be rising in Southern Queensland, it had but little influence in the North and West.

The deserted cattle-station above mentioned was tenanted only by an old white overseer, a kanaka or South Sea islander, and his Australian wife "Nelly":—

"The ménage was of the very dirtiest, but one gets accustomed to anything in Australia, and as when people are hungry they will eat almost anything, so the inhabitants of Northern Queensland are willing to live like pigs if they can only make money. The man who can 'work well' is most respected, and to this there can be no objection; but the idea of a 'good worker' implies that he is rough, and does not care what he eats. They do not understand that it is possible to work and eat in a decent manner at the same time."

Nevertheless our author felt constrained at times during his wanderings to retire upon the fleshpots of the cattle-station, where at least his life was fairly safe, and he had a roof over his head, and slumbers only broken by the occasional "howls" of Nelly when flogged by her husband the kanaka. Even these luxuries, however, began to pall, and he finally made for the coast, attended by a faithful native, Yokkai, who had evidently served him well, and more than once saved his life. He is perhaps a little hard on Yokkai, and expected too much from him:

"Before I went on board the boat I asked him if he would like to go with me to Norway [?]. He shrugged his shoulders and answered with a positive No. I shook his hand and bade him good-bye; but I did not discover the faintest sign of emotion. He gazed at me steadfastly with his large brown eyes beneath his broad-brimmed hat, but did not understand the significance of shaking hands. Thus I parted from my only friend among the savages, and many emotions crowded upon me as the vessel glided away, memories of the stirring days I had passed with him, and a sense of deep gratitude for the many services he had done me. Upon the whole I took leave of the country of the blacks and my interesting life in the mountains with strange feelings in my breast. Some of the impressions derived from this grand phase of nature I shall never forget. When the tropical sun with its bright dazzling rays rises in the morning above the dewy trees of the scrub, when the Australian bird of Paradise arranges its magnificent plumage in the first sunbeams, and when all nature awakens to a new life which can be conceived but cannot be described, it makes one sorry to be alone to admire all this beauty. Or when the full moon throws her pale light over the scrub-clad tops of the mountains and over the vast plains below, while the breezes play gently with the leaves of the palm-tree, and when the mystic voices of the night birds ring out on the still quiet night, there is indeed melancholy, but also untold beauty, in such a situation. I was, however, not sorry to leave the people. I had come to Herbert Vale full of sympathy for this race, which the settler drives before him with the rifle, but after the long months I had spent with them my sympathy was gone and only my interest in them remained. Experience had taught me that it is not only among civilized people that men are not as good as they ought to be."

This last fact the writer might perhaps have taken on good second-hand authority without going to Australia for it. Nor is it clear where, after all, his sympathy is to repose. But if he had stayed at home we should have lost a volume which is not only agreeable reading throughout, but full of curious information.

Letters of Philip Dormer, Fourth Earl of Chesterfield, to his Godson and Successor. Now first edited from the Originals, with a Memoir of Lord Chesterfield, by the Earl of Carnarvon. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

"I CAN honestly say," writes Lord Carnarvon, "that I began my task with little interest, perhaps with prejudice; I have ended it with strong interest, sympathy, and appreciation." Many readers of this sumptuous volume will, we think, experience somewhat similar feelings, and will in the end be touched by the intense earnestness of the old courtier as he endeavours to instil into the mind of his pupil the principles by which he thinks worldly success may be achieved. The letters commence in 1761, when Philip Stanhope, to whom they were addressed, was five years of age, and they were continued without a break till within a year or two of the writer's death, at the age of seventy-nine, in 1773.

Their chief blemish, which can hardly fail to strike all who read them, is that the subjects discussed are too often unsuited to a child. The resemblance between these letters and the earlier series written to his son is remarkable. We find in both the same ideas clothed in almost identical language, the same inducements held out to acquire knowledge, the same books recommended, the same stress laid on the impropriety of loud laughter, and the same constant injunctions "to sacrifice to the Graces." But a kindlier and less cynical tone pervades the letters now before us. Old age and the sorrows which darkened his closing years, though borne with apparent indifference, had somewhat softened the natural hardness of the writer's character. "The letters to his Son," writes Lord Carnarvon,

"were composed when he was in his full physical and intellectual strength,—many of them in the midst of the anxieties and labours of public business; whilst those to his Godson were written when political life was definitely abandoned, when age was heavy on him, and infirmities had, as he sometimes said, shut him out from the converse and the society which he loved best and in which he most excelled. But they show no sign of mental decay, they indulge in no regrets for the pleasures and interests which had already drifted away from him. There is not an ungenial word to sour the advice which he gives, or to cloud the young mind which he desires to educate."

Lord Chesterfield's philosophy, unlike that of most professors, stood the test of practice. At the time when these letters commence he had little left except wealth which could make life attractive. His health was breaking; his career, with the exception of a few brilliant episodes, had not been successful; his marriage was not a happy one; his dearest friend had perished by his own hand; and before long Lord Chesterfield had to mourn the loss of an only son, who had deceived and disappointed him; but he never allowed a complaint to escape him. Nothing, in fact, can be more admirable than the bright and affectionate tone of these letters. It is pleasant to observe how this "pair of friends" grew by degrees to know and to love one another. "He [the godson] loves me," wrote Lord Chesterfield to the lad's father, "almost as well as I do him, and that is a bold word." Lord Chesterfield's "wise saws" were sometimes accompanied, not by "modern instances," but by appropriate gifts, a method of enforcing instruction which "Sturdy," as they called the boy, must entirely have approved of. In the first letter of the series Lord Chesterfield writes:—

"I was agreeably surprised with receiving your letter written all with your own hand, which at five years and a half is, upon my word [Lord Chesterfield's favourite exclamation], a great performance.....I do not know if you remember (but I am apt to think you do) that I promised to send you a watch for the first letter you should write to me with your own hand. Now as a Man of Honour performs whatever he has promised, even without being put in mind of it, I have bought you a watch, which I will send you by the first opportunity."

Occasionally, but not often, we come across passages which impress on the boy higher motives for good behaviour than mere worldly morality. In a letter (August 2nd, 1762) of which an excellent facsimile is given in this volume, Lord Chesterfield, after telling the boy to attend to his studies, writes:—

"I must from time to time remind you of two much more important duties which I hope you will never forget, nor neglect. I mean your duty to God, and your duty to Man. God has been so good as to write in all our hearts, the duty that he expects from us; which is adoration and thanksgiving, and doing all the good we can to our fellow creatures. Our conscience, if we will but consult and attend to it, never fails to remind us of those duties."

Writing a few days later, Lord Chesterfield repeats the valuable piece of advice which he had formerly given to his son: "the first great step towards pleasing, is to desire to please, and whoever really desires it, will please to a certain degree."

When the boy got older, and had been placed under the care of Dr. Dodd, the earl sometimes adopted an easy tone of familiarity with his godson as if he were writing to a person of his own age. "Si le Docteur Dodd," he writes, "votre intime ami Ernst, et vous, n'avez rien de mieux à faire demain, pourquoi ne priendriez [sic] pas vous la soupe chez moy? Je ne vois point de raison au contraire. Dieu te benisse mon cher Enfant"; and on another occasion soon afterwards: "Do you go with the Doctor next Sunday to Greenwich, or do you preach in his stead at Charlotte Chappel? In either case have you anything to say to me or my Coach? Your orders whatever they may be, shall be obeyed."

One of the principal features in Lord Chesterfield's scheme of education was that his godson should become a perfect French scholar, and the large majority of these letters were written in that language. Lord Carnarvon remarks rather pedantically on the faults in grammar and spelling, and does not appear to appreciate the extreme excellence of the French. The style is clear, forcible, and elegant, with scarcely a trace to show that it was written by a foreigner. The faults in grammar are quite unimportant, and the orthography, which is of the time, is much better than that of Madame de Sévigné. We doubt if there were half a dozen of the great French nobles of that day who could write their own language more correctly, and we are tolerably sure that there are not at present half a dozen Englishmen of Lord Chesterfield's rank who could write French so well.

The editor has contributed to the volume an interesting memoir of Lord Chesterfield, and we wish that it were longer. It would be difficult to find a better subject for a biography than the statesman who, after occupying for half a century one of the most brilliant positions in social and political life, found the chief solace of his retirement in writing these letters to his godson and successor. "Lord Chesterfield's lot," writes Lord Carnarvon,

"was cast in a critical and very interesting period of English History.....It was a long life. He began it with George I., he ended it under the great grandson of George I. In early youth, and in the house of his grandmother, Lady Halifax, he had known Danby and Montagu, the statesmen of the Revolution; on one occasion he saw Richard Cromwell, then an old man, give evidence in a court of law before Chief Justice Holt. He lived through two quarrels with two Princes of Wales; he acted either with or against all the great public men of that day—Bolingbroke, Walpole, Pulteney, Carteret, Pitt; he was intimate with all the greatest men of letters, with Addison, Swift, Pope, Gay, Arbuthnot, Johnson; he knew Algarotti, Montesquieu, and Voltaire; he lived long enough into the reign of George III. to see him victorious in his struggle with the Whig aristocracy—long enough to witness the beginning of his fatal contest with the thirteen colonies of America; he foretold the French Revolution when the cloud was not bigger than a man's hand; he foresaw that the kingdom of Poland was on the verge of extinction; he anticipated the fall of Papal temporalities.

Lord Carnarvon tells his readers in another part of the memoir that the lad to whom these letters were written by his kinsman, who had seen Richard Cromwell, and had known Danby and Montagu, is still remembered by a few aged persons at Brethby.

The account given here of Johnson's refusal to dedicate his dictionary to Lord Chesterfield is marked by laudable impartiality, but the editor seems hardly to do justice to the famous letter which Johnson wrote on that occasion. The letter may have been unreasonable, but there is no finer example in our language of severe and dignified invective, and the courtly and deferential style of the writer gives point to the veiled satire of the composition. Johnson was, no doubt, "sensitive and exacting," and a few words of explanation would have enabled him to see his patron's conduct in a very different light. It is certain that the incident has to a great extent influenced public opinion in forming a judgment of Lord Chesterfield's character, which has in consequence been often unfairly judged.

We have little space to consider Lord Carnarvon's description of the part taken by Lord Chesterfield in public affairs. In his government of Ireland he succeeded where so many others have failed, and his name, we are here told, stands pre-eminent among Irish viceroys for "clear wisdom and administrative capacity." His second mission to the Hague, undertaken shortly before he went to Dublin, was accomplished with skill and celerity; but on the whole his career must be considered as a failure, and was certainly not what might have been expected from his great abilities and remarkable qualifications for public life. The causes of this want of success are not hard to discover. Lord Chesterfield's ambition was to obtain the first place in the Cabinet, and he was constantly intriguing against those to whom he ought to have given a loyal support. It is not quite easy to understand the exact nature of his schemes, but they were defeated by the practical astuteness of the statesman whom he wished to overthrow. In those days ministerial place and power were to a great extent dependent on the royal favour. Lord Carnarvon is of opinion that Chesterfield failed in political life because he tried to govern the king through the influence of Lady Suffolk, and thus incurred the ill will of the queen, who was the real dispenser of patronage. This idea, though it is shared by so eminent an historian as Mr. Lecky, appears to us to be an error which can be dispelled by a simple statement of unquestioned facts.

George II. came to the throne in June,

1727, and in February of the following year Chesterfield was sworn in of the Privy Council, and soon afterwards appointed Envoy at the Hague, one of the most important positions which a diplomatist could then hold. In the beginning of May, 1730, he was installed as a Knight of the Garter, and a few days later was appointed Lord Steward, retaining his post as Envoy to the States-General. He was then in his thirty-sixth year, and his intimacy with Lady Suffolk, whom he had known since she first came to London with the princess (afterwards Queen Caroline), had certainly not interfered with his rapid advancement. As far as that lady was concerned, he might have remained in office as long as Walpole was Prime Minister. But when the Excise Bill was brought forward by Walpole, whose power was for the first time seriously threatened, Lord Chesterfield voted against the measure, and was naturally dismissed from his appointments. "His support," writes Lord Carnarvon, with great naïveté, "was too independent and uncertain to please a minister who was said to require in his followers 'a supple and inoffensive disposition,' and who certainly was intolerant of independence or rivalry." It can surely not be supposed that Walpole would allow Lord Chesterfield to remain in office after he had voted against his colleagues on an occasion when the existence of the ministry was at stake. How well Lord Chesterfield was aware of the queen's influence appears from the following passage in a letter written in 1734 to Lady Suffolk herself, referring to Lord Hertford's wish to obtain an employment in the Household: "Pray prevail with him [Lord Hertford] to speak to the queen herself, without which there is nothing to be done." And in some remarks on Queen Caroline, found among his papers after his death, he wrote: "She showed her art most in the management of the king, whom she governed absolutely by a seeming complaisance and obedience to all his humours."

In some respects the editor's sketch of Lord Chesterfield's character is excellent, but in a few minor points the estimate is too favourable. Lord Chesterfield was a dignified and impressive orator; he was an admirable letter-writer; his conversation in society must have been delightful; as a wit he was allowed to have no rival among his contemporaries; but when we read of his "graceful epigrams," and find him spoken of as a skilful writer of familiar verse, we must express our dissent. His attempts at versification were too often coarse and indelicate, and showed none of the neatness or dexterity which Gay and Prior taught to many of their contemporaries. What, for instance, could be more graceful than Bishop Atterbury's verses on Flavia's Fan (twice quoted in these letters), and how superior they are even in wit to Lord Chesterfield's verses on another Flavia! a shameless epigram which the young lady to whom it was addressed can hardly have taken as a compliment. Lord Carnarvon expresses great admiration for the epigram on Beau Nash's picture, but the authorship of these lines is extremely doubtful. They were in any case attributed at the time to Miss Jane Brereton, and included in an edition of her poems published in 1744.

Nearly everybody has heard the story of the closing scene of Lord Chesterfield's long life—how in his last moments, observing that his friend was standing, he gasped out to his valet, "Give Dayrolles a chair." Something of this courtly demeanour was, by a strange coincidence, retained even after death. Not many years ago, on some occasion when the family vault at Shelford was opened, the lid of the famous earl's coffin was by accident partially broken in, and those present were able to see the head resting with a stately air on a white satin cushion:—

Even in our ashes live their wonted fires.

Sylvie and Bruno. By Lewis Carroll. (Macmillan & Co.)

A book of which the key-note is topsy-turvy-ness ought surely to be produced in a somewhat topsy-turvy manner, so it is not surprising to find from Mr. Lewis Carroll's preface that he first collected his incidents and dialogues, or fragments of them, and then invented a story to use these to the best advantage. He reveals, in fact, in his preface his method of composition. The chapters headed "Fairy Sylvie" and "Bruno's Revenge" are, with some slight alterations, reprinted from a tale in Aunt Judy's Magazine, 1867. Not till seven years after its publication did the idea of making it the nucleus of a longer story present itself to the author's mind. "As the years went on," writes Mr. Carroll,

"I jotted down, at odd moments, all sorts of odd ideas, and fragments of dialogue, that occurred to me—who knows how?—with a transitory suddenness that left me no choice but either to record them then and there, or to abandon them to oblivion..... And thus it came to pass that I found myself at last in possession of a huge unwieldy mass of literature—if the reader will kindly excuse the spelling—which only needed stringing together, upon the thread of a consecutive story, to constitute the book I hoped to write. Only! The task, at first, seemed absolutely hopeless, and gave me a far clearer idea, than I ever had before, of the meaning of the word 'chaos': and I think it must have been ten years, or more, before I had succeeded in classifying these odds-and-ends sufficiently to see what sort of a story they indicated: for the story had to grow out of the incidents, not the incidents out of the story."

Such was the "genesis" of 'Sylvie and Bruno.' Being written by Mr. Lewis Carroll, it is needless to say that it is full of amusing things, and not without some of "the graver thoughts of human life"; nevertheless it falls far below 'Alice in Wonderland,' and the illustrations of Mr. Harry Furniss are by no means worthy of his reputation. The narrator is an impersonal being who comes and goes like Miss Meadows and the girls in "Uncle Remus," and never takes much more shape. He lapses into fairyland every time he falls asleep, and returns without any sense of strangeness; and so well is this managed that we accompany him thither with perfect ease, and are quite as able to make the best of both worlds as he is. The characters are numerous. There is a warden who is deposed from his wardenship, and finds refuge in fairyland as king—a sub-warden with a wicked and very stout wife, who "looks like a haystack out of temper"—a distinguished doctor who has "actually invented three new diseases, besides a new

With the way Mr. Gilbert has done his editorial work there is no fault to find. We only regret that he has confined his glossary to a part instead of extending it to the whole of his book. An index will doubtless appear when the work is complete.

The Golden Days of '49. By Kirk Munroe. (Allen & Co.)

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL'S second venture is a striking witness to the value of anonymity. Though obviously the work of a beginner, 'Sir Lucian Elphin' was a novel of conspicuous promise. 'The Art of Love,' on the title-page of which the author gives his name, is, with the exception of a few passages, a very inferior performance. The few passages in question relate to the life, manners, and speech of the Scots peasantry, all of which Sir Herbert Maxwell handles excellently, and with far happier results than are apparent in his laboured pictures of fashionable women and gilded youths. The radical fault about 'The Art of Love,' however, is its want of condensation. The progress of the plot is delayed by irrelevant episodes leading nowhither, or worse still by gaps of five or more years. The narrative extends altogether over more than thirty years, with the result that there is a constant shifting of scenery and succession of actors, some of the best of whom disappear altogether. Sir Herbert Maxwell is evidently a man of not a little reading, but the evidences of this fact are dragged in ostentatiously instead of making themselves felt insensibly. For example, after describing a crofter's dwelling he proceeds, "The cottage merited the encomium of parva sed apta pronounced by the grateful Ariosto upon the gift of an equally humble dwelling presented to him by the princely Alfonso." This somewhat immature style appears also in the dialogue, and detracts a good deal from its lifelikeness. On the other hand, the conversations in dialect are excellent and full of racy touches, as when the old dame protests against the lady's-maid's umbrella: "A fair flying in the face o' Providence, I ca' it, when it's written that 'He sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust.'" But when Sir Herbert Maxwell deserts the crofters and lairds for clubland or Mayfair, the whole charm of the book evaporates. He is, apparently, most anxious to convey his disapprobation of those who live luxurious and dissipated days, but he weakens his position by the somewhat complacent manner in which he describes all the paraphernalia of sybaritism. The young man who does duty for hero wholly fails to win our admiration. There is something grotesquely inadequate in the motive which induces him to turn his back on the Church, after having stifled his artistic aspirations and strenuously devoted himself to his calling. However, in a romantic novel tattooed initials, like strawberry marks, are impossible to conceal when a baronetcy and 60,000*l.* a year are concerned, and the shy young minister with great alacrity consents to be transformed into a sumptuous aristocrat with mansions, castles, and a profuse supply of Neapolitan violets. True, he does not become a bad baronet, but at all points he is a great falling off from his predecessor, Sir Lucian Elphin.

"Unhealthy lumberings" are attributed to Sir Gerald Templeton, the "surreptitious baronet," by the literary author of his being. The vice of inverted style—shown in such phrases as "Let us walk to the sea," he, on his return from the stables, said"; "As charming a residence as can, throughout the length and breadth of England, be found"; "The portière is, by an evidently hasty hand, thrust aside"—crops up on nearly every page; while "She busied herself in the actual work, in its lighter branches, id est, of a garden," is a sample of the misuse of scraps of Latin and French with which the book is garnished. It is only, we are assured, "to point a moral" that the author "adorns her tale" with such a scene as that between Lady Templeton and Lord Arthur Conway, where scarcely anything is left for imagination. Become the slave of her seducer, the miserable lady, in whose veins we are told there runs the taint of hereditary insanity, agrees to bring up the surreptitious baronet as her husband's heir. The husband dies too early to entertain suspicions, and in due time Lord Arthur expires in the odour of sanctity, and on his death-bed clears up the paternity (and maternity) of Gerald in so satisfactory a manner that the doubtful baronet becomes a positive duke. Poor Lady Templeton goes mad, wherein it is hard to detect poetical justice. The moral of all this escapes us; perhaps it is to be found in the honourable reluctance of Gerald, while he fancies he is liable to insanity, to involve a loving woman in his doom—perhaps in the equally respectable conduct of an agnostic parson, possessed of private means, in resigning his position in the Church.

There is a great deal of matter and not much manner in Mr. Vince's 'Two Pardons,' and the sort of impression it gives is of a something heavy and imperfectly mixed. We are sure of one thing—it is too bulky, and weighted with too many ingredients. Certain isolated morsels may be good enough in their way, but there really is nothing to distinguish it as a whole save its weightiness and the drinking, clinking, and mixing of varieties of potations, greater in amount than in the early fifties even might be expected. A vast deal of alehouse gossip and town-hall chatter is also to be noted; and there are a lot of "characters," carefully differentiated, who are a weariness to the spirit. The dominating idea is the band of young men who have made their fortunes "out West," and return to control the destinies of certain folk in an English county town in a rather mysterious fashion, and with the aid of a very peculiar being, a "nigger." One is not quite sure how it is done, nor why it is done, though one is none the less pleased when it is done.

Mrs. Jocelyn's new novel is fortunately by no means given over to hunting interests, and is indeed only of a mildly sporting character, though her readers are compelled to follow the heroine and her admirers through more than one run. The fortunes of the chase too often prove perilously attractive to feminine pens, and Whyte Melville, for whom Mrs. Jocelyn has an evident admiration, is an unsafe model for amateurs from all literary points of view. It is scarcely unfair to say that only in a lady's novel of this order could a man be made to behave in so dastardly a manner as Capt. Denham without being considered a complete scoundrel by the author as well as by the reader. Can such be the writer's view of him, however, since she not only rewards him with the obstinate devotion of a good woman, but calls upon her readers to believe that he bade fair in the end to prove a husband worthy of Dolly Vernon's choice? This is really too bad. Happily there are several other characters who go some way towards redeeming Denham's existence and the part he is allowed to play in the book. Squire Vernon, George Ventnor, and Lady Francis (why should a woman's Christian name be spelt thus?) are all good. The heroine herself is also a very nice girl; and since she fell in love with her good-for-nothing hero at the absurd age of seventeen she should perhaps be forgiven for her youthful folly. It is really hard upon her that, unlike most of the fancies of seventeen, it is made to take a permanent form. The story is too long, and the incidents become bewildering for want of more orderly marshalling. Mrs. Jocelyn does not often quote French words or phrases, but when she does she should be more careful about the accuracy of their spelling and of their idiomatic application.

'Master of his Fate' is a distinctly clever piece of work, containing ideas and fancies not given to the first comer to conceive, nor conceiving, would he probably possess the power to direct such "kittle cattle" to definite and artistic issues. Fantastic as it is, and beyond the range of what are ordinarily esteemed human possibilities, Mr. Cobban has contrived to invest the difficult material of his story with an air of conviction and seriousness, and some sort of semblance of a scientific basis, so that he carries his readers to a certain extent with him. The leading idea is the notion of a man's own consciousness and identity being the one recognizable and universal factor, and all outside it, human or natural, being by him regarded as so much material for his delight and for the increasing of his vital powers, a universe, in short, upon which he in time comes to prey directly by abstraction of animal magnetism till he finds himself (with a moral consciousness suddenly awakened by love) the vampire and destroyer of individuals. All this, which is to some extent capable of scientific and philosophical interpretation, is by Mr. Cobban cleverly and keenly presented. Weird and awful possibilities open up before the imaginative reader—vistas of hitherto unknown forces and relations between human beings, and dread potentialities that for the moment appear within the range and focus of probability. So much, and more, Mr. Cobban does for his readers. He provides an illusion and compels them to tread within its charmed circle. But there are nevertheless weak places in his fantasy, and (alas that it must be said!) the reader "comes awake" before it is all over. The story opens with a quiet reticence of touch, and gradually grows in poignancy up to the scene in the Albany, which reminds one of Hyde and Jekyll, and which seems to be the real climax. After it the interest begins to flag, the excitement dies out, and by the time the confession to the Doctor takes place the intensity has vanished. When the Doctor, with "the exquisite charity that forgives all things," offers to secure the services—in other words, the vital forces—of a dozen good men and true, to renew the failing powers of the Vampire Julius, the thing hovers too near a suspicion of the ludicrous. And the Doctor's refusal to hear the modus operandi employed by Julius for laying in his supplies of vitality is not the procedure of a true scientific enthusiast. Some other way of getting rid of the difficulty of explaining the practical part of the business might have occurred to so able and ingenious a writer as Mr. Cobban. One thing more strikes us: it is that the personality of Julius (an important factor) is less fascinating and absorbing, less inevitable, so to speak, than it should be. Also—this is but a suggestion—would not the element of mystery and terror have been increased had Julius and his father (paradoxical as it sounds) been one and the same person? Why else insist on the personality of the parent who has little or no influence on Mr. Cobban's eccentric story?

The 'Newgate Calendar' is too strongly represented in 'Sybil Ross's Marriage.' It is dull, not to say doleful, to have a detailed account of life in the inside of a gaol, or of the very unadventurous escape of convicts from Dartmoor Prison. The South African life is better handled, or rather its realism is not so repulsive as that of the doings of "magsmen" and "clyfakers." To make the central incident the clandestine marriage of a schoolgirl, an orphan heiress, to a thief is a device which requires variety in the subordinate parts of the story. But this matter-of-fact narrative is unrelieved by a glimpse of humour, unless the old gentleman who does not go to church because he will not wear a tall hat, or the old convict who joins the "Rescue Army," and sings quasi-religious doggerel as he goes about planning burglaries, can be considered humorous. In one respect there is some strength in this strange book: it is intensely sad. A few of the incidents are impressive enough, but there is need of more complexity, more variety of character, more balance of interest, to make an artistic story.

'The Preacher of St. Juste's' leaves no impression not speedily effaced. It is a little volume teeming with theological trouble, and full of religious doubts and difficulties, yet without mental nourishment or attraction of any kind. The story passes from the acuter stages of mental distress, in which a chorus of persons (who do not even begin to interest one) are to be heard muttering, "I am an atheist; he, she, it, we, and they are atheists," &c., to a peaceful equilibrium of some sort or kind—the tomb most likely.

'The Golden Days of '49' is, of course, a story of the gold fever, the old Californian days, and the beginnings of San Francisco. It is a capital subject capably treated. No boy, who is a boy, could resist it, and even those unfortunate people who do not belong to the species may find a measure of enjoyment in it too. There is a matter-of-fact tone and air about it which almost amounts to baldness in the manner of telling, but this increases rather than detracts from its merits. It is refreshing reading after all the semi-supernatural adventures and incredible combats which have lately been the fashion in stories. All sorts of things, likely and not so likely, occur in 'The Golden Days,' it is true, but the interest of the thing carries one well along, and the air of sincerity and veracity assumed by the narrator makes any question seem superfluous. There is a good deal of the language of Bret Harte, and a little of the humour of Mark Twain, and, except just at the end—which nobody wants—not a "female person" anywhere on the horizon. There are capital men and horses instead, and a great variety of incident and adventure, which must make the book a favourite and suitable for presentation to the young.

THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Quinti Septimii Florentis Tertulliani Apologeticus adversus Gentes pro Christianis. Edited with Introduction and Notes by T. Herbert Bindley. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)—Mr. Bindley thus states his aim in preparing this edition of Tertullian's 'Apology': "I have endeavoured to meet the wants of young theological students, and to supply such notes as it seemed likely would prove helpful to them in their study of a text confessedly difficult in style, and abounding in references mythological, philosophical, historical, and legal." Mr. Bindley shows no special qualifications for the work he has undertaken. He has not studied the style and language of Tertullian so carefully as Woodham did, and Woodham's edition is far superior to Mr. Bindley's in the explanation of words and phrases. Indeed, Mr. Bindley is sometimes careless. Thus he translates "Sunt tanti, quanti et denotatur," "And their numbers are as great as we are computed to be," where the force of "denotatur" is missed altogether. He renders "Æquis ille Christus cum sua fabula?" "And who is this Christ with his story?" which is a correct translation of another reading, "Et quis." Again, Mr. Bindley does not seem to be at home in patristic literature. He thus refers to the martyrdom of St. Polycarp: "Eusebius's account of the martyrdom of St. Polycarp furnishes instances," &c. But Eusebius states expressly that it is not his own account, but that of the Church in Smyrna—a document well known to all who take an interest in early Christian literature. In like manner he appeals to Trithemius as if he were an ancient authority, though his book was written at the very close of the fifteenth century, and the mode of his appeal raises a suspicion that he did not take the trouble of looking into the work of Trithemius or finding out what was the meaning of the word Trithemius. He asserts boldly that Tertullian was followed by Minucius Felix, without taking the slightest notice of the numerous monographs which have been written to prove that Minucius was anterior to Tertullian. Nor do we perceive any signs that he has given special attention to the history of philosophy. His notes on ancient philosophers are generally vague and without dates. Thus his note on Zeno is, "A native of Citium in Cyprus and the founder of the Stoic school of philosophy," and then he adds some references. And the next note, one on Cleanthes, is of the same nature, "Cleanthes of Assos, a pupil of Zeno, whom he succeeded as president of the school"; then follow a few references. Nor is Mr. Bindley acquainted with recent discussions on Greek and especially on Roman mythology. His entire explanation of Luperi is "The priests of Lycean Pan," a few words which show a complete ignorance of all that has been done by Ambrosch and a host of more recent writers. Notwithstanding these defects the book deserves praise. The editor is a sound enough scholar, has read a large number of recent books on early Christianity, and has made a good use of editions and translations, his indebtedness to which he has acknowledged in his preface. The notes will be found serviceable for those for whom they are intended.

LITTLE attention was paid to the interesting, though scanty remnant of the Mandaic tribe in Lower Babylonia (in the country of Wasit and Basra) up to 1867, when the late H. Petermann edited the 'Liber Adami' ('Sidra Rabbá'), and Prof. Euting the book of hymns used by the sect. In 1875 Prof. Nöldeke published a grammar of the Mandaic dialect (which is a corrupt Syriac, approaching the dialect in which the Babylonian Talmud is written in the passages which are not neo-Hebrew); his grammar was based upon printed books and on MSS. from various libraries. We knew, however, very little of the religious ideas of this small sect, who call themselves Nasōrāyē, Nazarenes or Christians, although, as Prof. Nöldeke says, they consider Jesus an evil being, and the Holy Ghost, whom they hold to have been his mother, a female demon. The articles by K. Kessler in encyclopedias and his lectures would seem not to be altogether satisfactory, if we may believe Dr. A. J. H. Wilhelm Brandt, whose learned book, entitled Die Mandäische Religion, ihre Entwicklung und geschichtliche Bedeutung erforscht, dargestellt, und beleuchtet (Leipzig, J. C. Hinrichs), lies before us. The author has diligently read through the original books of the Mandaites, not relying on Norberg's Latin translation of the Codex Nasaræus, and his results are, therefore, acceptable as far as the Mandaic dialect is known and the mystic theology of this sect intelligible. After having enumerated in the preface the works of Mandaic literature and the editions and translations of them, as well as the essays written on them, Dr. Brandt continues with a chapter on Mandaic theology, in which the logos of the light plays an important part. In the second chapter their notions about cosmogony and anthropology are given. Then follows a description of their religious life, i.e., moral principles, religious ceremonies and duties, and the state of the clergy. A fourth chapter gives an historical view of this theology, including the revelation to Adam, false religions, Christian influence, the theory of the light-king, and the developments of it. In the following chapter Dr. Brandt treats of the Mandaic religion and its origin; of the influence upon it of the Assyro-Chaldean philosophy, of Parsism, and of Jewish ideas; and of its relation to Manichæism. The name of Manda is connected with the root yada, to know. The volume ends with elaborate notes on the Genza or Codex Nasaræus, on the present congregation of the Mandaites at Sûq est-Shih, on the ceremony of baptism, on the Biblical narratives in the Genza, and on other out-of-the-way topics. In spite of the great efforts made by Dr. Brandt to be clear, we have very often experienced the truth of Prof. Nöldeke's remark that the Mandaic literature is full of contradictions. The chief result is that it contains various elements, pagan, Jewish, early Christian, and especially Gnostic. Possibly Ibn Wahshiyyah borrowed much from the Mandaites. Dr. Brandt's laudable attempt will be of great use for the study of the Gnostic sects, and there is no doubt that in a second edition the author will be able to clear up many statements not altogether intelligible. Unfortunately no help can be expected from the ignorant clergy of the present Mandaitic congregations.

THE familiar edition of the New Testament which Bishop Lloyd edited for the Clarendon Press has been reissued with three appendices: one containing a collation of the text of Drs. Westcott and Hort, another a short digest by Prof. Sanday of various readings, and, third, a selection of readings derived from Eastern versions. Nicely printed on beautifully thin paper, and well bound, this new issue will undoubtedly prove popular.

PROF. SAYCE'S little book The Life and Times of Isaiah as illustrated by Contemporary Monuments (Religious Tract Society) contains just what it promises. It gives the life of the prophet according to the Biblical documents, and then the state of Egypt in the age of Isaiah is elucidated by the prophet's words and the hieroglyphic monuments. In the chapter on Assyria the author finds himself at home; he supplies a vivid description of the exploits of Tiglath-pileser III., who restored the power of Assyria, which had been lost under the old dynasty. By the help of the cuneiform inscriptions he frames an account of the relations of Syria to Israel, and he concludes with a chapter on the political parties in Judah. In appendices the reader will find translations of a fragment of Tiglath-pileser's annals, of the Sargon inscription (where it is not said that he captured Jerusalem, a fact which is maintained in the book on plausible grounds), and of Sennacherib's narrative of his campaign against Judah. At the beginning Prof. Sayce gives a chronological table from 756 to 681, and a small map of the land where the invasions took place; both will be welcome to the student. The little book is written in an attractive style, and will prove useful for those who have no time to read much on the subject.

The Kings of Israel and Judah, by Canon George Rawlinson (Nisbet), is less fanciful than the life of Moses by the same author, and although written from an orthodox point of view, "using sparingly Ewald's 'History of the People of Israel,' because of the writer's absolute rejection of the miraculous element, which, according to the original authorities, played a prominent part," the book will be read with interest by the public for which it is meant. The author notices the data found in inscriptions, makes use of the text of the Septuagint and of Josephus, and borrows much from Dean Stanley's lectures on the Jewish Church. The researches of Wellhausen and Stade are a "terra incognita" or "prohibita" for the writer. Why he objects to the translation of נחשון (2 Kings xviii. 4) as serpent, and renders it a "piece of brass," to which incense was offered, is hard to understand. The termination an or on refers to a divinity, and in our case to a brass deity.

PEOPLE who delight in hymns will find much to please them in the Historical Companion to Hymns Ancient and Modern, by the Rev. R. M. Moorsom (Parker & Co.), containing the originals of the hymns of which translations appear in that popular hymnal. Those not acquainted with the subject will derive a good deal of information from this little volume.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

UNDER the title of Brave Men in Action (Ward & Downey), the late Mr. Stephen Mackenna compiled, and Mr. J. A. O'Shea has now edited, a series of stories selected as setting forth in brightest colours the transcendent courage of British seamen and soldiers. The examples are not particularly well chosen, nor has the narration of them the slightest pretension to critical accuracy; but the book is described as "primarily intended for boys," and as such may be welcome at this festive and story-telling season.

It is too strongly flavoured with superlatives, but even so may be found more wholesome reading than much that boys sometimes indulge in.

A History of Felsted School, by John Sargeant (Chelmsford, Durrant), is a careful and well-written sketch of an Essex school, which was founded in 1564 by Lord Chancellor Richard Rich, and which during the mastership (1627-1649) of the Puritan Martin Holbeach included among its scholars Isaac Barrow and the four boys of Oliver Cromwell. Appended is an interesting chapter on the founder and his descendants down to Edward, fifth Earl of Holland, eighth Earl of Warwick, and tenth Lord Rich, who died in 1759, leaving one unmarried daughter. The copper school token described in the East Anglian for July, 1868, might perhaps have been added to the two illustrations of the Old Scholastic House and of Leez Priory.

Engaged to be Married, by L. T. Meade (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.), is a simple and wholesome little story, quite suitable and safe reading for any schoolgirl's Christmas holidays; it may even be thought interesting by this department of the public, but on such a delicate point the mere ordinary critic hardly ventures a prediction. At any rate, the picture of the courageous self-reliant young workers is a pleasing one, free from all sentimentality and affectation. Helen Channing, the severely intelligent secretary, aged twenty, disdainful of love affairs, but full of unselfish devotion to her younger sister, is well sketched, as is also the less worthy Dolly, who so poorly repays her trust and sacrifices. Emmy Thorn, the heroine of the book properly speaking, and the trials of her engagement, with its final reward, are much more commonplace. Her adventures with her redoubtable future father-in-law and the performances of the said Sir Percival are also decidedly inferior in merit and reality to the simple and lifelike scenes from her own and the Channings' cheery struggles for existence in London. The twelve illustrations contributed by Mr. Arthur Hopkins, though the drawing is decidedly weak, are nearly always pretty, and are quite on a level with the letterpress.

MRS. MACLEHOSE in her Tales from Spenser (MacLehose) has made an effort to render the tales in the 'Faerie Queene' interesting to children, and in spite of the difficulty of her task has attained a good measure of success. Her style is judiciously simple.

UNDER the title of The Blue Friars, their Sayings and Doings (Simpkin & Marshall), Mr. W. H. K. Wright has published an elaborate account of a small convivial club of professional men which used to meet at Plymouth some fifty or sixty years ago, read papers, write verses, and indulge in a little fooling. Mr. Wright has evidently taken great pains with his materials, but we are afraid that outside Plymouth the book will hardly be appreciated. The elder Mathews was elected a "Blue Friar," and an account of his last days, contributed by a "Friar" to Fraser in 1838, is reprinted by Mr. Wright.

MESSRS. TRUBNER & Co. have sent us a clever volume by Mr. Thomas Sinclair, entitled Essays in Three Kinds. The style occasionally leaves something to be desired, but the writer's ability is manifest.

MR. FROWDE has forwarded some specimens of typographical ingenuity in the shape of a Finger Prayer Book, in various beautiful bindings which reflect much credit on the designer.

We have received from Messrs. Hatchard Nos. 4, 5, and 6 of Dignitaries of the Church, containing good photographs of bishops and other clergymen. The notices that accompany them are cautiously written, in order to avoid offending any one.

THE number of new editions on our table is large. Messrs. Macmillan are responsible for a sixpenny edition of Yeast that ought to rival in popularity its predecessors in this issue of Kingsley's novels; a handsome and interesting reissue of Kingsley's Historical Lectures and Essays, and a pretty volume of Ballads, Lyrics, and Sonnets selected from the works of Longfellow; while Messrs. Routledge have added Emerson's Poems and also Lockhart's Spanish Ballads to their pretty "Pocket Library."—Stanley's Life of Arnold has been included by Messrs. Ward & Lock in the "Minerva Library."—Mr. Stott has added to the "Stott Library" a neat reprint of The Essays of Elia.—In their tasteful "Knickerbocker Nuggets" Messrs. Putnam's Sons have issued that standard favourite The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, with notes by Mr. Bigelow; The Songs of Fairy Land, a pleasant selection of verse, edited by Mr. E. T. Mason, but indifferently illustrated by Miss Maud Humphrey; and two volumes of American War Ballads, edited by Mr. G. C. Eggleston.—We are sorry to note the close of the "National Library," which has reflected such credit on Messrs. Cassell. Prof. Morley has, much to his honour, maintained the high standard of the collection to the end.—Messrs. Griffith & Farran publish in their very cheap "Library of Theological Literature" Theology of Tertullian, Reeve's translation, and The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, in Jeremy Collier's version. The two form a shilling volume.—The indefatigable Mr. Scott has added to the "Canterbury Poets" a volume of the Humorous Poems of the Century, with biographical notes by Mr. R. Caine. In his "Camelot Series" appears a welcome reprint of Harrison's Description of England, with an abridgment of the introduction Mr. Furnivall contributed to the edition issued by the New Shakspeare Society in 1871.

We have on our table The Elements of Canon Law, by O. J. Reichel (Baker); Colonial Times on Buzzard's Bay, by W. R. Bliss (New York, Houghton); Reminiscences of a Boyhood (Low); East Coast Days, and Memories, by the Author of 'The Recreations of a Country Parson' (Longmans); The Student's Cicero, by the Rev. W. Y. Fausset (Sonnenschein); Gaius Julius Caesaris de Bello Gallico Commentariorum I., edited by C. H. Poole, LL.D. (Relfe Brothers); The Shorthand of Arithmetic, by J. Jackson (Low); Science of Every-day Life, by J. A. Bower (Cassell); Irish Politics, by T. Raleigh (Methuen & Co.); The Threatening Letter-Writer and Irish Loyalist's Companion, by P. O'Connor MacLaughlin (Dublin, Gill & Son); The House of Surprises, by L. T. Meade (Hatchard); What to Do? by Count L. N. Tolstói (Scott); Janus, by E. I. Stevenson (Drane); Sporting Anecdotes, edited by "Ellangowan" (Hamilton, Adams & Co.); English Idylls, by P. H. Emerson (Low); Priest and Puritan (Bretano); The Seven Golden Keys, by J. E. Arnold (Blackie); The Doubts of Dives, by W. Besant (Simpkin); The Achievements of Youth, by the Rev. R. Steel (Nelson & Sons); Ways and Means, by I. F. Mayo (R.T.S.); Shakespeare's Cymbeline, with Introduction and Notes by K. Deighton (Macmillan); Lovely Homes, and other Poems, by C. Adley (Remington); Poems of the Hearth, by J. Kyd (Dundee, Leng & Co.); Sweet Singers of Wales, by H. E. Lewis (R.T.S.); The Dignity of Man, Select Sermons, by S. S. Harris, D.D. (Low); The Lesser Hours of the Sarum Breviary (Sonnenschein); Scripture Doctrine of the Heathen, by E. White (Clarke & Co.); The Story of the Church of England, by G. H. F. Nye (Griffith & Farran); The Life and Work of Charles Henry von Bogatzky, by the Rev. J. Kelly (R.T.S.); Fraser Prize Essay on Secularism in relation to Christianity, by Firmian (Sydney, Turner & Henderson); Questions for the Free Churches, by J. Castellani (Venice, Visentini).—and Les Chaldéens jusqu'à la Formation de l'Empire de Nabuchodonosor, by A. J. Delattre (Louvain, Lefever). Among New Editions we have Philosophia Ultima; or, Science of the Sciences, by C. W. Shields, 2 vols. (Low).—and Sound, Light, and Heat, by A. Gardner, Part I. (J. Heywood).

THE DEATH OF KEATS'S SISTER.

ALMOST the last link between the poet Keats and the men and women of to-day is broken. Of those who knew him face to face his sister was one of the longest survivors. Little more than three weeks ago she was alive and well; but news has just reached England that on the 16th of December, after a short but painful illness—painful owing to the great vitality which she maintained at eighty-six—she passed away. Frances Mary Keats, the only sister of the poet, was born in Finsbury on the 3rd of June, 1803, and was largely indebted to her maternal grandmother, Alice Jennings, for that practical bringing-up which fostered her natural good sense and self-reliance. Her father died while she was yet an infant, in 1804, her mother six years later, after an unfortunate second marriage; but her grandmother Jennings survived till 1814. After the death of her grandmother she passed under the guardianship of Richard Abbey, in whose household she had ample opportunity to learn self-control in difficult circumstances. Her brother's letters to her, spread over five important years in their two lives, are among the brightest, manliest, and most unselfish letters ever addressed by a poet to his sister; and, although the deceased lady never had the courage to read them in print, the spirit in which they have been generally accepted as evidence of his nobility of character must have satisfied her that she did well to consent to their publication. Keats's foreboding that all the family would die young was as little fated to come true as that other forecast in which he pictured himself and his sister as old people with stumpy thumbs and double chins. Fanny Keats married Señor Valentin Llanos, a Spanish gentleman of considerable accomplishment, who distinguished himself both in the diplomatic service of his country, and in literature as the author of 'Don Esteban' and 'Sandoval the Freemason.' There are two sons and two daughters, children of this marriage. Of the sons, one is in the civil employ of the Spanish Government, while the other, the namesake of his illustrious uncle (Don Juan Llanos y Keats), has earned distinction as a painter in his native country. Living in affluence for many years at Madrid, Señor Llanos and his wife suffered some years ago unmerited pecuniary losses, owing to which Señora Llanos accepted a Civil List pension, gladly awarded to her by the late Lord Beaconsfield, in recognition of her brother's world-wide renown. Señor Llanos lived to be nearly ninety, and died in 1885, leaving his widow to encounter, with unabated energy and good sense, the difficulties of launching in the world a large family of fatherless grandchildren. Of these one is already making her way as a painter, for the artistic proclivities of the Keats family appear in a third generation in the person of Señorita Elena Blockmann.

Up till late in the past year Mrs. Llanos wrote frequent letters of business to her chief correspondent in England, who received one dated as late as the 13th ult., dictated and signed by her. Her illness was exceedingly rapid; a cold which gave no particular cause for alarm suddenly took the form of pulmonary inflammation, and then, as in the case of the great poet whose remains have been consigned to Westminster Abbey this week, the heart failed and the end came. The latest and most anxious wish of Keats's sister Fanny, to whom Keats's countrymen are indebted for one of the most charming sections of his published writings, was that the very moderate bounty from the British Exchequer, which materially aided her for the last few years of her life, might be extended to her unmarried daughter, Señorita Rosa Llanos y Keats. We may confidently anticipate that the good deed of one Conservative administration will be imitated by another.

Those who knew Mrs. Llanos and had seen the published portrait of poor young Thomas Keats, who died seventy-one years ago, can well understand the words which the poet wrote of his sister, "She walks about my imagination like a ghost, she is so like Tom." Those who know the niece of the poet for whom the nation's help is now asked see in her fine, frank, intelligent face, with its earnest eyes and broad brow, a decided resemblance, not to her mother or to her father, but to Keats. It is one of England's greatest losses that the poet's brow was never crowned, like that of his niece, with the silver hair of advancing years.

THE HOSPITALERS IN ENGLAND.

The Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem was divided for administrative purposes into several Nations, one of which was the Nation of England. The Grand Priors of England and Ireland were subdivisions of this Nation. The Bailiff of England was the chief dignitary in the Nation, and the Grand Priors of England and Ireland ranked next to him.

The Act 32 Henry VIII. cap. 24 declared the Order to be dissolved and void in England and Ireland, and granted the lands and goods of the Order in those countries to the king. Outside England and Ireland the Act was necessarily inoperative, and the Nation of England with the Grand Priors of England and Ireland flourished as before, though with diminished resources.

In 1888 a charitable society was incorporated by charter as 'The Grand Priory of the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England,' under the presidency of a Grand Prior. This society has assumed the Maltese cross, which is the badge of the real Order; its headquarters are at St. John's Gate, which formerly belonged to the real Order; and its constitution is adapted from that of the Grand Priory of England in the real Order. The charter itself discreetly avoids all reference to the real Order, and merely recites that the society has existed for more than fifty years.

It certainly does seem strange that a number of ladies and gentlemen could not form a charitable society without doing things calculated to create the impression that they are members of a venerable Order, to which they have no claim to belong. But as they have chosen to place themselves in this equivocal position, it is peculiarly incumbent upon them to see that none of their number overstep the line dividing those statements which merely suggest false inferences from those statements which are palpably untrue.

This line has been decidedly overstepped in an article entitled 'The Sovereign Order of St. John of Jerusalem in Anglia,' signed by 'A Knight of the Order,' and published in the Newbury House Magazine for January, 1890. The writer of that article assumes throughout that the English society is part and parcel of the real Order, and actually states in so many words that "the Order, as it now exists here in the shape of the English 'Langue,' is the legitimate successor of the fraternity of English knights who were known in the Norman and Plantagenet times as the Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem."

CECIL TORR.

MR. FARRAN.

WE regret to have to announce the death on the 13th of December, at Surbiton, of Mr. Robert Farran, formerly head of the firm of Messrs. Griffith, Farran, Okeden & Welsh, of St. Paul's Churchyard and Charing Cross Road. He had not been actively engaged in business for nearly two years, and his retirement from the firm, owing to his prolonged illness, as from June 30th, 1888, was announced only a few months ago.

The son of Major Charles Farran, of the 14th Madras Infantry, he was born in India on the 28th of January, 1829, and, coming to London at an early age, received his first training as a bookseller and publisher in the house of Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co., now of Waterloo Place, but at that time in Leadenhall Street. The training auspiciously begun was completed by several years of experience with Messrs. Longman & Co., whom he left to join Mr. Griffith at the corner of St. Paul's Churchyard after the retirement of Mr. Grant in 1856. The high reputation of this old-established house for the excellence of its publications and strict integrity was strengthened and enhanced by Mr. Farran, whose cautious judgment, business aptitude, and courteous kindness won the confidence and esteem of all who were fortunate enough to know him. He took a keen and active interest in everything that concerned the welfare of the Booksellers' Provident Institution. He was buried on the 17th of December at Norbiton Cemetery.

EDITIONS OF 'MARMION.'

Cambridge, U.S.A., Dec. 17, 1889.

I AM indebted to Mr. Michael Macmillan for a copy of the Athenæum for October 26th, 1889, in which he explains that in correcting the pointing of the first "stanza" of the second canto of 'Marmion' he was not borrowing from me without acknowledgment. Permit me in turn to say that I did not borrow the emendation from his Bombay edition published in January, 1885, which I have never seen. As he states, the preface to my edition is dated April 6th, 1885; but at that time the book was all in type with the exception of the title-page and preface. The accompanying note from the University Press here will show that work upon the book began "on Jan. 21, 1885." I first discovered the error in 'Marmion' while preparing the text for my edition in October, 1884. All the editions that I was able to collate, including the first (1808), agreed in putting a period at the end of the fifth line of the second canto, instead of the comma which Scott evidently intended to have there. Mr. Macmillan appears to have detected the corruption independently at about the same time, and he must have the credit, which I claimed for myself in the preface to my edition, of being the first to print the passage correctly.

I wonder whether he noted a similar mispointing in the thirty-third "stanza" ("Call you 'em stanzos? I might ask, with Jaques) of the same canto. All editions before mine, so far as I am aware, point thus (substantially):—

With speed their upward way they take,— Such speed as age and fear can make,—
And crossed themselves for terror's sake,
As hurrying, tottering on:
Even in the vesper's heavenly tone, &c.

But the colon (a period in the first edition) after "on" should certainly be a comma, as I have made it.

A corruption that appears for the first time, I believe, in Lockhart's edition of 1833, and is repeated in every reprint down to mine, is "They knew not how nor knew not where" ("and knew" in earlier editions), in the twenty-fourth "stanza" of canto second. Scott uses many archaisms, but never this old "double negative." Again, in the eighth "stanza" of canto fifth Lockhart and his followers have "For royal was his garb and mien," where Scott wrote "For royal were," &c. Lockhart is responsible for many other perversions as bad or worse. He professed to collate the early texts and the manuscripts of the poems with great care; but I have found that he rarely corrected an error in former editions, while he overlooked many new ones that his own printers made. On the whole he marred the text far more than he mended it. He was careless even in comparing the printed text with the original manuscripts. In not a few instances, both in 'Marmion' and 'The Lady of the Lake,' he gives readings as found only in the manuscripts which really occur in the first edition.

The archaisms to which I have referred above have proved stumbling-blocks to more than one editor. I have seen an edition of Shakespeare in which every instance of the obsolete vail (lower, or let fall) is printed veil, the difference being assumed to be one of spelling merely; and in the fourteenth stanza of the third canto of 'Marmion,' where the early editions have "And proudest princes vail their eyes," the recent ones all have veil.

Lockhart's and other "standard" editions of all the poems of Scott are more or less corrupt. In the second stanza of 'The Vision of Don Roderick,' for example, all editions except the earliest read, "Yes! such a strain, with all o'er-pouring measure," instead of o'erpowering; and in the fifty-seventh stanza they have "Far glance the light of sabres flashing bright," for "the lines of sabres." In 'The Bridal of Triermain' (ii. 3) we find, "Our peace [pace] in Virtue's toilsome way"; and in 'The Lord of the Isles' (vi. 28) the nonsensical "ye" for he in "To Cambuskenneth straight he pass." In 'Harold the Dauntless' a similar change in a single letter makes nonsense of a line in the "Song" in the first canto: "But worse, if [of] instant token," &c.

For other examples I must refer the reader to the prefaces and notes of my editions of 'The Lady of the Lake,' 'Marmion,' and 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel,' or the complete 'Poetical Works of Scott' published more recently. It is amazing that the text of a writer of the present century, and one so widely read and studied as Scott, should have become so corrupt; but most of the editors have been as careless as Lockhart was.

SIR HENRY YULE.

THE death of Sir Henry Yule has not come as a surprise to his many friends, among whom were counted a remarkable number of representative men in various walks of life. A naturally hardy and vigorous constitution, combined with a high sense of duty and of the value and manifold interests of life, had alone enabled him to fight so long and bravely against the prostrating effects of a wasting illness. He almost died in harness, for it is only a few months since he resigned his seat on the Council of India, the kindness and consideration of his colleagues, in their desire to retain his services, having enabled him to remain at his post much longer than he would otherwise have done. It was only on his resignation that he was made a K.C.S.I.—he is more familiar to us all as "Colonel Yule,"—but it is understood that this well-earned honour had been offered to him on previous occasions.

This is perhaps hardly the place or the time to analyze the qualities which made up a striking personality. Prominent among them were a chivalrous sense of honour and delicacy of feeling, with absolute moral fearlessness; and great simplicity, with its usual complements of a touching humility and unconsciousness of self. He was sternly just, he had a horror of insincerity, and was scathing in denunciation where he saw falsehood, or meanness, or moral cowardice; but he possessed a keen sense of humour, and appreciated it from others if it was free from cynicism or unkindness, for he had a warm and tender heart, and felt ready sympathy for real sorrow, though he had small patience for that which was unreal or conventional. These were at least some of the elements which the discipline of experience and self-culture had moulded into the true sterling man and valued friend.

We are, in this journal, more immediately concerned with his position in literature. It seems strange that with a first-rate memory and a fluent and cultivated style, and endowed besides with that far rarer gift, the literary insight, a perception of what is fine and true in literature, he should not only have passed il mezzo del cammin before commencing what we may fairly call a distinguished literary career, but should have owed this determination of his energies to, so to speak, an accident. Born in Scotland in 1820, in the days when Scottish families contributed largely to the Indian services, he, following his father's example, entered the Indian army, going out in the Bengal engineers. (We may, perhaps, mention that both his brothers distinguished themselves in India—Sir George, an able and popular civilian, and in early life a famous shikari, and Robert, who fell at the head of the 9th Lancers, in one of the battles of the Mutiny.) Henry Yule saw some active service in the Punjab campaign, but was chiefly employed on public works, where he attracted the attention, and became the friend, confidant, and adviser, of Lord Dalhousie—if that masterful ruler could be said to have an adviser. The same confidence, in even fuller measure, was bestowed by Lord Canning, but on his retirement and death Col. Yule, obliged to leave India by the health of his wife, settled, on her account, at Palermo, where previous studies and tastes, combined with the (comparative) neighbourhood of the Italian libraries, induced him to undertake the great work with which his name will always be chiefly associated, the edition of Marco Polo's travels. This work, a storehouse of curious and profound research, to which, to say nothing of its interest for the ordinary reader, hundreds of students of the by-paths of mediæval Asiatic lore must have been indebted, occupied its author for several years. It entailed vast correspondence, much of it with out-of-the-way regions, and many months often elapsed between a question and the answer; but the correspondence developed friendships sometimes of lasting interest, and a reputation beyond rivalry was established by the author in this special field of scholarship. Out of the fulness of his reading on kindred subjects came the very curious 'Hobson-Jobson,' or glossary of Anglo-Indian terms, a mine of interesting social, historical, and philological jottings, which has by no means had the popularity it deserves. We should have mentioned that while a subaltern he wrote a volume on fortification, which we believe was long a text-book; and before leaving India he published the narrative of a journey to Ava as secretary to Col. (afterwards Sir Arthur) Phayre's mission, which was handsomely illustrated by his own pencil, in the use of which he was no mean proficient. The Hakluyt Society was indebted to him for other works on Asiatic subjects, and if we may judge by the great rarity and price of his earlier volumes, 'Cathay and the Way Thither,' they are among the most highly prized of that valuable series. But his services to literature are not to be estimated only by his larger works. As President of the Hakluyt Society, an office he only resigned the other day, the amount of valuable help in suggestions and criticism bestowed on the work of others was very great; very great, too, was the amount of assistance he gave, ungrudgingly, to appeals for literary help from all quarters; he could not resist them, for his feeling for literature embraced the needs of its workers. Genius in his case certainly included, but as certainly was far from merely consisting in, a boundless patience for details.

His work was thorough; if he wrote a preface for the book of another, it might chance to be the most valuable part of the book—and we mean by this no disparagement of the books so prefaced. As a comparative geographer, indeed, it will be admitted that he stood in England not in the front rank merely, but at the very head of that rank. We should be disposed to class him in this regard, mutatis mutandis, with his distinguished friend Baron von Richthofen. But his genius lay by no means exclusively in that direction. Many charming as well as valuable papers lie scattered in various journals, our own among the number. Some biographical sketches from his pen—we recall his notices of Rennell the geographer, of a brother officer, Sir W. E. Baker, of Capt. Gill—are models, in style and feeling, of what such notices ought to be. He had considerable readiness, too, in verse-making. Only a few weeks before his death he had begun to put together some selections from his more fugitive writings, which, with characteristic love for artistic completeness, he was endeavouring to render perfect by notes, and even illustrations. We have reason to hope that, though his work was far from complete, we may nevertheless, at no distant date, see in print some interesting portions of it. It may be added that only a few days ago the French Institute, knowing his critical condition, paid him the graceful compliment of electing him a Corresponding Member.

THE LONDON CHURCH REGISTERS.

MR. HALLEN writes to us, urging the need of more support to his transcript of the Registers of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate. By a slip of the pen we spoke of them last week as those of St. Botolph's, Billingsgate.

"I trust your readers will give me the support I need. The value of a complete set of transcripts of London church registers is apparent. The production is of necessity slow, but every part printed is a substantial gain to the public. As works of reference librarians should recognize the propriety of procuring them. I appeal earnestly for more subscribers. The expenses are not at present met, and the work must soon be discontinued unless I receive practical sympathy. Fifty more subscribers would enable me to proceed without loss. A greater number would produce more work. I shall be happy to give information, and will send a prospectus on application to the Parsonage, Allon, N.E."

Mr. Foster tells us that the name of John Vawdrey, occurring in Mr. Hallen's register, also occurs in the 'Admissions to Gray's Inn,' p. 138.

THE "DETACHMENT" OF BROWNING.

MR. BROWNING had the willingness to make many acquaintances, and the art to make all his acquaintances feel like friends. Never, perhaps, was so great a poet so accessible a man. The generation producing a bard who is said to have shut himself up in a bathing-machine on the beach at Freshwater rather than encounter an acquaintance produced also this man who sought society, had a welcome for everybody, and did not shrink from even that unlovely contact with his fellow creatures which falls to the lot of the omnibus "fare." Mr. Browning allowed no limitations in his friendships and his acquaintanceships. His popularity in the great world is notorious. There were silly whispers that he never looked so happy as when he sat between two duchesses. The insinuation went singularly wide of the mark. Mr. Furnivall, I see, mentions a recent occasion on which Mr. Browning went out to tea with an artisan; and the incident is worth mentioning if only as an illustration of his sense of comradeship with all sorts of persons. If that artisan had a wife, then be sure no Belgravian dame was ever paid court to with more assiduity than she. When his son's first pictures, before going to Burlington House, were on view at an unoccupied house lent for this occasion, and Mr. Browning played the showman with all a fond father's enthusiasm, the poet's cook was tempted by curiosity to look in late, when she made sure he would be gone for the day; she was received with as cordial a welcome and warm a grasp of the hand as any visitor who had been there. "I'm only Martha, sir," "And why not, Martha? I am very glad to see you." But apart from any episode with enough of the freakish in it to give it salt of its own, Browning ever showed himself the very soul of cordiality to all comers, even the most casual; and how he managed to get through all his social engagements, almost without a single "No" to an invitation, or a single failure to live up to his "Yes," shows that his activities of mind were at least equalled by those of his body, and says something, too, for the consideration shown him by the "troops of friends" who recognized the willing horse and would not beat it. The very fact that he came wherever he was asked put his acquaintance on their honour not to ask him unless they thought they could offer him some return for the pleasure his presence conferred—some good music or good company.

Thus it was that the duchesses, in the natural course of things, had more than their fair share. He exacted nothing from them, not even a pretence of a knowledge of his poetry; and a frank, or, as more often happened, an unintentional betrayal of ignorance of it brought on the culprit no rebuke or rebuff. "I don't know whether you care for music, Mr. Browning, but if you do, my mother, Lady J—, is having some on Monday." I watched rather nervously to see what effect this speech of a lovely girl I had just introduced to him would have. "Why, my dear," said he, in his kindest manner, "I care for nothing else."

Those who expected Browning to talk "high poetry" were the only ones whom he must have disappointed. It was not that he was unwilling to chat about himself, and even about the characteristics of his work; but it was only chatter, not any serious revelation of himself such as he made in print. The first time I met him was when there was also present the Chinese Minister, in whose suite was a gentleman who brought with him the vague fame of being an author in his own land. Browning had been introduced to him as a brother author. "I asked him," said Browning, "what sort of work his was; and he replied that he composed enigmas. A brother, indeed!" Very simple explanations of his own forthcoming volumes he was always ready to offer, with a ring of almost indifference about them. "For my own book," he wrote to me on the 10th of April, 1879,

"all I know is that it will appear at the end of the month, on the 28th, I fancy. An idyl, as you know, is a succinct little story complete in itself; not necessarily concerning pastoral matters, by any means, though from the prevalence of such topics in the idyls of Theocritus, such is the general notion. These of mine are called 'Dramatic' because the story is told by some actor in it, not by the poet himself. The subjects are sombre enough, with the exception of the Greek one; and are all in rhymed verse; this last in a metre of my own."

In talk he was equally simple, didactic even, if the occasion arose; always as plain in his speech as he was sometimes difficult in his literature. At a tea-table one afternoon, when 'Theophrastus Such' had just appeared, Browning agreed not only that the style was debilitated and diluted, but that the motives were trivial and the thoughts cast in a mould smaller than George Eliot's ought to be. "Yes, the thoughts are small," he said. Then, seeing a group of girls, Browning began to explain how Theophrastus was a little philosopher fond of definitions of typical persons—definitions in which the word such was constantly used in translation. "For example," he said, turning to a girl who had just before greeted him with a compliment on his looks, "Theophrastus would say, 'A flatterer is such an one as, meeting an old man of seventy, congratulates him on looking young and well.'"

To listen to him talking one would sometimes suppose that he "cared for nothing else" but painting. His intimacy with Italian art, in all its schools and periods, was marvellous, and his speech about it poured forth without hesitancy at even names of obscure painters unfamiliar to any of his hearers. His long and close friendship with Sir Frederic Leighton survived even the Academy's rejection of one of Mr. Barrett Browning's pieces of sculpture, and that is the most striking testimony to its strength. Mr. Browning's heart was in his son's success to a degree which made him impatient of the apparent indifference of officialism; and great was his anxiety, almost his impatience, after "sending-in day," until he knew whether and where his son's canvases were hung. To praise the son was the best compliment which anybody could pay the father; and that friend who bought several of those large canvases not only acquired painter-like pictures invested with a singular accessory interest of pedigree, but must also have come near to the heart of the poet. His memory of the modern English pictures he so sedulously examined year by year was minute; and he watched for new names, and was interested in the personality of each young painter of promise. I remember his chagrin on making the discovery that at a dinner party he had sat by the painter of 'The Roll Call' without knowing it; and in writing of some illustrations of hers in a volume of poems he says:—

"The illustrations are charming; and increase my regret, as I mentioned to you that, on the only occasion when I was privileged to find myself by the side of their author, my ignorance of that piece of good fortune effectually prevented me from profiting by it, and paying that tribute of admiration which I can hardly relieve by a few scribbled words."

In due course they met; and it turned out, as a curious coincidence, that Lady Butler's great-grandfather in his will bequeathed a portion of his property, in the event (which did not take place) of his only son's dying without issue, to Mr. Kenyon and to Mr. Barrett as his nearest other kinsmen. That nearness was even at that time so far removed as to render indefinable the relationship between the greatest woman poet and the most famous woman painter of England.

Considering how few papers give a serious attention to literature, and how still fewer gave it ten years ago, Mr. Browning had not much reason to speak highly of contemporary criticism. I sent him in 1878 a book of poetry which had won my heart before I knew its author. It had hardly attracted notice on its first appearance, though its contents have since become well known in anthologies. Mr. Browning wrote:—

"How surprised and gratified I am by the present of the book, and with what real pleasure I have been reading all of it this morning! I only knew certain extracts from some review, I forget where: but from these—accompanied, too, as I seem to remember, with the most niggardly of praises—I conceived the desire to read the rest for myself some day. I have been struck by the beauty of many of these poems even beyond what the indifference of the reviewer should have prepared me for."

So lately as when this winter was on us, I forwarded to Mr. Browning some pages of a magazine, not likely otherwise to meet his eye, containing some prose and a poem which had kindled me to enthusiasm, and the author of which I knew to be a young man somewhat entangled in the troubles of the world. From Asolo the poet wrote:—

"Both the verse and the prose are, indeed, remarkable, even without the particulars concerning their author. It is altogether extraordinary that a young man so naturally gifted should need incitement to do justice to his conspicuous ability by endeavouring to emerge from so uncongenial a course of life as that which you describe. Pray assure him, if he cares to know it, that I shall have a confident expectation of his success if he will but extricate himself—as by a strenuous effort he may—from all that must now embarrass him terribly: he can have no better adviser and helper than yourself, except himself if he will listen to the inner voice. Pray offer my best thanks to [your wife] for her remembrance of me—who am, as she desires, profiting by the quiet and beauty of this place—whence, however, I shall soon depart for Venice on my way homeward."

For the sake of these final words, I quote this last sentence, irrelevant otherwise.

Those who, like myself, had not the privilege of Browning's friendship, used to wonder sometimes how he comported himself towards his intimates who was so brimming with frankness and cordiality for his chance acquaintances. From some of these friends I have heard a strange, yet, I think, a true tale; for they say that you got to that common point of frankness and cordiality very quickly, but only so far, and never beyond. To reach the real inner Browning his close friends no less than his casual acquaintances had to go to his books. He reserved nothing from those who knew him little to show in secret to those who knew him well. Nay, he had no reserves from those who knew him not at all. Peradventure it will be found when all the riches of his letters are made manifest, that there are no franker bits of autobiography in any of them than are to be found in letters addressed to entire strangers. In a little paper with which I happened to be connected there was an allusion to Browning's obscurity which drew from one of his unknown admirers a note he had received from the poet. "I have no recollection of the particular person to whom I addressed these words, but they are undoubtedly mine," wrote Mr. Browning when I asked his permission to print them, and they have been often since quoted:—

"I can have little doubt that my writing has been in the main too hard for many I should have been pleased to communicate with; but I never designedly tried to puzzle people, as some of my critics have supposed. On the other hand, I never pretended to offer such literature as should be a substitute for a cigar or game at dominoes to an idle man. So, perhaps, on the whole I get my deserts and something over—not a crowd, but a few I value more."

This last sentence brings me naturally to the single word which sums up the characteristics of Robert Browning as they struck the outsider—his detachment. This word of the spiritual writers supplies the key-note to all his acts, even the least, from the moment that he lost his wife, all through that quarter of a century of widowhood. In a generation which has written lightly of conjugal fidelity and has established a divorce court, Browning stood out to all men as the husband of his wife, living and dead, waiting through long years of a loneliness alien to his rich nature for the moment of reunion,—

"What! and is it you again?" quoth I.

"I again; what else did you expect?" quoth she.

In that memory and in that expectation he had his being, and the world might go its way, where he was only an actor. It was this detachment which, paradoxically, made him so friendly to all—he had not the interest for great preferences. It made him indifferent to the inconveniences of living away in Warwick Crescent; indifferent to the atmosphere of "cheap jewellery and servants' underclothing" pervading the Edgware Road, his main thoroughfare to civilization and the Athenæum; and indifferent to the involuntary smile which followed the announcement that the apotheosis of Bayswater was found in De Vere Gardens. The obscurity of the one place and the pretentious name of the other were equally matters of indifference to him. I have seen him standing in the rain, amid the mud of Kensington, to take an omnibus into town, while one full vehicle after the other passed him by with no room for him. Yet this devoted diner-out, this fêted man of fashion, as the world thought, made no movement of impatience amid petty (and to me pathetic) inconveniences—they did not vex this poet's mind. It was this detachment, in truth, which made him so tolerant, which left him unmoved by an individual or a public ignorance or neglect of him, and which, above all, made him equally indifferent to private appreciation or public praise. It found expression even in that "How very gratifying!" of his last breath; for not by that word would the master of words have expressed vital or intimate joy in the success of 'Asolando.' He was thinking, even then, that by their "sprightly port" they two would "make the ghosts gaze," and what else mattered? The exceptions to this noble and affecting rule of detachment are readily found: the anxious care for his son's success as a painter—her son's—and the fine frenzy of the lines on FitzGerald. "Poet and Saint," exclaims Abraham Cowley,

The hard and rarest union which can be,
Next that of Godhead and humanity.

Poet and Husband—nay, rather, Husband and Poet, is the legend left upon our hearts by the great man who has gone. W. M.

Literary Gossip.

At the time of his lamented decease the Bishop of Durham had almost completed a new edition, in two volumes, of the Epistle of St. Clement, in which the supplementary volume, issued after the discovery of the Constantinople MS., will be incorporated with the original volume, the whole work being revised and brought up to date, and containing a photographic facsimile of the said MS. At the same time he had been engaged upon a small edition with brief notes of the Apostolic Fathers; and for over a year he had been toiling at the second imprint of his elaborate edition of the Ignatian Epistles, which appeared just before his death. No wonder he overtasked himself.

News has been received from Mr. Louis Stevenson, dated Equator Town, Apamania, in the second week of October, the last previous advices having been of the 25th of July. Mr. Stevenson and his family have been staying for several weeks on that little-visited island of the Gilbert group, awaiting the chance of a passage to Sydney, where they hoped to arrive about the new year. Besides the narrative of his eighteen months' cruise in the byways of the Pacific, which we may look for in the course of the present year, Mr. Stevenson is preparing, in collaboration with his stepson, Mr. Lloyd Osborne, a volume of stories to be called 'South Sea Yarns,' one of which, 'The Pearl Fisher,' is to appear, in the first instance, in the columns of an American journal.

LORD AUGUSTUS LOFTUS, who is at Cannes, is engaged in writing his recollections.

THERE are rumours afloat again about the sale of the Althorp Library. These are but a repetition of what we have heard for years. At any rate, we can safely say nothing has been as yet settled.

It having been stated that the republication in Merry England of Mr. Gladstone's review of 'Ellen Middleton' was unauthorized, the editor of the magazine sent to Mr. Gladstone his postcard of permission, and has received the following reply:—

"Hawarden, Jan. 1, 1890.

"DEAR MR. MEYNELL,—I have searched twice, as well as I could, under an extraordinary pressure of public and private engagements, for your letter to which I replied on Dec. 12, 1888, in order that I might thoroughly understand what has puzzled me so much. From some cause I cannot comprehend, the letters of that month are not forthcoming at this time, and I must let the search stand over. But the words you have produced contribute an unequivocal, though apparently somewhat reluctant consent to what you had asked. What I do not think I could have agreed to, had I understood it, is the republication of my paper in a periodical devoted, however honourably and ably, to the interests of a particular religious body, as such a proceeding gives rise to unfounded inferences. In the only intimation which proceeded from me to the press I stated my belief that you were incapable of wilful wrong; and while I hope further to probe the case, I must now, in fairness, add that the presumptions are on your side; and that your assertion that you explicitly stated the character of your request must outweigh the mere absence of recollection on my part. In these circumstances I cannot think of offering any objection to your publishing the remainder of the paper in your next number, or your giving publicity to this letter; and if I have troubled you in error I much regret it. Yours faithfully,
"W. E. GLADSTONE."

The magazine containing the article has now reached a third edition.

MR. STANLEY LANE-POOLE has written a memoir of Sir Richard Church—well known for his services in the military operations in the Mediterranean in the early part of this century, and particularly in the Greek war of independence—with the help of letters and papers belonging to his nephew, Canon Church, of Wells. It will appear in the January and following numbers of the English Historical Review.

MR. MEADOWS COWPER is printing the 'Registers of the Parish of St. Alphage, Canterbury, from 1558 to 1800.' This forms the third of the Canterbury parish registers which Mr. Cowper has copied and edited. The register is remarkable for the large proportion of names of French and Flemish origin, and affords much material for the history of the Protestant refugees who settled at Canterbury during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Apart from the foreign element, it is interesting on account of the numerous entries which illustrate the history of notable East Kent families. The volume contains the wills of Robert Gosebourne (with plate of his brass effigy and arms), of Thomas Prude (with plate of the brass affixed to the pillar erected by him), and of John Caxton (brother of William Caxton). The register of St. Mary Magdalene will form the fourth and that of St. George's the fifth of the series.

THE new year adds another name to the list of London publishers, that of Mr. William Heinemann, not altogether unknown to literary men owing to his connexion for the last ten years with the business of Trübner & Co., now (as we have said before) merged with two other houses in the firm of Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.

AN American Jewish literary society proposed last year a prize for the best biography of the late Dr. Zunz. The prize has just been awarded to Mr. S. Schechter, author of an able article 'On the Study of the Talmud,' which appeared in the Westminster Review, 1885.

FROM January 1st Messrs. Macmillan will publish 'Charles Kingsley: Letters and Memories of his Life,' which has hitherto borne the imprint of Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co. They have also become the publishers of 'All Saints' Day, and other Sermons,' and 'True Words for Brave Men,' so that now all Charles Kingsley's writings are included in their catalogue.

DR. J. K. INGRAM's 'History of Political Economy,' which was reviewed in this journal towards the end of 1888, is just about to appear in a German version. The translator is Herr E. Roschlau, of Berlin.

THE death is announced of Mr. Percy Greg, the son of W. R. Greg, the author of 'Errant,' 'Across the Zodiac,' 'Sanguelac,' and other novels. Mr. Greg was a fiery champion of the Southern Confederacy, and published a history of the United States "to the reconstruction of the Union," a phrase which greatly offended American journalists. Miss Constance Naden, the author of two volumes of verse, the first of which, 'Songs and Sonnets of Spring Time,' appeared in 1881, died last week at the age of thirty-one.

MR. S. ARTHUR STRONG, of St. John's College, Cambridge, is preparing an edition of a Hebrew treatise on the religious ceremonies, feast and fast days, &c., of Malabar, with an English translation and notes, from the MS. in the Jews' College, London. This treatise was composed between the years 1768 and 1795 by a native Jew.

BERNHARD WYSS, the editor since 1863 of the well-known serial collection of Swiss dialect tales of the different cantons published under the title of "Schwyzer - ditsch," and the author of several of them, died at Soleure on Christmas Day at the age of fifty-six. He was one of the first authorities on Swiss folk-lore, and a leading contributor to the 'Schweizerisches Idiotikon,' the encyclopedic Swiss-German dictionary now in course of publication.

UNDER the title 'Sermons preached in the East,' Dean Butcher is about to publish a volume of sermons through Mr. Elliot Stock. They have been preached at Shanghai, Cairo, Hongkong, and other places.

THE Goethe-Archiv of Weimar promises to become the most interesting of the kind in Germany. Besides the numerous additions it received last summer from the heirs of Schiller and Herder, Herr Justizrat Reinhold, a descendant of Wieland and of the famous philosopher Reinhold of Jena, has just presented to it a collection of letters chiefly written by his two grandfathers, by Schiller, Kant, Fichte, Jean Paul, and other celebrities.

LITERARY activity seems to be reviving in Poland. Recently we announced the projected gathering of Polish historians about the beginning of the present year, and now we are able to say that the Academy of Sciences at Cracow has decided on issuing a "Library of Polish Writers," which will consist of reprints of old and scarce Polish publications.

It seems that the last work (or one of the latest) published by the lamented Dr. Mackay was a novel in two volumes, which was issued by Messrs. Ward & Downey for him anonymously in 1888 under the title of 'The Twin Soul.'

MR. WILLIAM BLACK'S promised novel 'The New Prince Fortunatus' will be out on the 13th inst.

SCIENCE

BOTANICAL LITERATURE.

Useful Native Plants of Australia, including Tasmania. By J. H. Maiden. (Trübner & Co.)—The city of Sydney has had the foresight to establish a technological, industrial, and sanitary museum. If such institutions are requisite in the countries of the Old World, which have enjoyed lengthened experience and accumulated stores of material and information, they are even more so in newly-established colonies on the other side of the globe, where the conditions are different and where the material resources are so diverse from those of European countries. To judge from the work of which Mr. Maiden is the author, the premier colony of Australia has done wisely in appointing him as curator and secretary of the museum. We do not, indeed, find much that is either original or new in Mr. Maiden's volume, but we do find evidence of comprehensive knowledge, orderly method, and lucidity of presentation. The foundations of Australian botany were laid by Robert Brown, Allan Cunningham, and a few others. The superstructure has been chiefly the work of Baron von Mueller and the late Mr. Bentham. Thanks to these botanists, we are in possession of an Australian flora complete up to the date of compilation, and disposed according to one plan. There is no such flora of Europe or North America. Sir Joseph Hooker's flora of British India is still in progress. The floras of Africa, tropical and south of the tropic, are, most unfortunately, at a standstill. Australia alone of the large continental areas can boast of a complete record of her vegetable inhabitants. Additions and modifications, of course, will have to be made as new districts are opened up and new materials come to hand, but these will in no wise impair the value of the cardinal work to which we have alluded. Without it such a book as that which now calls for notice could not have been produced. Baron von Mueller has not confined himself to pure botany. In his long and laborious career he has ever kept practical utility in view. He has not only discovered, illustrated, and chronicled the useful plants of Australia, but he has conducted and instituted researches having for their object the discovery of the causes which render them useful, and the means of turning them to the best practical account. Hence it follows that Mr. Maiden's volume is fully as much indebted to Baron von Mueller's economic as to his purely botanical researches, nor does Mr. Maiden in any degree ignore his obligations. The subjects treated of in the present volume are arranged under the headings of Food-Products, Forage-Plants, Drugs, Gums, Resins, Oils, Perfumes, Dyes, Tans, Timbers, Fibres, and Miscellaneous. The plants mentioned under each heading are grouped alphabetically and with uniform reference to the flora of Australia and to the census lists subsequently issued. A brief account of their properties and uses is supplied, with appropriate references and extracts from the literature of the subject where necessary. The geographical distribution is sketched, and the vernacular and colonial names given. We are assured that great pains have been taken to secure correctness in these points, but it is no disparagement to the author to say that accuracy in these particulars is unattainable. Popular names of this character are the terror of botanists, the despair of technologists. The names given to the kinds of Eucalyptus in this volume afford ample evidence of this. Even in the case of the very valuable timber known as jarrah (Eucalyptus marginata), there is confusion with a similar product known as Yarra, derived from E. rostrata. The compiler has avoided merely botanical detail, as unnecessary for his purposes, and it is, as has been said, well provided for elsewhere. Nevertheless we regret the omission of any citation of illustrative figures. Again, although the necessity for an arbitrary arrangement of subjects and an alphabetical sequence of the names of plants mentioned is, undeniable, the researches of the student would have been facilitated by the addition of the names, at any rate those of the genera, arranged according to the natural orders to which they belong. Australia so far seems deficient in plants available for human food, though doubtless by appropriate cultivation many plants unpromising in their wild state might be rendered available. It is one of the functions of colonial botanic gardens and experimental stations to make trials of this kind. Horticultural societies, too, in place of imitating European practices and devoting all their attention to plants grown in the old country, would do wisely to assign a large portion of their resources and energies to the development of the native plants, remembering that few things retain any permanent commercial value until they can be produced regularly by the art of the cultivator. To show that the volume before us is not a mere technical catalogue, we may add that the compiler indulges now and then in an excursus which forms agreeable reading, not always devoid, as the subjoined extract proves, of human interest:—

"The cones [of the bunya bunya, Araucaria bidwillii] shed their seeds, which are two to two and a half inches long by three-quarters of an inch broad; they are sweet before being perfectly ripe, and after that resemble roasted chestnuts in taste. They are plentiful once in three years, and when the ripening season arrives, which is generally in the month of January, the aborigines assemble in large numbers from a great distance around, and feast upon them. Each tribe has its own particular set of trees, and of these each family has a certain number allotted, which are handed down from generation to generation with great exactness. The bunya is remarkable as being the only hereditary property which any of the aborigines are known to possess, and it is, therefore, protected by law. The food seems to have a fattening effect on the aborigines, and they eat large quantities of it after roasting it at the fire. Contrary to their usual habits, they sometimes store up the bunya nuts, hiding them in a water-hole for a month or two. Here they germinate, and become offensive to a white man's palate, but they are considered by the blacks to have acquired an improved flavour' (Hill). Dr. Bennett mentions that after an indulgence in this exclusively vegetable diet they have an irresistible longing for flesh, and that in order to satisfy that craving, cannibalism used to be frequent amongst those tribes who were visitors (for the purpose of eating the bunya bunya seeds) of those tribes in whose territory the bunya bunya tree grows."

Flower-land: an Introduction to Botany. By Robert Fisher, M.A. (Bemrose & Sons.)—This is an expansion of a previously published volume. It is intended for the instruction of children, and is well done in substance, though we feel doubtful whether the method will not prove irksome. We scarcely think children will appreciate such a passage as this:—

"Now, I will take a buttercup, a single flower, and hold it by the stalk upright. What a pretty yellow cup it is! As yellow as butter, is it not? So children hold it to each other's chins, and if it shines they say that they are fond of butter. Shall I try you?"

Children will indulge in this sort of language among themselves, but they do not appreciate it when addressed to them by their elders. For all that, the book may be recommended to those whom it may concern.

SOCIETIES.

GEOLOGICAL.—Dec. 18.—Dr. W. T. Blanford, President, in the chair.—Messrs. C. Aburrow, H. A. Allen, T. Bennett, and R. L. Tapscott were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On the Occurrence of the Genus Girvanella, and Remarks on Oolitic Structure,' by Mr. E. Wethered, and 'On the Relation of the Westleton Beds or "Pebble Sands" of Suffolk to those of Norfolk, and on their Extension inland, with some Observations on the Period of the Final Elevation and Denudation of the Weald and of the Thames Valley,' Part II, by Prof. J. Prestwich.

NUMISMATIC.—Dec. 19.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—The following Members were elected: Mrs. Buckley, Messrs. H. Garside, G. A. Hobson, and G. Hodges.—Dr. B. V. Head exhibited, on behalf of Mr. W. H. Penney, a new and unpublished tetradrachm of one of the early kings of Parthia; obv. bust of king to left, wearing royal diadem, the string of which forms a large loop behind the head, and a winged tiara somewhat resembling those worn by some of the later Sassanian kings; rev. ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΑΡΕΑΚΟΥ, Nike standing to the right, holding a palm in her extended right hand, and a sceptre terminating in a star over her left shoulder. In field r. a monogram composed of the letters ATT (?); weight 245 grs. Dr. Head remarked concerning this curious and unique coin that the king's portrait bore a strong resemblance to that on the drachms of Phraohapates I. (Arsaces IV.), B.C. 196-181, but that the headdress and the reverse type were entirely new to the Parthian series. From the simplicity of the title, as compared with the pompous inscriptions on all but the very earliest Parthian coins, he drew the inference that it was minted in some Greek city, the name of which was concealed in the monogram.—Prof. Gardner concurred in the main with Dr. Head, though he was inclined to attribute the coin to a rather later date, probably to the reign of Mithridates I., B.C. 174-136.—Dr. Evans exhibited a small silver coin of Cunobeline, lately discovered at or near Colchester; obv. CVN[O], central device consisting of two ivy or oak leaves, with two berries or acorns attached to each; the leaves are flanked on either side by a crescent; rev. CAM, horseman galloping to the right, armed with short sword and shield.—Mr. H. Montagu exhibited a selection from a hoard of gold coins found at Chesham, Bucks, about a year ago. The treasure consisted of some two hundred coins, including a noble of Edward IV., crowns of Henry VIII., half sovereigns of Elizabeth, unites, half unites, laurels, half and quarter laurels, and crowns of James I., and tower unites, half tower unites, and tower crowns of Charles I. Mr. Montagu was unable to specify the exact numbers of each denomination, as the hoard was dispersed before being submitted to the British Museum. He thought that the date of its concealment may have been shortly before A.D. 1640, when no Parliament was sitting, and when illegal exactions were being levied on the people.—Mr. E. A. Abraham communicated a paper on the coinage of British Guiana.

LINNEAN.—Dec. 19.—Mr. J. G. Baker, V.P., in the chair.—Messrs. S. A. Moore and J. J. Walker were admitted, and Messrs. C. Curtis and P. Groom were elected Fellows.—Mr. W. H. Jackson exhibited and gave an account of an electric centipede (Geophilus electricus), detailing the circumstances under which he had found it at Oxford, and the result of experiments which he had made with a view of determining the nature and properties of a luminous fluid secreted by it. This he found could be separated from the insect, and could be communicated by it to every portion of its integument.—A discussion followed, in which Mr. Breeze, Mr. A. W. Bennett, Prof. Stewart, Mr. A. D. Michael, Dr. Collingwood, Mr. Christy, and Mr. J. E. Harting took part. The last-named speaker pointed out that the observations made by Mr. W. H. Jackson on this centipede had been long ago anticipated by Dr. Macartney in an elaborate paper on luminous insects, published in Philosophical Transactions for 1810 (vol. c., p. 277).—A paper was read by Mr. T. Johnson on Dictyopteris, in which he gave an elaborate account of the life-history of this brown seaweed, with remarks on the systematic position of the Dictyotaceæ.—Dr. Scott, Mr. G. Murray, and Mr. A. W. Bennett criticized various portions of the paper, and acknowledged the important scientific bearing of the facts which had been brought out by Mr. Johnson's careful and minute researches.—In the absence of the author, Mr. W. P. Sladen detailed the more important portions of a paper by the Rev. J. Gulick 'On Intensive Segregation and Divergent Evolution in Land Mollusca,' a paper which might be regarded as a continuation and amplification of the views which the same author had expressed in a former paper, published in the Society's Journal last year (vol. xx., 'Zoology,' pp. 189-274).

MICROSCOPICAL.—Dec. 11.—Rev. Dr. Dallinger, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. E. M. Nelson read a short paper descriptive of a new semi-apochromatic objective which he exhibited.—Mr. C. Rousselet exhibited a small tank for rotifers which could be readily moved about in such a way as to render an examination of the contents very simple, so that any desired specimens could be easily picked out. The lens used was a Zeiss's No. 6 Steinheil, the focussing being done by rackwork.—Mr. Crisp called attention to a number of stereoscopic photomicrographs of embryos by Prof. Fol. They afforded a conclusive answer to the question brought forward at the October meeting as to whether stereoscopic photomicrographic slides had been produced before that time. Mr. Crisp also read some extracts from a paper by Mr. Gill, which he was sorry to say was only handed in at the conclusion of their last meeting, and which seemed almost conclusively to prove that the "markings" on certain diatoms were apertures.—Mr. A. W. Bennett gave a résumé of his paper 'On the Freshwater Algae and Schizophyceæ of Hampshire and Devon.' It was the result of collections made during his summer holiday in the New Forest and on Dartmoor, many of the species being not only interesting, but also new to science.—Mr. Crisp reminded the Fellows present that at the last meeting mention was made of a new objective with an aperture of 1.60, the price of which was said to be 400l. Some doubt was expressed at the time as to whether the account was true, but since then several communications about it had been received. A letter from Prof. Abbe describing the principles of its construction was read. Letters were also read from Dr. van Heurck describing the performance of the lens, and enclosing a series of remarkable photomicrographs of diatoms taken with it, with magnifying powers of 10,000 and 15,000 diameters.

CHEMICAL.—Dec. 19.—Dr. W. J. Russell, President, in the chair.—Messrs. W. F. Butcher, C. F. Baker, A. L. MacLeroy, and F. Quincké were formally admitted Fellows.—The following papers were read: 'Frangulin,' by Prof. T. E. Thorpe and Mr. H. H. Robinson; 'Arabinon, the Saccharon of Arabinose,' by Mr. C. O. Sullivan; 'On the Identity of Cerebrose and Galactose,' by Mr. H. T. Brown and Dr. G. H. Morris; and 'The Action of Chloroform and Alcoholic Potash on Hydrazines,' Part III., by Dr. S. Ruhemann.

MR. TOZER's book, 'The Islands of the Ægean,' which will shortly be published by the Clarendon Press, will contain accounts of eighteen of the principal islands of that sea, including Crete, Santorin, Patmos, and Samothrace.

THE planet Mercury is at greatest eastern elongation from the sun on the morning of the 14th inst., and will be visible to the naked eye after sunset in the constellation Capricornus. Venus will not be visible in the evening until the spring, and Mars does not rise until after midnight. Jupiter is not above the horizon during any part of the night, but Saturn is in the constellation Leo, and rises between 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening.

THE Misses Day, daughters of the late Dr. Francis Day, C.I.E., have presented to the Cheltenham Public Library the whole of his library that is devoted to natural history. The collection of works relating to fish is peculiarly valuable.

Old Cottage and Domestic Architecture in South-West Surrey, and Notes on the Early History of the Division. By Ralph Nevill, F.S.A., F.R.I.B.A. (Guildford, Billing & Sons)

It was a good thought of Mr. Nevill to employ the leisure which a country practice left him in seeking out, recording, and drawing the relics which time has spared of the humble architecture of his neighbourhood. We say the "humble" architecture because, though the towns of Guildford and Godalming contain some houses of the better sort, these are well known, and the like of them known in other places, whereas the interest of Mr. Nevill's book lies in what he has to tell us of the cottages and small country houses scattered about in out-of-the-way places, and often so obscured by modern additions and disfigurements that the interest of them would scarcely be discovered without the aid of a guide who knows the neighbourhood well.

In spite of a little trade in some places, and of its nearness to London, Surrey was of old a poor county. Nothing shows this more strongly than the character of the old churches as they were even thirty years ago. Small, generally of early date, and without architectural pretension, they showed little of the continual change and growth which tell of progress and general prosperity in a parish. They were full of interest and most picturesque. Now, alas! the plague of "restoration" has passed over them. In no county have its ravages been worse; the simple buildings were more easily harmed than those of more decided architectural character, and have in many cases been brought down to the vulgar commonplace.

Mr. Nevill's introductory chapter contains some good teaching not very well put. Indeed, in commending the book we are forced to find fault with its literary style. It savours too much of the second set of initials which follow the author's name on the title-page. Take, for example, the first sentence of the second chapter: "The date of the greater part of the cottages in this district is sixteenth century, and especially its latter half and the first half of the seventeenth century." This is a fair sample, and there is not any doubt as to what it means. But now and then the writer gets quite beyond us, as when he tells us on p. 90 that there is a legendary staircase at Gomshall. What is a legendary staircase? We are also at a loss, on p. 67, about a certain "circumscribing line" which "runs round every two quatrefoils," and the woodcut to which we look for help does not seem to give any.

After the introduction, eight short chapters follow, which treat of the date, style, and plan, and the various details of construction and decoration of the buildings. Mr. Nevill writes chiefly as an architect, and sometimes sees subject for "crib" where we rather see examples of what to avoid. If this fancy has caused him to multiply illustrations we are glad he has fallen into it, for the result is a capital picture of the homes of Englishmen, from the peasantry up to the smaller gentry, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The plans in chap. iii. are most interesting, and the various details which follow scarcely less so.

The second part of the book is called "Topographical and Plates," and consists of a very fully illustrated catalogue of the old houses in the district so far as the author knows them. Old houses sometimes hide themselves so cunningly that it is scarcely likely none has been missed, but we feel sure that the most important are in the list, and of these very many sketches are given. Mr. Nevill's drawing is dry but clear, and, what in a work of this kind matters most, it is accurate. The subjects are, like their neighbours the churches, not ambitious works. A "restorer" would find very little of what he would call architecture in them. They cannot be compared with the contemporary houses in the clothing districts of Yorkshire or Lancashire, or with those of Gloucestershire, upon the illustration of which Mr. Nevill is now engaged. The materials generally are poor, and there is not much detail. Mr. Nevill does, indeed, talk of "proportion"; but, except in some of the street fronts in the towns, there is really no studied proportion. The charm of most of the buildings lies in their unaffectedly rural character, their adaptation to real wants, and their honest construction out of such materials as were easily to be had. It is the complete absence of these qualities, and not the imperfect imitation of old details, as Mr. Nevill seems to think, that makes the modern cockney cottage the unhomely thing that it is. And whilst we thank him for his book, it is with misgivings that it may be a useful addition to the library of the race of "imitating fools" who "of one beauty many blunders make."

The third part of the book is entitled "Roman and other Settlements in South-West Surrey," and is apparently put in because the writer had it by him, and wished to see it in type. He would have done better to give it to the county archaeological society than to print it here, where it has nothing to do with the rest of the book. He might, too, have revised his headlines. At least there seems to be something not quite right when we read across an opening "Old Cottage and Domestic Architecture. The Campaign of Aulus Plautius and Vespasian."

THE TUDOR EXHIBITION, NEW GALLERY. (First Notice.)

It is surely a fault in this exhibition that it contains such an immense number of objects that are superfluous, and a large proportion of very small importance. A pardonable enthusiasm has admitted scores of articles the interest of which is limited indeed, however much they would be in place in a museum. Numerous manuscripts of no interest as relics and having no extraordinary value, and books of which the outside or two pages only can be seen, to say nothing of great numbers of seals and coins which, for safety's sake, are shut in cases beyond reach of inspection, serve but to weary the visitor who is delighted with the drawings, the pictures, the miniatures, and the personal relics. In this country such a collection of drawings and pictures by Holbein has not been formed since 1866, when, at the first National Portrait Exhibition, sixty-five pictures bore this master's name, although probably not more than a dozen had any claim to it. It may be safely said that of the so-called Holbeins now before us not more than one-third are really Holbeins. On the other hand, the drawings, most of them from Windsor, are nearly all of them undoubtedly genuine, and they supply materials for delightful study such as London has not enjoyed till now. The great collection by this master formed some years since at Dresden was as much richer in subject pictures as it was inferior in portraits. Holbein is so much better known in England by portraits than by subject pictures that not a few persons regard him as a portrait painter only. On the Continent the reverse is the case, and foreigners have no adequate ideas of his powers as a portraitist, which were chiefly exercised in England. It was to be expected that a host of pseudo-Holbeins would crowd these walls, but no one dared hope that so many paintings of high intrinsic merit, bearing the painter's name, but obviously not his, would be shown, and guide experts with safety a little further amid that maze of conjectures, blunders, and contradictions which time and ignorance have constructed.

The visitors will undoubtedly learn from this exhibition a great deal about the art of England in the Tudor period. They will discover, probably with some surprise, that were singularly unproductive of art, while the reigns of the Henrys and Edwards produced an immense deal of fine portraiture, some of which was certainly by Englishmen. A very hasty survey shows that pictures of the sixteenth century from Italy, the Low Countries, and, most of all, from Germany, have been sent here to satisfy the cravings of British amateurs, and bear the names of sitters and painters the artists would disown.

One of the most remarkable things is the rarity of Lucas de Heeres and Antonio Mores, false as well as true.

It remains to praise the Catalogue, which follows the plan adopted for the Reynolds Exhibition at the Grosvenor Gallery six years ago, and contains a great deal of useful and curious information, the compilation of which within the brief time available was a literary feat of no small difficulty and merit. It is, of course, strictly historical, and, in awarding names to the pictures, accepts the assertions of those owners whose liberality has rendered this exhibition possible.

Beginning at the beginning, let us say that the curious Gothic pictures are likely to attract less attention than their art or historic interest or subjects deserve. No. 1 shows the pyramidal headdress or widow's coif the Lady Margaret (born Beaufort), Countess of Richmond and Derby, wore in later life. The mother of Henry VII. is best represented by the remarkable statue on her tomb in Westminster Abbey, the face of which is due to a cast from nature. This picture is probably a copy, of comparatively late date, of an earlier portrait, and is not particularly faithful. A much better likeness is Lord Braye's version, No. 33, which distinctly reproduces the effigy, and is very successful. No. 23, from St. John's College, Cambridge, proves the fidelity of the statue, even to the countess's withered hands, which in the bronze are extremely fine. Very interesting indeed is this portrait, which shows her seated under a golden cloth of state brocaded with her arms, holding upon a prie-dieu a book of prayers; in the background a stained-glass window retains the Tudor shield. The face has been "restored," and has lost something of the dry style and ascetic intensity of the period; its carnations are now forced and heavy. The painting of the cloth of gold with real metal, the pattern being drawn in brown, suggests that a German artist may have been employed.

No group of portraits here is more interesting than that which depicts, or pretends to depict, the Lady Margaret's only son Henry VII. Among these No. 2, from Trinity College, Cambridge, is notable for its sad, intelligent face, which indicates abundant caution and resolution. It is not so like the picture of the aged king in the National Portrait Gallery, which came from Le Mans in 1876, as other specimens now before us. In this case, as in that of the Lady Margaret, the standard authority for the likeness is at Westminster, the tomb by Torrigiano, which gives the king's expression and costume down to small details, and is doubtless the parent of many pictures less precious than the tenderly painted, brilliant, and sympathetic No. 22, lent by Earl Brownlow and attributed to Mabuse. It is in all respects worthy of so strong a hand as his, but its technique does not recall him to our mind. A charming work of art, it excels most of its neighbours in purity, brightness, and that rarest of all qualities at the period in question, a splendid coloration. Its veracity is beyond question, and it seems to have escaped the restorer more successfully than the picture in the National Portrait Gallery, which is by no means intact. No. 18, Sir H. Bedingfeld's, is later, and by an inferior artist.

The supply of pictures illustrating the reign of the first Tudor monarch is poorer than we expected. Nevertheless, besides the above, there are several that deserve examination. The most curious of these attests the tricks of dealers and their allies, who altered paintings to suit their market. Of Mrs. Dent's Marriage of Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York (12) the Catalogue very wisely gives, without comment, Horace Walpole's account. The work belonged to him, and on May 18th, 1842, being the twenty-first day's sale at Strawberry Hill, it was sold for 178l. 10s. as lot 52 to Mr. Dent, of Sudeley. It professes to represent the space immediately in front of a screen opening upon the long vista of a Gothic church, where on our left stands King Henry, crowned, robed, and holding a sceptre of glass, in company with a personage in red, whom Walpole supposed to be Cardinal Bouchier, who married Henry and Elizabeth; on the other side is a buxom young woman supposed to be Elizabeth, but even now more like a Magdalen, with an imaginary St. Thomas at her side. Walpole raved about the picture, and displayed nothing of his native acuteness, and all the ignorance of artistic styles, art chronology, and costume which belonged to his age. He wrote much on it in his 'Dictionary of Painters,' and, strange to say, attributed it to Mabuse. Less easily to be accounted for is the fact that he bestowed on this work the descriptive title it now bears. According to the catalogue of the contents of Easton-Neston, where it hung in the Closet, it is painted on copper. Walpole found it to be wood, and at Lord Pontefract's (Pomfret) sale gave 84l. for it; Lady Pontefract gave 200l. for it, and was foolish enough to refuse 500l. from the Earl of Oxford. Walpole was somewhat perturbed by the fact that the church is an imaginary one, "not at all resembling the abbey where those princes were married," and, although he attributed it to Mabuse, condescendingly added that it "has its merit, independent of the curiosity." But he did not recognize the fact that, so far from representing the marriage, it comprises two groups of saints and their devotees, four in all, which formerly stood beside, two on each side, of the Virgin and Child enthroned. Traces of the latter group are, it is said, recognizable under the painting of the architectural vista which occupies the centre of the panel. The figure Walpole called Henry VII. resembles him only in having a big nose, and his crown is much later than any crown existing in 1486, while the figure betrays no sign of an English origin, although a Garter has been added on the left leg. Queen Elizabeth looks "no better than she should be," and her figure was painted, as it now appears, long after the finely inspired figure in red (half like Memline, half like Van der Weyden) her vis-à-vis, the face of which is, despite many injuries, very good and poetic. Walpole took this to be the Bishop of Mola. He was wrong in every respect as to the picture, its subject, age, veracity, and authorship. Originally painted by a Fleming late in the fifteenth century, who was influenced by reminiscences of followers of Van Eyck, much of the background is due to a painter like Neefs the elder (c. 1570-1651), who inserted the lower architectural elements, including the pavement of black and white marbles, and obliterated the Virgin and Child. It may be that the latter group was left unfinished by the Gothic artist who had depicted the devotees, and whose successor, accustomed to work in another way, wisely did not attempt to paint in a mode which was out of vogue. Long after the architectural painting was executed another artist added the crown, Garter, &c., for the benefit of Lady Pontefract. How Walpole, who had seen Gothic triptychs, and cannot have been ignorant of the ceremonies of the Catholic Church, could see anything like a royal wedding in this design is quite as wonderful as how he failed to perceive that a group was missing in the centre of what we now call 'The Virgin, Child, and Saints.'

The portrait of Mary Tudor, Dowager Queen of France (5), which Mrs. Dent has lent, is ascribed to Johannes Corvus. It is characteristic and vivacious. It was painted c. 1522, when Mary was about twenty-five years of age. It resembles the lady, but has little of the art of the well-known portrait of Fox, Bishop of Winchester, belonging to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, which is an unquestioned work of Corvus, whose manner is also recognizable in No. 61, Cardinal Fisher, a highly valuable example (although it has almost perished) of a singularly dry and harsh technique, curiously suitable to the austere-looking subjects Corvus delineated so grimly.

Fisher's devotional expression is a study. The queen's picture, on the other hand, was due to a member of the school whose finest representative was Holbein; she wears abundance of "Holbein jewellery"; the background of cloth of gold is first rate; her likeness to her brother Henry is manifest. No. 8, The First Earl of Derby, from Knowsley, deserves attention on its own account apart from the subject. It was at the National Portrait Exhibition, 1866. Dean Colet of St. Paul's in his portrait (9) holds the band of his hood in a manner noticeable in Chaucer's portrait. It cannot be by Mabuse, as the Catalogue says, for it represents a style quite different from either of those this painter excelled in. In the University Library, Cambridge, there is a better and much larger portrait of Colet, arrayed in a fur tippet and a black cap. Among the numerous pictures demanding care if they are to be preserved none is more valuable than Lord Romney's curious likeness of Sir H. Wyatt (17), which is painted with vigour and skill almost equal to Holbein's. No. 19 is one of the very inferior versions of the curious Mabuse (in his second manner) at Hampton Court. It is the least worthy of its class to be called a Mabuse; it belonged to Horace Walpole, who bought it of Cosway, to whom its present title, Three Children of Henry VII., seems to be due, a title to which it has no real pretensions. Mr. Scharf long ago showed that beyond any reasonable doubt the children are those of Christian II. of Denmark, one of whom grew up to be painted by Holbein in the noble Christina, Duchess of Milan (92), which the Duke of Norfolk has lent from the place it has long occupied, and to which we hope it will return, in the National Gallery. In No. 20 we recognize the style and quaint spirit of Lucas Van Leyden, to whom it is attributed, but in a much furnished condition, and without the least claim, beyond its intrinsic merits, to be included in a Tudor Exhibition. Called The Card Players, it is noteworthy as an attempt to deal with brilliant interior light, with much delicate and exhaustive finish and extremely vivid colours; the design is unusually animated, compact, and crowded with figures of exceptional merit and full of movement. The meagreness popularly attributed to Van Leyden's forms, the "Gothicity" of his compositions, and the strained actions of his figures are not found here or in the prints of similar subjects which bear his name. Like Mabuse, his contemporary, he had more than one manner, but the earlier one did not deserve to be called Gothic. His pictures are very rare, and most of those which bear his name are not by him.

A highly curious picture is Her Majesty's Henry VII. and Family (25), which, besides containing the devotional figures of the royal house, depicts St. George combating the dragon. The monster flies in the air on the level with the knight's face, which he guards with a swashing blow at his assailant, who is but a poor creature to attack a mounted champion clad all in armour and furnished with a heavy sword. It came from Lord Stafford's house, called Tart Hall, St. James's Park, where were many pictures which had belonged to the Earl of Arundel, from whose Countess Althea they descended to William, Lord Stafford, her second son. It belonged to Walpole, and from him passed through various hands until lately, when it was secured for the royal collection. Its history and characteristics have been so recently and acutely analyzed by Mr. G. Scharf, in the Archæologia, 1886, that we need only refer students to this essay. Certain technical elements of the work lead us to associate it with English art, then closely linked with that of Flanders, at the beginning of the sixteenth century. Mr. Scharf ascribes it to a Fleming. It is marked by a fine sense of rich colour, and there is much energy in the design of the knight and his horse, which, by the way, reminds us of the brown steed bestridden by the old champion in Sir John Millais's 'Syr Isumbras.' The faces of the figures kneeling in two groups in the manner common on tombs of the date in question and later are of much interest. The girlish smile on one comely visage, the more serious look of the next maiden and her quaint sentimental air, the self-conscious expression of another princess, who looks downward, and the expressions of the male figures fronting the row of ladies, are all points worthy of praise. We cannot doubt the tradition which affirms this to be an altar-piece designed for the chapel in the palace at Sheen. Who painted the very curious and valuable Arthur, Prince of Wales (30), no one has been able to say. It looks too old for him. It is mentioned in the catalogue of Henry VIII.'s pictures. A portrait of this prince "in his minority, in a black cap and golden habit," was in the collection of Charles I.; but the description is not in accordance with this example, which, therefore, may be supposed to have passed from the Crown before Vanderdoort compiled his catalogue. It comes from Windsor, and was No. 49 in the National Portrait Exhibition, 1866.

Fine-Art Gossip.

At the last general meeting of the Society of Medallists it was decided to offer prizes of 25*l.* and 5*l.* respectively for medals, or models of medals, in metal or plaster. Objects in competition should be sent to the secretary, Mr. H. A. Grueber, British Museum, by the 1st of April next.

MESSRS. MUNRO AND TUBBS hope to begin work for the Cyprus Exploration Fund on the site of Salamis in a few days' time. Mr. and Mrs. Bent are starting for Athens, with a view to an archæological tour in Asia Minor and Bulgaria.

A SECOND edition of Mr. Coventry Patmore's volume of essays called 'Principle in Art,' which we reviewed not long since, is in the press, and will be published by Messrs. Bell in a few days.

LORD DUFFERIN and AYA will preside at the first meeting in the new year of the Archæological Society of Rome, and an address will be given by Mr. W. W. Story, the sculptor.

It is announced from Berlin that Prof. Eduard Julius Friedrich Bendemann died on Saturday last. Of Jewish extraction, he was born at Berlin December 13th, 1811, and in 1827 became a pupil of Schadow, whose daughter he married and whom he succeeded as Director of the Academy at Düsseldorf. In 1828, after his pupilage terminated, he went to Italy, where he remained till 1832, in which year his much admired 'Jews weeping by the Waters of Babylon,' four figures grouped on the ground at the foot of a tree, was exhibited. It is now in the gallery at Cologne, and has been more than once engraved. In 1833 his 'Girls at a Fountain,' engraved by Felsing, was produced. His 'Jeremiah in the Ruins of Jerusalem' was at the Paris Salon in 1837, and obtained for the artist a medal of the First Class. Like many other pictures of his, it is well known by a lithograph of exceptional merit; it is now in the gallery at Berlin. In 1838 he became a professor in the Academy at Dresden. For the King of Saxony Bendemann decorated the Royal Palace of Dresden with frescoes of life-size figures in friezes and otherwise, and of a poetic and didactic character, which have been much admired; in the interior of his own house he painted a large fresco of 'Poetry and the Arts.' At Düsseldorf is one of his most conspicuous works, a frieze similar to that at Dresden. The New Museum at Berlin contains compositions of his resembling the decorations by Cornelius in the neighbouring Campo Santo, and he had a conspicuous share in the series of royal portraits in the Kaisersaal of the Rathaus at Frankfurt, his companions in the task including A. Rethel and Lessing. For a considerable time (1859-67) he acted as Director of the Academy at Düsseldorf, where he trained several able men. He was a member of Prussian, Saxon, and Belgian orders. Among his better-known works are, besides the above, 'Ruth and Boaz' (1830), 'Servian Princesses' (1834), 'Harvest' (1836), 'Penelope' (1877), 'Sacrifice of Iphigenia' (1882), and many portraits of noteworthy persons.

THE English painter William Wyld was born in London and well known in Paris (where he lived more than fifty years, and had much to do with developing water-colour painting in France). His intimacy with Beau Brummell, Bonington, Francia, H. Vernet (whom he accompanied to Rome and Algiers), C. Rocheplan, and nearly all the painters of his time, made him an authority with regard to them. He died at his atelier in the Rue Blanche on Christmas Day. A frequent contributor to the Salon, he obtained a Third-Class Medal in 1839, a Second-Class Medal in 1841, and the Legion of Honour in 1855. He exhibited several landscapes at the Academy and British Institution between 1850 and 1855. Two of his landscapes are in the Luxembourg, of which the better is the fine 'Vue du Mont St. Michel.'

M. GÉRÔME's able pupil, M. Jules Garnier, who was born in Paris January 22nd, 1847, and painted the highly popular picture representing 'Le Libérateur du Territoire,' also died on Christmas Day. His 'Borgia's Amuse' and 'Flagrant Délit' were highly popular; his 'Droit du Seigneur,' a spirited illustration of an imaginary privilege of mediæval lords, amused antiquaries of a sarcastic turn of mind and edified philanthropists at the Salon of 1872, where we noticed it. He produced a large number of designs for books, including etchings for the 'Contes de la Reine de Navarre,' 'Les Jeux du Cirque,' and 'La Vie Foraine.' At present not fewer than one hundred and sixty of his works, intended for the 'Vie de Rabelais,' are being exhibited in Paris.

WE regret to announce the death of a lady well known for her antiquarian learning, Mrs. Maria Halliday, wife of Mr. Halliday, of Glen-thorne, Devon, and sister of Sir Walter Farquhar. She published in 1882 'A Description of the Monument in Porlock Church' (Athen., No. 2861), and three years later a monograph on the Leighs of Allington, from whom through her mother she was descended. She was an accomplished and amiable woman, whose loss will be much felt among English antiquaries.

THE death is announced of M. de Montaut, of the Vie Parisienne.

A SINGULAR inscription has been found by M. Lambakis in excavating around the Haghiou Andreas in Athens. It is a fragment of a decree dating from pre-Euclidean times, in which a certain Kallikrates is charged with the construction on the Acropolis of a kind of railing round some sanctuary or enclosure, to prevent any fugitive slave, garment stealer, or pickpocket (lôpodytes) taking refuge therein. The duty of watching over this enclosure is entrusted to three guardians, chosen by turn from the tribe holding the prytania.

IN the excavations around the Metropolis in the ancient monastery of St. Philothea two subterranean passages have been found like catacombs, to which leads a marble stair.

MUSIC

Musical Instruments and their Homes. By Mary E. Brown and W. Adams Brown. (New York, Dodd, Mead & Co.)

(Second Notice.)

THE intention of our authors, as stated in their preface, has been "to give some account of the principal instruments in use the world over," and they also re mark that "no comprehensive work on the musical instruments of the East and of savage races has yet appeared." However, Java has been overlooked by them, excepting a simple reference quoted from Mr. A. J. Ellis. Yet Java is specially rich in musical material, unlike in many important respects either China or Siam, with which Java might be expected to consort. There are in Java two quite distinct musical scales, requiring distinct sets of instruments or orchestras for their performance. The older is called saléndro, and, according to Mr. Ellis, may be taken as an ideal equal pentatonic scale. The more recent scale, the pelog, is a heptatonic scale, consisting of semitones, three-quarter tones, and minor thirds, but, at present, incapable of rational solution. Suffice it to say this scale is used for pentatonic modes just as we use our chromatic scale to select diatonic scales from. One pelog mode appears to be derived from Southern India, the rest are inexplicable as far as we know.

Mr. Brown comes forward to vindicate the excellence of Japanese workmanship in musical instruments against the undue depreciation of it by Mr. Rowbotham. The Japanese rivals the Chinese in musical instruments, and we think often surpasses him, as does also the Siamese. The sono koto is the most important Japanese instrument. It has thirteen strings, tuned according to a pentatonic system in several ways, but not one like the Chinese, from the presence always of semitones. Mr. Brown says that none of the established tunings gives regular diatonic progression. There is no legitimate reference admissible to diatonic progression or chromatic, but the instrument becomes enharmonic from the characteristic shadings effected by the left hand of the player altering the tension of the strings, presumably for graces; the pentatonic foundation is unalterable. Mr. Brown leans very much, and very naturally, upon Mr. S. Isawa, the Director of the Institute of Music at Tokio. It is, however, easy to read through the lines of Mr. Isawa's published report of that institution, that he strains everything to make his countrymen the same as Europeans, and this tendency causes him to overlook, or make light of, points of divergence between the Japanese and European scales. Mr. Isawa tunes his koto in the most common mode, that called hiradio-shi, just like the old Greek scale of Olympus. We have against this the practice of native musicians who were at the Japanese Village at Knightsbridge a few years ago, of men and women who had been brought from different parts of Japan, who spoke different dialects of the language, and yet all agreed in their musical scale, and their samisens (long-necked guitars or tambouras) were marked on the neck for a neuter third in one part of the octave where Mr. Isawa has a major third (descending). The native music-master tuned more than one koto in this way. Hiradio-shi was the 'only form of the Japanese pentatonic scale these people appeared to know. It would be minor were it not for the one indeterminate third. This may, of course, be an instance of corruption from theoretical principle, but there may equally be an endeavour from the side of the institute to introduce conformity with European principle.

In the Indian peninsula we are really in another world. We exchange a music in which noise and a dry executive skill prevail for one vibrating with sentiment and passion, and that combines a refined execution with the highly nervous organization that makes the poetic artist. Such a one was a Jeypore been player (been, a kind of vina), who was to be heard, but we fear was not much heard, at a little exhibition called "India in London" in 1886. To go from one of the clever Siamese ranat players of the Inventions Exhibition the year before to this man was to quit the atmosphere of a desert for one redolent of sweet air and flower scents. The Hindu chromatic scale, from which the numerous modes and melody types are selected, does not appear to differ from our own. As there is no harmony, slight differences may pass without notice. Very much of Hindu music impresses the European as being in the minor scale; but deflections in the stringed instruments and possible accommodations in the wind introduce an enharmonic elaboration that defies notation. It is most pure in the Karnatic and southern provinces; in the north, with the Mohammedan have come Persian and Arabic influences. Pure Hindu music is of Sanskrit origin, and has been handed down and finds expression on the vina, the ancient Sanskrit instrument. As Mr. Brown says:—

"The Sanskrit treatises carry Hindu music as far back as that of Egypt and China. Indeed, the opinion has been advanced by some scholars that India was civilized before either of these nations, and was the root from which their civilization sprang."

He continues:—

"Whatever may be the truth of this theory, it is probable, that in very early times, there was a marked similarity between the music of all three of these countries."

In spite of the authorities adduced by Mr. Brown, we are not disposed to admit, although we do not deny, that any proof exists for an identity of origin. This much is sure, that Indian music is an art, based upon melodic and rhythmic conditions, that in its way is to the sense no less beautiful than our European music, which has the advantage of, but also the limitations arising from, the combinations of harmony.

It is impossible here to adequately discuss the music of the Hindus. Mr. Brown supplies a résumé of the opinions of the best authorities. Still, as he says in concluding the chapter upon Hindu musical instruments, he cannot claim to have exhausted the field, and that from the obvious reason it has not yet been thoroughly cultivated. Our countrymen who are the rulers of India ought to search for the treasures of Hindu music, both in the theoretical and practical bearings of the subject, and make them available for the musical student and historian. Mr. Brown claims for India unreservedly, on the authority of Fétis, the invention of "that powerful interpreter of musical sentiment called the bow." In spite of a fervent desire to accredit India with the violin-bow, we cannot admit that the Eastern origin of it is yet proved. It is with greater certainty that Mr. Brown attributes to India the invention of the great charm of the European viola d'amore, sympathetic strings, which excite the imagination in the same way as an undamped pianoforte excites it when judiciously controlled by the pedal. To turn to Arabia, he rightly gives the Arabs the credit of exerting an important influence upon Europe in the sphere of music, and in view of this influence claims for Arab music an exceptional interest; and as it was originally Persian, we may have through this descent some far-off echo of Babylonian melody—some fancy of tuning a string.

It is as little possible to go into the question of Arabic music within the limits of a review as it has been with Indian music; but there is one point to be noticed. Relying upon the positive statements of Fétis, Ambros, and others, Mr. Brown says: "The Arabs divided each whole tone into three equal divisions. Seventeen of these made up the octave, a third tone [one-third tone] taking the place of the half-tone in our scale." Eighteen divisions would be required if this were so, not seventeen. But whether seventeen or eighteen, we must regard this question as definitely settled by the publication at Leyden, in 1884, of Dr. J. P. N. Land's 'Recherches sur l'Histoire de la Gamme Arabe.' This invaluable treatise is reprinted from the Proceedings of the Sixth Session of the International Congress of Orientalists. Dr. Land shows the old Arab stopping of the rabab and lute was effected by applying the first or index finger to produce a note a whole tone higher than the open string, the third or ring finger another whole tone higher, and the little finger a semitone yet higher, thus obtaining the interval of a fourth above the open string. Thus, suppose the open string to be c, the first finger shortened the string on the finger-board for d, the third for e, and the fourth, or little finger, for f. The second finger, remaining thus unemployed, was subsequently brought into use to stop a whole tone below the little finger fret and so produce e flat. The tetrachord thus comprised c, d, e flat, e, and f, and this was repeated on the other strings each a fourth higher. We will pass by the change made by the lutenist Zalzal of the minor third to a neuter third, to show that it was by a rational arrangement of this lute accordance of conjunct fourths, due to stopping back and starting again from the c sharp or d flat, that the Arab lutenist arrived at a division by limmas and commas of seventeen notes in the octave; and this was the generally received accordance and fretting by Mohammedan theorists and lutenists from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century. Taking c again as the open note, there were ascending three notes under d, three e, two f, three g, three a, two b, and a second c, completing the octave; but nowhere equal divisions into thirds of a tone. It is, perhaps, as well to explain that the limma is the Pythagorean semitone, and the comma the small interval that is found between the natural and the Pythagorean major third. That Villoteau, in his 'Description de l'Égypte' (Paris, 1823), who has been the prime authority for the one-third tone, was mistaken is clear from Dr. Land's research. An Arabic scholar and a musician, no one could be more completely furnished than Dr. Land for the judicial task that has banished to paper theory, or little more, the seventeen (or eighteen) equal thirds. The little more is that the great Arabic lutenist Al Fārābi, whom Dr. Land has vindicated, appears to have heard the interval in question, but within the bounds of the whole tone, be it remembered, upon a tamboura of Khorassan. This could have been a mere exercise of ingenuity in making small intervals, and an exception to the Arabic preference for the diatonic scale with the minor seventh. Of later date than the unequal division by seventeen is an equal division by twenty-four, quarter tones, in fact, which does not disturb the chromatic arrangement. Villoteau notices it, and it is still met with at Cairo, Damascus, and elsewhere.

As in the case of the negroes of Africa, so among the various Indian tribes of North America, there are very different degrees of musical development:—

"The rude natives of Alaska content themselves with rattles and drums. As we proceed southward the wind instruments come into use. The Haidas of the west coast of British America have a great variety of rude wooden pipes and flutes. Among the Sioux or Dakotas we find flageolets with six or seven finger holes. Whereas, with many other tribes, musical instruments are used only to accompany singing and the dance, the orchestral performances of the Dakotas are quite elaborate. The Apaches possess a rude violin with one string, while the Pueblos of New Mexico are contented chiefly with instruments of percussion. Scarcely less marked are the differences in the character of the songs of the various tribes. Some are extremely monotonous, and contained within a very narrow compass. The range of others is no less than two octaves. In general we may say that the character of the music of any particular tribe is a very fair index to its general development."

Mr. Brown goes on to say the North American Indian is a wonderfully close observer of nature, and the poetry of his feelings finds special expression in his love songs. The Indian lover precedes his song by a prelude upon the flute. The dance is practised both as a religious ceremony and a secular amusement. Singing and dancing are so intimately connected in an Indian's thought that it is almost impossible to separate them. The medicine men cultivate the national songs and are the skalds or poets of the tribes; but, as with all savage music, a prominence is given to the rhythmic over the melodic element.

In the catalogue of the instruments it is advisable a few corrections should be made. Under China, 8, yang-kin should be "foreign kin," not harpsichord. Neither is it of the zither family, as stated, but is a true dulcimer, and the strings are attached to pins, not by nails. Syria, 2, bizug, a tamboura; it should be said the six wire strings are grouped to form two open notes, just as Palestine, 2, tamboura, the five strings also form two open notes. Europe, 1, lute, should be mandore. The instrument drawn is a wire-strung one, played with a plectrum, as is shown by the plectrum guard on the sound-board. France, 2, archilute, should be either; the archilute is a double-necked lute or theorbo; 6, tambourin à cordes, requires the statement that the strings are struck with a hammer which the player holds in one hand while he fingers a pipe with the other. Greece, 6, clarinet should be oboe. Italy, 3, lyre is a guitar lyre of the beginning of this century, when the empire fashion prevailed. Spain, 1, mandora should be bandurria; 2, clarinet, oboe. 6, psalter, is obviously a dulcimer. With sets of five or six strings to each note it could only have been played with hammers. Madeira, 5, guitarra would be more accurately catalogued as bandurria. From sufficient reasons the subject of European music is passed over in silence.

Musical Gossip.

THE usual New Year's Day performance of 'The Messiah' was given by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall. The principal vocalists were Madame Dotti, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills. There was a very large audience.

WITH the exception of the Royal Choral Society's performance, concerts have been entirely suspended, and two or three weeks will elapse before they again become numerous. The spring season, however, promises to be at least equal in activity and interest to that of last year. The Carl Rosa Company will have a season at Drury Lane, in the course of which Mr. Cowen's new opera will be produced. Special interest will be given to the Philharmonic Society's enterprise by the visit of Antonin Dvůřák, who has not been with us since 1886. We have already announced the determination of Mr. Augustus Harris to revive Gluck's 'Orfeo' at the Royal Italian Opera, and 'Die Walküre' will probably be given in place of 'Tristan und Isolde' as originally intended. There is every probability of a rival enterprise at Her Majesty's, but it does not seem probable that a season of German opera will be attempted this year.

THE annual conference of the Society of Professional Musicians will be held in Bristol from Tuesday to Friday next week. An interesting programme has been arranged, some features of which will require notice.

MAX BRUCH'S Grand Symphony in E major, No. 3, was announced to be performed for the first time at Sir Charles Halle's Manchester concert on Thursday evening.

THERE is, of course, no truth in the statement of a Milanese journal that Signor Faccio has been engaged at Covent Garden Theatre this season. If he comes to London at all it will be to conduct at Her Majesty's. But nothing whatever is settled as yet concerning a season of Italian opera at that house.

AN important sale of autograph letters of composers took place at the Hôtel Drouot last Saturday. A letter from Mozart to his sister, written when he was fourteen years old, fetched 580 francs. Letters of Haydn, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and many other composers were knocked down at prices varying from 50 to 250 francs.

THE rehearsals for the production of Berlioz's 'Les Troyens' in its complete form at Karlsruhe are being rapidly pushed forward, and Herr Felix Mottl hopes that the work will be in readiness for performance in the course of February.

ACCORDING to Il Trovatore there are now only twenty-four theatres where Italian opera is played outside of Italy, and of these eight are in America, five in Spain, and four in Greece. On the other hand, out of sixty-one lyric theatres in Italy only nine include any German operas in their current repertory. 'Lohengrin' is announced at seven houses, 'Die Meistersinger' at Milan, and Goldmark's 'Queen of Sheba' at Naples.

A MEMORIAL tablet has been placed upon the house in Würzburg in which Wagner composed his early opera 'Die Feen.'

ON the 19th ult. Herr Hellmesberger directed his three-hundredth performance of chamber music in Vienna.

GLUCK'S 'Armida' and Piccinni's 'Roland' are to be revived at the Bellini Theatre in Naples, of which Baron La Capra is the impresario.

A NEW concert hall has just been opened in Hamburg. It possesses seating accommodation for 2,000 people, and is furnished with a fine organ.

'DER RING DES NIBELUNGEN' will be performed at Madrid under the direction of Herr Neumann in April next.

It is stated that the expenses of the Abbey opera troupe, which includes Madame Patti and Signor Tamagno, amount to 2,000*l.* each performance.

Dramatic Gossip.

NOTHING dramatic is left in the pantomimes, which have degenerated into mere "variety shows." Spectacle is, of course, the chief object of the management, and in this great advance has been made. Not wholly prosaic or meaningless are, moreover, the scenes supplied, and the spectacle at Drury Lane of the gods and goddesses on Olympus is an improvement upon the old transformation scene. Specially noticeable is the extent to which circus exhibitions are brought on the stage. At Covent Garden we find the unwonted sight of a tame lion riding round the arena on the back of a horse. As the show is avowedly of the circus order, this is scarcely out of place. At Drury Lane, however, we have the spectacle of a man lifting a full-sized horse from the ground, and that of a fight between two gamecocks, one real and the other mimic, which is, at least, surprising. 'Jack and the Beanstalk' is given at Drury Lane, and 'Cinderella' at Covent Garden and Her Majesty's. At the house last named Mr. Shiel Barry, who has been missed of late, reappears.

MR. F. A. MARSHALL, the well-known dramatist and Shakespearean critic, has died before completing his 'Henry Irving Shakespeare,' on which he had been occupied about seven years. The son of Mr. William Marshall, some time member of Parliament for East Cumberland, he was a member of the family of Marshalls, originally from Leeds, who became landowners in the Lake district. Born in London in 1840, he went to Harrow and to Oxford, but did not take a degree. A clerkship in the Audit Office was held for six years, and he then occupied himself wholly with literature. Alone or in conjunction he was responsible for the following plays: 'Mad as a Hatter,' written with Mr. Herman Merivale; 'Corrupt Practices,' a drama in two acts, Lyceum, January 22nd, 1870; 'Chilperic,' opéra bouffe, adapted with the aid of Messrs. R. Reece and R. Mansell, Lyceum, same date; 'Q.E.D.,' a comedietta, Court, January 25th, 1871; 'False Shame,' a comedy of much merit, Globe, November 4th, 1872; 'Brighton,' an adaptation of Mr. Bronson Howard's 'Saratoga,' Court, May 25th, 1874; 'Biorn,' a five-act opera, with music by Signor Lauro Rossi, Queen's, January 17th, 1877; 'Cora,' a drama in a prologue and three acts, written in conjunction with Mr. Wills, Globe, February 28th, 1877; 'Family Honour,' a three-act comedy, May 18th, 1878; and 'Lola,' a comic opera in two acts. He published in the Britannia Magazine an unfinished novel, entitled 'L. S. D.,' and wrote 'A Study of Hamlet,' 1875. He was a clever, popular, and hospitable man. He died on Saturday last at his house 8, Bloomsbury Square, and his funeral took place the following Tuesday at the Roman Catholic cemetery, Kensal Green, in the presence of many friends. Marshall married in second nuptials Ada Cavendish, a well-known actress. It has been pretty generally asserted that his work on the 'Irving Shakespeare' will be continued by Mr. Joseph Knight. This is misleading. Mr. Knight is only responsible for the "stage histories" of the various plays, which were undertaken last spring. The remaining portions of the work are in other hands.

MRS. BERNARD BEERE has been seized by the frost and fog, and has been compelled temporarily to withdraw from the performance of 'La Tosca.'

THE representation at the Royalty of 'Tra la la Tosca' has been postponed for the purpose of effecting some changes in the book.

MISS STRAFFORD has given at the Novelty Theatre 'East Lynne' in the version produced by her at a recent afternoon representation. It is succeeded to-night by 'A Celebrated Case.' The house will shortly, it is said, pass into the hands of Mr. Harrington Baily, by whom it will once more be renamed. Shakespeare's speculation as to what's in a name commends itself to his managers no more strongly than do his works.

THE Hon. Lewis Wingfield will superintend the production of 'As You Like It' at the St. James's Theatre. In spite of the continuous assertions that Mrs. Langtry has been taking a holiday in the south of France, she has not yet quitted London.

MR. THOMAS THORNE has been suffering for some days from bronchitis, and the rehearsals of Mr. Buchanan's new piece have consequently been postponed.

THE death of M. A. Duru, the well-known dramatist, is announced, and also that of M. Villetard, a well-known journalist and part author with M. Belot of the 'Testament de César Girodot.'

LITERATURE

Life of Harriet Beecher Stowe. Compiled from her Letters and Journals. By her Son, Charles Edward Stowe. (Sampson Low & Co.)

PREPARED in her lifetime, and, as Mrs. Stowe remarks in a touching preface, "at my suggestion and with what assistance I have been able to render," this is in all but form an autobiography, and, as she also says, "perhaps much more accurate as to detail and impression than is possible with any autobiography written late in life." It is an extremely interesting and instructive book. Some portions of it go over the same ground as the already published 'Autobiography and Correspondence' of her father, Lyman Beecher, and the eulogistic 'Biography' of her brother, Henry Ward Beecher, and a few letters are repeated from Mr. Cross's 'Life of George Eliot'; but little or nothing that is here given could be dispensed with, and the trivial no less than the important matters set forth help to make a striking and what looks like a singularly truthful picture of the life of a brave woman and a successful author.

Mrs. Stowe's reminiscences of her early childhood, recorded some years ago, were vivid. She had a tender recollection of the amiable mother who died in their New England home when she was four years old; and of a long visit that she paid immediately afterwards to an Aunt Harriet she retained clear impressions. She enjoyed being called "Miss Harriet" by the black servants; but she did not like having to learn both the Church Catechism, which her aunt, and which she too, preferred, and the Presbyterian Primer approved by her father:—

"I was rather pleased at the first question in the Church catechism, which is certainly quite on the level of any child's understanding. 'What is your name?' It was such an easy good start, I could say it so loud and clear, and I was accustomed to compare it with the first question in the Primer, 'What is the chief end of man?' as vastly more difficult for me to answer."

As soon as she could read there was developed in her "the intense literary longing that was to be hers through life," and it was not satisfied by the sermons and pamphlets—prominent among them being 'An Appeal on the Unlawfulness of a Man marrying his Wife's Sister'—which were all she could find when she went back to her father's house, until she discovered an old volume of 'The Arabian Nights.' With that and a few other profane books she amused herself, but her school discipline was severe, and she must have had much natural aptitude for theological studies since, when she was twelve, she wrote a learned thesis on the question 'Can the Immortality of the Soul be proved by the Light of Nature?' which, let us hope, was cribbed from some of the sermons to which she had access. The treatise is extant, and is composed of sentences like this: "Is it not a subject of general remark that those brilliant talents which in youth expand, in manhood become stationary, and in old age gradually sink to decay?" But Mrs. Stowe belonged to a theological family. Her sister Catherine was a great authority on the question of Free Agency, and the report of her learning startled a German professor into irreverence:—

"A certain eminent theological professor of New England, visiting a distinguished German theologian and speaking of this production, said: 'The ablest refutation of Edwards on "The Will" which was ever written is the work of a woman, the daughter of Dr. Lyman Beecher.' The worthy Teuton raised both hands in undisguised astonishment. 'You have a woman that can write an able refutation of Edwards on "The Will"? God forgive Christopher Columbus for discovering America!'"

Miss Catherine Beecher, eleven years older than her sister, kept a school at Hartford, and thither Harriet went before she was thirteen, commencing as a pupil, and afterwards becoming a teacher. She was thus employed during eight years at Hartford, and during four more at Cincinnati, where a larger and more advanced school was set up. She taught herself much while she was teaching others, and overtaxed her strength. A letter written to one of her friends in 1833, when she was twenty-two, indicates more than her own state of mind at this time:—

"Recently I have been reading the life of Madame de Staël and 'Corinne.' I have felt an intense sympathy with many parts of that book, with many parts of her character. But in America feelings vehement and absorbing like hers become still more deep, morbid, and impassioned by the constant habits of self-government which the rigid forms of our society demand. They are repressed, and they burn inward till they burn the very soul, leaving only dust and ashes. It seems to me the intensity with which my mind has thought and felt on every subject presented to it has had this effect. It has withered and exhausted it, and though young I have no sympathy with the feelings of youth."

"About half of my time," she said in another letter, "I am scarcely alive, and a great part of the rest the slave and sport of morbid feeling and unreasonable prejudice." A change came, but not with too rapid transition from gloom to sunshine, in 1836, when she married Prof. Stowe, whose first wife had been one of her girl friends. Of Prof. Stowe not much is told, except that he was a tremendous reader of learned books on all sorts of subjects, and had a great weakness for spiritualism, but was also, when he unbent, "an inimitable mimic and storyteller," while he was further "possessed of a bright, quick mind and wonderful retentiveness of memory." He was the original of his wife's "visionary boy" in her 'Oldtown Folks.' "Sympathy for a childless widower" is given as the motive for Miss Harriet Beecher's marrying, yet the marriage turned out well, and the only drawback to their happiness was the smallness of the income on which the couple had to bring up a rapidly increasing family, a difficulty which Mrs. Stowe overcame by taking to literature as a business. She had begun writing magazine stories in her teacher days, and had continued the occupation in a desultory way, but merely, as she frankly admitted, in order to meet the pressing claims for money that arose from time to time:—

"During long years of struggling with poverty and sickness, and a hot, debilitating climate, my children grew up around me. The nursery and the kitchen were my principal fields of labor. Some of my friends, pitying my trials, copied and sent a number of little sketches from my pen to certain liberally paying 'Annals' with my name. With the first money that I earned in this way I bought a feather-bed! for as I had married into poverty and without a dowry, and as my husband had only a large library of books and a great deal of learning, the bed and pillows were thought the most profitable investment. After this I thought that I had discovered the philosopher's stone. So when a new carpet or mattress was going to be needed, or when, at the close of the year, it began to be evident that my family accounts, like poor Dora's, 'wouldn't add up,' then I used to say to my faithful friend and factotum Anna, who shared all my joys and sorrows, 'Now, if you will keep the babies and attend to the things in the house for one day, I'll write a piece, and then we shall be out of the scrape.' So I became an author."

The step was taken in 1842, in wifely obedience to instructions that her husband addressed to her while she was seeking health away from home:—

"My dear, you must be a literary woman. It is so written in the book of fate. Make all your calculations accordingly. Get a good stock of health and brush up your mind. Drop the E. out of your name. It only incumbers it and interferes with the flow and euphony. Write yourself fully and always Harriet Beecher Stowe, which is a name euphonious, flowing, and full of meaning. Then my word for it, your husband will lift up his head in the gate, and your children will rise up and call you blessed."

Throughout more than eight years, however, Mrs. Stowe's magazine-writing brought but little profit to the family, and her first success was the result of a desire to do something besides earning money. All through the early stages of the anti-slavery struggle, while Lloyd Garrison and others were preaching a despised gospel, Mrs. Stowe had taken a keen interest, but no active part, in it. But in 1850 she was urged to "write something that would make the whole nation feel what an accursed thing slavery is," and 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' was the consequence. Commenced as a short tale, to run through only a few numbers of a newspaper, it grew into a long novel, which, as soon as it was published in book form, obtained a popularity for which the writer was quite unprepared. Mrs. Stowe and her friends may have attributed to it more than its real share in procuring the abolition of slavery; but there can be no doubt that its influence was immense. The enormous profits derived from its sale, moreover, were of no little service to the Stowe household, and the fame that Mrs.

Stowe thus suddenly acquired secured a market for all the eight-and-twenty books that she afterwards wrote at the rate of one a year.

It is not necessary here to speak of the literary merits of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' or of any of its successors. If Mrs. Stowe has lived long enough to learn that the praises heaped upon her seven or eight and thirty years ago were somewhat in excess of her deserts, she must not be blamed for having at the time taken them as truth. "Almost in a day the poor professor's wife had become the most talked-of woman in the world"; and if the abuse of the Southerners she assailed was nearly as pleasant to her as the flattery of the Northerners whose cause she was helping, she appears to have been most gratified of all by the adulation from English earls and duchesses, politicians and authors, which rushed across the Atlantic, and quickly brought her to England to be shown about as a prodigy, and effusively complimented by aristocrats and plebeians. No wonder that her head was a little turned. The wonder is that she was not made giddier—that she retained so much common sense and took such a fairly accurate measure of her own capacities as there is evidence of in the letters and journals printed by her son. The half of her biography which records her early struggles and triumphs over home difficulties is far more interesting, however, than that which tells how the "little bit of a woman, somewhat more than forty, about as thin and dry as a pinch of snuff, never very much to look at in my best days, and looking like a used-up article now," as she described herself in 1853, yielded to and profited by the homage she received during the few years in which 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' was at the height of its popularity.

There is a naïveté in all the extracts here given from Mrs. Stowe's letters and notes which disarms criticism, and enables us to see her exactly as she was at the time of writing. Whether she was grumbling to her husband that 'Dred' was not being sold at the rate of so many thousands a week as she hoped, or that the people who had declared 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' the finest book ever written did not acknowledge that 'Dred' was even finer, or whether she was calling five days' sightseeing in Venice "an affliction for which there is no remedy, because you want to see the things, and would be very sorry if you went home without having done so," or whatever else she wrote, she strictly and precisely recorded the mood she was in, and revealed her own character.

Of the many letters addressed to her by interesting people which her son has printed, very few—not even those from Mr. Ruskin, Mrs. Browning, or George Eliot—are particularly interesting. They throw no such light on the writers' temperament as do Mrs. Stowe's upon her own. Here, however, is a striking paragraph from a letter of Mrs. Browning's concerning her 'De Profundis':—

"It refers to the greatest affliction of my life,—the only time when I felt despair,—written a year after or more. Forgive all these reticences. My husband calls me 'peculiar' in some things,—peculiarly lâche, perhaps. I can't articulate some names, or speak of certain afflictions;—no, not to him,—not after all these years! It's a sort of dumbness of the soul. Blessed are those who can speak, I say. But don't you see from this how I must want 'spiritualism' above most persons?"

This, too—part of George Eliot's reply to the first letter she had received from Mrs. Stowe—tells us something about herself, and helps to explain the tender friendship that grew up between the two, so unlike one another in most respects:—

"It lay awaiting me on our return the other night from a nine weeks' absence in Italy, and it made me almost wish that you could have a momentary vision of the discouragement,—nay, paralyzing despondency—in which many days of my writing life have been passed, in order that you might fully understand the good I find in such sympathy as yours, in such an assurance as you give me that my work has been worth doing. But I will not dwell on any mental sickness of mine. The best joy your words give me is the sense of that sweet, generous feeling in you which dictated them. I shall always be the richer because you have in this way made me know you better. I must tell you that my first glimpse of you as a woman came through a letter of yours, and charmed me very much. The letter was addressed to Mrs. Follen, and one morning I called on her in London (how many years ago!); she was kind enough to read it to me, because it contained a little history of your life, and a sketch of your domestic circumstances. I remember thinking that it was very kind of you to write that long letter, in reply to inquiries of one who was personally unknown to you; and, looking back with my present experience, I think it was kinder than it then appeared, for at that time you must have been much oppressed with the immediate results of your fame. I remember, too, that you wrote of your husband as one who was richer in Hebrew and Greek than in pounds or shillings; and as an ardent scholar has always been a character of peculiar interest to me, I have rarely had your image in my mind without the accompanying image (more or less erroneous) of such a scholar by your side."

In her letters to George Eliot Mrs. Stowe gave some charming sketches of her life in the Florida home to which after 1867, and when her literary earnings justified her in securing a restful paradise for her husband as well as herself, she resorted each winter. Early in 1872 she said:—

"I am now in Florida in my little hut in the orange orchard, with the broad expanse of the blue St. John's in front, and the waving of the live-oaks, with their long, gray mosses, overhead, and the bright gold of oranges looking through dusky leaves around. It is like Sorrento,—so like that I can quite dream of being there. And when I get here I enter another life. The world recedes; I am out of it; it ceases to influence; its bustle and noise die away in the far distance; and here is no winter, an open-air life,—a quaint, rude, wild wilderness sort of life, both rude and rich; but when I am here I write more letters to friends than ever I do elsewhere. The mail comes only twice a week, and then is the event of the day. My old rabbi and I here set up our tent, he with German, and Greek, and Hebrew, devouring all sorts of black-letter books, and I spinning ideal webs out of bits that he lets fall here and there."

Later in the same year, while 'Middlemarch' was appearing, Mrs. Stowe wrote to her friend from Boston:—

"Yesterday we were both out of our senses with mingled pity and indignation at that dreadful stick of a Casaubon,—and think of poor Dorothea dashing like a warm, sunny wave against so cold and repulsive a rock! He is a little too dreadful for anything: there does not seem to be a drop of warm blood in him, and so, as it is his misfortune and not his fault, to be cold-blooded, one must not get angry with him. It is the scene in the garden, after the interview with the doctor, that rests on our mind at this present. There was such a man as he over in Boston, high in literary circles, but I fancy his wife wasn't like Dorothea, and a vastly proper time they had of it, treating each other with mutual reverence, like two Chinese mandarins. My love, what I miss in this story is just what we would have if you would come to our tumble-down, jolly, improper, but joyous country,—namely, 'jollitude.' You write and live on so high a plane! It is all self-abnegation. We want to get you over here, and into this house, where, with closed doors, we sometimes make the rafters ring with fun, and say anything and everything, no matter what, and won't be any properer than we's a mind to be. I am wishing every day you could see our America,—travel, as I have been doing, from one bright, thriving, pretty, flowery town to another, and see so much wealth, ease, progress, culture, and all sorts of nice things."

If the chief function of an autobiography, such as this volume really is, is to make straightforward and truthful presentment of the writer's intellectual and moral qualities in their development through life, to reveal the flaws and weaknesses as well as the elements of strength and beauty, this book deserves high praise. Mrs. Stowe may be congratulated on having lived to see the successful accomplishment, with her son's skilful and unobtrusive help, of what she felt to be her final service to her day and generation. There is rare pathos, without sadness, in nearly the last words here printed—words with which she closed a letter written more than two years ago:—

"I feel about all things now as I do about the things that happen in a hotel, after my trunk is packed to go home. I may be vexed and annoyedbut what of it! I am going home soon."

The Old, Old Fairy Tales. Collected and edited by Mrs. Valentine. (Warne & Co.)

THESE tales will be eagerly welcomed by young folks, for scarcely one of the best-known and best-liked stories is missing, and most of them are pleasantly told. Little hands will, however, find the book rather difficult to hold, for it contains thirty-nine tales, some of which are related at considerable length. Mrs. Valentine, like Mlle. L'Héritier, writes "avec quelque broderie,"—a great deal too much broderie, in fact, for an editor who, save for a little pruning of ancient freedom of speech to suit modern refinement, professes to follow with exactitude "the original translations in their quaint simplicity." This profession is by no means always made good. Perrault would certainly not recognize his 'Chaperon Rouge' in the version to which his name is appended. The French story is told with delightful simplicity and reality in two short pages. Mrs. Valentine fills eight or nine, and she has embroidered on it a number of details, which may possibly be interesting to a young child, but are so weak and so remote from the good traditional story that we pity those children who never know any other version than this, which is everywhere encumbered with flowers blooming in and out of season, with butterflies like flying primroses, with a great wolf-hound called Bran, which when Red Riding Hood took her walks abroad was at one side of her, and a raven called Ralph, which, when not occupied in the, for a raven, unusual employment of "seeking worms," hopped along on the side opposite to the dog, while a cushat dove called Lily sat on the child's head, "and a soft grey pussy crept along in front, rubbing herself at times against her little mistress, and getting a gentle chiding for nearly throwing her down." The dog is very useful in the end, for he bites the wolf's heels when he comes too near to Red Riding Hood, and teaches us that wolves have heels! "Red Riding Hood," said the mother in this version of Charles Perrault's story—what treason it is to a dead author to put his name to it!—

"as father is gone out, you will not have to carry his dinner into the wood to-day. I shall send you to your grandmother's instead." "Oh, mother dear, I shall be so glad to go!" said the little one. "The dear old lady has been very ill for a long time now," added Red Riding Hood's mother, "and never, I think, gets up; she is quite bed-ridden. Winifred, her little servant, has asked leave to go to the archery show to-day, and poor granny is all alone. So I thought that you could go and stay with her a little while, and take a basket of nice things to her from me." "That I will gladly," said the little girl, "I dearly love granny, and she loves me. She will be so happy. Make haste, mother, to pack the basket."

Compare this with:—

"Un jour sa mère ayant cuit et fait des galettes, lui dit, va voir comme se porte ta mère-grand, car on m'a dit qu'elle estoit malade, porte lui une galette et ce petit pot de beurre."

Red Riding Hood went, and after much dallying with the beauties of nature fell asleep, and the wolf, perhaps because of his bitten heels, trotted heavily on till he reached the grandmother's door and was told to enter:

"She was dreadfully frightened, as you may suppose, when she saw the wolf come in instead of her little grandchild. But the savage creature did not give her time to wonder. He jumped upon the bed, and ate her all up. But he did not hurt her so much as you would think, and as she was a very good old woman, it was better for her to die, than to live in pain, but still it was very dreadful of the wolf to eat her."

This is "the most unkindest cut of all." Many generations of children have read the story and have never withheld their meed of pity for the fate of the poor grandmother, and yet Mrs. Valentine tells the children of the present day that it was well that she should die.

"Cinderella," though it is said to be from Perrault, is another instance of want of literary faith. Mrs. Valentine begins by giving the story as narrated by Grimm, and then engrafts on it Perrault's version with a totally different kind of magical machinery. Apart from this it reads pleasantly enough. Is it not, however, rather too modern a touch, besides being absolutely the reverse of the tradition, when Mrs. Valentine writes that Cinderella at the ball took care to glance at a lovely little watch which was set in a clasp in her bracelet?

'Bluebeard' is much more like the story it professes to follow, but Mrs. Valentine ought not to have translated—

"Après quelques momens elle commença à voir que le plancher estoit tout couvert de sang caillé, et que dans ce sang se miroient les corps de plusieurs femmes mortes, et attachées le long des murs."

"In a short time, her eyes growing accustomed to the twilight, she perceived that the floor was covered with clotted blood, in which were lying the heads of several dead women, parallel with the walls."

The answer to the question, "Anne, ma sœur Anne, ne vois-tu rien venir?" "Je ne vois rien que le Soleil qui poudroye, et l'herbe qui verdoye"—an answer which Grimm delighted in as a bit of genuine oral tradition—might have been translated better than by "I see nothing but the sun which makes a dust, and the grass which looks green."

These objections are urged solely in the interest of those who, so far as popular stories are concerned, want the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Mrs. Valentine has not dealt with the subject from the point of view of folk-lore. Her object has been to gather together a highly readable collection of stories, and, with the exception of 'Red Riding Hood,' she has certainly succeeded, though, as she seems to have a repugnance to Grimm which she carries so far as not to give his name when she prints stories from the 'Hausmärchen,' she has had to fill up her volume from the stores of Madame d'Aulnoy and the Princesse de Beaumont. If stories read well children enjoy them no worse for being, as Grimm says, "pure inventions without any intrinsic value." Grown-up people, too, like to read of princes and princesses who never take a bath in anything commoner than rose water, whose curtains and bed furniture are constructed of butterflies' wings sewn together, whose prison walls, if prison be their hard lot, are, to say the least of it, of black marble, while their cells are of polished ebony. In Madame d'Aulnoy's stories the reader, great or small, who cares for this sort of thing may enjoy his fill of it, and we enjoy it ourselves, and only quarrel with Mrs. Valentine because she has used an author's name while giving a story which is none of his. There are a large number of illustrations, some of which are good, although even children will consider the colouring startling.

English Men of Action.—Warren Hastings.

By Sir Alfred Lyall, K.C.B. (Macmillan & Co.)

IN the current series of "English Men of Action" the first and perhaps the greatest of the Governors-General of India necessarily fills a conspicuous place. Few English statesmen of equal mark have had to maintain so long and desperate a fight against foes and obstacles of every conceivable kind. None of Hastings's successors had to face so sharp a trial with arms so clearly inadequate. He alone was hampered with a Council free to outvote him whenever they pleased, and too often bent on taking their own line at any cost. Frequently his hands were tied not only by the violence and rancour of his colleagues, but by the pressure of financial difficulties, the perverse action of local governments at Madras and Bombay, and the secret or open enmity of ministers, statesmen, and East India directors at home.

How he confronted the dangers and difficulties that marked his long rule has been told in more than one biography, as well as in Macaulay's glowing rhetoric. The present memoir, from the pen of Sir Alfred Lyall, the sometime ruler of a large Indian province, compresses into two hundred and thirty-five pages the story of Hastings's long and eventful life. Within the limits allowed him Sir Alfred has shown himself a skilful workman, a thorough master of his subject, an impartial critic, and a trustworthy guide among the vexed questions with which every writer on such a subject has to deal. His own official experience gives weight to his comments on many points of Hastings's public career. His sketches of contemporary Indian and European history serve to illustrate and emphasize the great part which Hastings filled on the political stage of his day. And his general conclusions touching the personal and public worth of Warren Hastings tally rather with those of his biographers than with the portraits drawn by Mill and Macaulay.

Sir Alfred is no lenient critic of the great man's shortcomings. Sometimes, to our thinking, he is too severe, and judges Hastings by the ethical standards of a much later day. When, for instance, he condemns Hastings for hiring out the Company's troops to aid the ruler of Oudh in conquering Rohilkhand, he seems to look at the whole transaction from much too modern a point of view. The fear of the Marathas, which he himself cites in excuse for Hastings, and the Company's financial straits—Hastings, he says, was "literally at his wits' end for ways and means"—were reasons strong enough at the time to justify a stroke of policy which put an end to Maratha raids across the Ganges, and materially strengthened the weak points along the Company's frontier. The moral sense of most Englishmen in the days of George III. did not deter them from employing Red Indians against enemies even of their own race in North America. Three years after the Rohilla war an English peer, from his place in Parliament, declared, with reference to this very practice, that "we were justified in using all the means which God and nature had put into our hands"; and Lord Chatham stood nearly alone in denouncing the use made of those "horrible hell-hounds of savage war." The troops of the Nawab-Vazir were no more savages than the Rohilla Afghans, and their excesses were grossly exaggerated, as Sir Alfred admits, by the Governor-General's critics, while the Rohilla chiefs were by no means the innocent lambs of Macaulay's splendid romance. To put the matter briefly, the whole question was one of politics rather than morals, and Hastings did what almost any man in his position would then have done.

On the question of Hastings's share in the prosecution and death of Nuncomar, Sir A. Lyall, after a careful review of the facts, sees

"on the whole no reason whatever to dissent from Pitt's view, who treated the accusation of a conspiracy between Impey and Hastings for the purpose of destroying Nuncomar as destitute of any shadow of solid proof."

Differing somewhat, however, from Sir James Stephen, he thinks that "if a hint to prosecute could rid the Governor-General of a formidable and treacherous enemy, it is by no means improbable that he may have thought himself warranted in delivering so opportune and decisive a counterstroke; and most men of his stamp would have done likewise."

At the same time he has the fairness to admit that no evidence of this hint "exists, or is likely to be forthcoming."

In the chapter on Benares and the Oudh Begams, Sir Alfred qualifies some large admissions to Hastings' credit by censures too finely pointed for daily use. It is surely beside the mark to say that Hastings "must bear the blame of having provoked the insurrection at Benares"; and it seems a strange mistake to contend that it is "not really a material question" whether Hastings had any fair warrant for his previous measures against the Rajah himself. The insurrection was only one incident in the chain of events which forced the Governor-General to demand a war subsidy from his wealthy, but contumacious vassal, and it might not have happened but for the oversight, not due to Hastings, which left his Sepoy escort at a critical moment without their ammunition. If circumstances and established custom justified Hastings, as even Pitt allowed, in demanding succour from Chait Singh, why should Hastings be held specially to blame for a passing miscarriage in the execution of his main design? And his high-handed proceedings both in this case and in that of the Oudh Begams should be judged by the customary ethics of his own day, not by the declamations of political partisans, nor by the more exacting moral standards of the present age. Sir A. Lyall indeed has small sympathy with the leaders of the famous impeachment, still less with Sir Philip Francis; but he seems at times to forget that the great man whose character he is discussing flourished more than a century ago.

Sir Alfred's sketch of the incidents and progress of the great trial in Westminster Hall is full of human interest and effective details. He might as well have referred to the account given by Fanny Burney of the impression produced by Burke's long opening oration; but against this omission may be set his useful reference to Erskine's successful speech in defence of the printer Stockdale, who had published a pamphlet condemning the House of Commons for their treatment of Hastings. The reader will also appreciate his able summary of Law's oration in answer to the Benares charge, and his lively picture of the defending counsel as they "toiled on in the task of picking to pieces the network of accusations, in dissecting propositions and arguments, exposing different sides of the same shield, setting one account of an affair against another flatly opposed to it, proving that saints were sinners and sinners saints.....until the vast collection of contradictory proofs and arguments must have become intellectually unmanageable."

In a small volume which deals mainly with the public work of a great historic statesman there is obviously little room left for the minor details of his private life. What of these Sir Alfred has supplied are carefully and ably touched in. A characteristic portrait of Hastings in his prime faces the title-page, but, as unfortunately is usual in this series, there is no index.

A History of Bridgwater. By Sydney Gardner Jarman. (Stock.)

THE interest felt in the history of any town that has given birth to a great man, or has been the theatre of memorable events, is not based on an irrational sentiment. It is from no blind instinct that people in all times and in all climes have been drawn to linger reverently at those spots upon the earth which have been the cradles of the earth's heroes, or which have been the battle-grounds where the great forces of good and evil have struggled for the destiny of the human race. A thoughtful man, when he finds himself pacing the streets of Florence or Stratford-upon-Avon, or the quiet little town that gave Cromwell birth, may well ask himself how it happened that there, and nowhere else, could be born a personality so colossal for action or colossal for thought as to be reflected by the features of the human family for ever. From no other set of circumstances of ancestry and environment could this particular great man have figured in life as we know him. With an oak tree the soil as well as the germ sleeping in the acorn has to do with every branch and every leaf. And must we not believe it to be the same with man? And if so, what share in the development of the hero belonged to the inevitable working of the ancestral strain, and what to those circumstances which we call accidental? Had the air of Huntingdon been more bracing—had the Ouse been less deliberate in its flow—would or would not Cromwell have meditated on the destiny of mankind? And would he or would he not have passed from meditation into those sombre broodings which the world knows of? And had he not passed into those moods, would or would not his character have developed into that dominating personality of his which not only turned the course of England's history, but taught the whole modern world a new lesson, resulting in the French Revolution—the lesson that in communities there is no other real power than that which lies between the hands of the people? Had the air of Stratford-upon-Avon been less luxurious and fragrant of Midland foliage and flowers—had it, for instance, been the sharp air of Haworth—would the purely poetical side of Shakespeare's work have been what it is? And, again, had he been born in London, and away from those riches of human character and whim which can only be fully seen in country towns and villages, would his humorous dramatis personæ, instead of showing that sweet freedom of movement which now belongs to them, have exhibited the metallic hardness of those typical men and women whom Ben Jonson created?

And turning to the interesting volume before us, supposing that Robert Blake had not been born in the modest town of Bridgwater, or supposing that the gardens of the ancestral Tudor house had looked over a landscape like that surrounding Keswick, instead of the expanse bounded by the undulations of the Quantock Hills, would that yearning for literary expression and for a quiet student life which was so strongly seen in his earlier years have developed into the literary passion—that passion which, when once fairly alight, becomes so obstinate that no array of circumstances can transmute the born "literator" into a mere man of action? As the birthplace of Blake, if for no other reason, Bridgwater deserved to have its history written; but in truth the town is rich in historic associations, beginning with the story of Alfred's taking refuge in the island of Athelney.

In the story of the struggle between Charles and his Parliament an important chapter has to be given to Bridgwater. When Fairfax and Cromwell entered Somerset in July, 1645, the county, with the exception of Taunton, held by Blake, was in the power of the Royalists; but this power rapidly melted away, and when Bridgwater, the last important Royalist stronghold in the west of England, capitulated the chain of Parliamentary garrisons became complete from Bristol to the English Channel, and the connexion between the Royalist forces in the West and those in other parts of England was cut off. This, of course, lends special importance to the siege of Bridgwater.

It will be remembered that after the defeat of Lord Goring at Langport, the Royalists fled precipitately to Bridgwater, a distance of ten miles to the south-east. Drawn up on Weston Moor, near Penzoy Pound (about two miles from the moat surrounding Bridgwater), the Parliamentarians waited to rest themselves and to receive the supplies that were on the road. The confident valour of the men led by Fairfax and Cromwell was never more brilliantly shown than at this time. When we consider that the Bridgwater garrison of Royalists—a garrison of fully eighteen hundred soldiers—was strengthened by a solid castle with forty guns, and an adequate stock of all other firearms, and that the magnificent moat, thirty feet wide, was filled with water at every tide, we shall realize that the Roundheads had some severe work before them. Yet not for a moment did they doubt of success. It is a pity, by-the-by, that the course of this moat, which has been long since built over, cannot now be fully traced. And it is irritating that "Moat Lane," which indicates the course the cutting took in the western part of the town, should have lost its name and been christened Albert Street. Nothing is more exasperating to the antiquary than this kind of folly.

To return to the Parliamentarians: they were not in the habit of quailing before any moat or any garrison. Cromwell in his speech to his men formulated a scheme for blocking out the tide at certain places in order to storm the town. And it was here that occurred an escape from death, which was perhaps the narrowest that even Cromwell ever had. The river Parret is subject to a tidal "bore"; that is to say, at each tide there rushes up the river a great billow, which at spring tide is several feet in height, and moves with remarkable swiftness. Mr. Jarman in the topographical section of his book, in mentioning this "bore," seems to suppose that it is a peculiar feature of the river Parret. Here he is mistaken; at the mouth of the Severn, for instance, there is a "bore" of much greater magnitude. The "bore" in a tidal river is the great wave moving in the van of the oncoming tide, as those who are familiar with the mighty rivers of America know only too well—especially those who are familiar with the Amazon, whose "bore" is over a hundred and fifty feet in height. Unfamiliar apparently with this feature of the Parret, Cromwell and Fairfax, after reconnoitring Bridgwater, crossed the river near Dunwear, and were at once caught in the "bore"; and if on that 14th of July, 1645, it had been as strong as it sometimes is the whole course of English history might have been different. The storming of Bridgwater was a brilliant affair. On the 23rd of July the town capitulated, and according to the Weekly Intelligencer, July 29th, 1645, capitulated upon extremely easy terms.

Mr. Jarman, who perhaps loves "the old and loyal town" rather less wisely than well, extols the loyalty of Bridgwater after the defeat of Lord Goring, and before the assault was delivered. This loyalty was owing partly to the strength of the garrison and partly to the ardour of Col. Wyndham and his wife, the latter of whom—an Amazon of a somewhat Gallic type, who, according to the evidence adduced by Mr. Crisp, was daughter of William Gerarde of Trent—was a most remarkable woman. It is related that when Cromwell and Fairfax approached the walls of the town in order to view it for storming purposes this lady herself fired a gun at Cromwell, and shot dead an officer who stood by his side, and that she afterwards sent a messenger to him to inquire "if he had received her love token," because "if he were a courtier he would in that case return the compliment." When the Roundheads got into the town she said to the Parliamentary messenger who came to negotiate terms of capitulation: "Tell them that the breast that gave suck to Prince Charles shall never be at their mercy, and that we will hold the town till the last." Mean time, however, certain tradesmen, owners of houses in Silver Street, Friar Street, and other parts of the town, were showing their "loyalty" by firing their shops in order to get rid of the Royalist garrison.

But Bridgwater and its vicinity are notable for still other reasons; it was here that was fought "the last fight," as Macaulay says, "deserving the name of a battle, that has been fought on English ground"—a battle in which for about an hour and a half a mob of six thousand farm labourers and miners stood up against three thousand regular infantry and cavalry. This was the battle of Sedgemoor.

There is at Bridgwater a remarkable collection of borough documents, many of which Mr. Jarman seems to have overhauled, but others still await examination. In the parish chest of Weston Zoyland there is a book containing the following entry, made probably by the vicar at the time:—

"An account of the fight that was in Langmere, the 5th of July, 1685, between the King's Army and the Duke of Monmouth. The engagement began between one and two of the clock in the morning, and continued near one hour and a half. There was killed upon the spot of the King's soldiers 16: five of them buried in the church, the rest in the churchyard, and they all had Christian burial. 100 or more of the King's soldiers wounded, of which many died, which now have no contained account. There was killed of the rebels upon the spot about 300, hanged with us 22, of which four were hanged in Gommaraish; about 500 prisoners brought into our church, of which there were 79 wounded, and five of them died of their wounds in our church. The D. of M— beheaded July 13th, A.D. 1685."

It is interesting to compare these figures with those of the historians. Mr. Jarman tells in interesting fashion the story of Monmouth's disastrous adventure, as will be seen by the following extract:—

"One or two well-authenticated incidents, which occurred after the battle, may be recounted here. Among the prisoners selected for execution was a youth, who had held an ensign's commission under the Duke of Monmouth: he was locally famous as a runner, and hopes were held out to him that his life would be spared if he could run a race naked with one of the colts of the marsh. The young fellow had a halter tied round his neck and affixed to the horse, the latter being then started at full speed. For three-quarters of a mile (the boundary marks being even now pointed out) he kept up with the horse, which then fell exhausted; he naturally expected that his life would be spared, but as soon as the performance was over he was hurried to the gallows. For a number of years afterwards the natives of the neighbourhood were wont to tell, in connection with this story, of the 'White Lady,' who was long seen about the great grave near Brentford Bridge, where in common with others the young ensign was buried. She was the betrothed of this young soldier, and she ultimately died, bereft of reason, at Weston Zoyland. Another intended victim was more fortunate. His name was John Swayne, or Swain, a native of Shapwick, and he was taken in bed the night after the battle by some of Col. Kirke's dragoons, or as they were better known, 'Kirke's Lambs.' On the following morning, with others, he was marched on the road to Bridgwater, followed by his sobbing wife and children, and a number of the villagers. When he arrived at Loxley Wood he fell on his knees and petitioned that the prayer of an unhappy father doomed to death might be heard, and that he might be allowed 'to show how far he could leap, that his children, when grown up, might keep him in remembrance.' His prayer was granted by his captors,—only too ready for a little relaxation, and the prisoner, being unfettered, took a run and three successive leaps, and before the soldiers had recovered from their astonishment, he had entered the adjoining coppice, which was so thickly wooded and so full of swamps as to render it impossible for the horses to follow. He remained in the ditches of the neighbourhood until the time of slaughter was over, when he returned to the bosom of his family. Four stones now mark the place where Swayne jumped, and are naturally pointed out to visitors as objects of interest. Another incident is that known as 'The Legend of the Sword.' It appears that whilst Lord Feversham was entertaining himself with the execution of the prisoners, many of his officers returned to Weston, and without ceremony went into different houses and ordered refreshments. One of them, described as an ill-bred ruffian, went into the mansion of the Bridges, which had recently been the headquarters of Lord Feversham, who, though not a welcome guest, had received all the attentions due to a stranger, by the laws of old English hospitality. The intruder found his way to the parlour, where the ladies were assembled (who had not recovered from the fright which the long-continued sounds of the great guns had occasioned), when the cowardly miscreant proceeded to offer a gross insult to the lady of the mansion, upon which her daughter, Mary (between eleven and twelve years of age), snatched his sword and stabbed him to the heart. She was brought before Col. Kirke and tried by a court-martial, when the young and interesting heroine was not only honourably acquitted, but also received an order that the sword should be given to her, with the request that it should descend to the future Mary Bridges of the family. It is now in the possession of Mrs. Dobree, of Wellington, Somerset."

The more purely local matters in the annals of Bridgwater are now recorded for the first time, and the most important of them are compiled from the borough archives—a labour of no mean difficulty. With regard to the Blakes, the Wyndhams, the Gerardes, the Wattses, and other Somersetshire families Mr. Jarman would have found interesting data in the 'Abstracts of Somersetshire Wills' printed by Mr. F. A. Crisp.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

Louis Draycott. By Mrs. R. S. De Courcy Laffan. 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

Three Diggers: a Tale of the Australian 'Fifties. By Percy Clarke, LL.B. (Samson Low & Co.)

Only a Sister? a Tale of To-day. By Walter Adam Wallace. (Roper & Drowley.)

Steadfast: the Story of a Saint and a Sinner. By R. T. Cooke. (Trübner & Co.)

If anyone be in exuberant spirits, or inclined to take an optimist view of life, let him read Mrs. Leith Adams's (Mrs. Laffan's) piteous story. For sustained misery it is certainly more complete than any book we have seen for a long time. Death and misfortune, disappointment and separation, all the keenest pangs human nature can suffer, are the lot of all the characters contained in it. Especially does fate delight in building up an ideal understanding between a pair of lovers, and then destroying their hopes by some external Nemesis they cannot possibly avoid. Yet, though her incidents are sombre, our author's teaching is high. The home-love of the circle in the suburban cul-de-sac glorifies its rather mean surroundings, and the reader is induced (a good test of art in the writer) to realize even the tall poplar in the back garden, which is a kind of γῆς ὀμφαλός to Aunt Dacie and her tribe.

There are some lively scenes in the story of 'Three Diggers,' as might well be imagined from its subject, and from the fact that it is based on the evidence of eye-witnesses. Mr. Clarke is not exactly to the manner born as a novelist, but his rough straightforwardness enables him to furnish an interesting narrative of wild Australian life, which seems to carry the stamp of truth.

'Only a Sister?' is the production of a clever man, who has doubtless learnt and thought a great deal, and it is notably well written. But, like the novels of many other clever men, it is overdrawn in the sensuous and humorous parts, and has received less than adequate care in the parts which required more delicate handling and deeper colouring. Mr. Wallace's hero is an impossible wonder; his amorous duke is treated with clumsy roughness, not to say coarseness; one of his villains is decidedly "of the Vic." Take the hero, "Daccarp Aikone, Doctor of Medicine and Law of Cambridge, and Barrister of Lincoln's-Inn," six feet four "in his boots," forty-nine inches round the chest, and weighing "sixteen stones." Aikone has the strength of an oak, and his blows are all delivered with intent to inflict grievous bodily harm. He had come mysteriously to Cambridge from Leyden, knowing four European languages; he left the Cam "after a course of unequalled brilliancy," a fellow of his college, and "well on his way to his doctorate in medicine and laws." That is a kind of hero rather rare at the University; and the manner in which Mr. Wallace treats so superlative a man is shabby. Aikone is a simple, modest giant, and this is how we find him making love to a girl in the country:—

"My dear Miss Mapleton—er—Rosie—er—you must allow me to say that I love—chook—dam—sh—"

A prize ram has butted him in the rear; and Mr. Wallace's readers will feel inclined to do with his book what Aikone did with the offending quadruped.

'Steadfast' is a fine story of New England life in the later Colony days—fine because it is just as faithful to the permanent and universal characteristics of humanity as it is to the features of the time and place in which its incidents are set. As for the second title, it is no nearer to the mark than the great majority of titles which seek to epitomize a long story in a few words. Several people deserve the name of sinner in Mr. Cooke's narrative; at least two women and one man are saints, being free from conscious malice, and capable of any reasonable self-sacrifice. However, quite apart from the title and its inferences, 'Steadfast' is a thoroughly good and lifelike story, which any one might be glad to read.

PHILOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Notes on Abbreviations in Greek Manuscripts. By T. W. Allen. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)—Mr. Allen's pamphlet is a contribution to a branch of palaeography in which much still remains to be done. Every one who has used a late minuscule Greek manuscript knows what a bewildering mass of symbols of contractions it presents; and if he has tried to investigate them systematically he knows how incomplete is the aid at present offered by the recognized handbooks. Even those that have of late years dealt more particularly with this department of the science leave a good deal to be desired. In spite of Lehmann and Giltbauer, there is at present no satisfactory guide to the chronological development of the abbreviations in use in Greek MSS., and especially as to those which are more distinctively tachygraphic. As Mr. Allen himself says, the chief want at present is the accumulation of more material, and in this pamphlet he aims at little more than contributing to the common stock some of the results of his observations upon certain specified MSS. Such a scheme naturally leaves little to criticize. The value of the work depends on its accuracy, and Mr. Allen's manner leads one to conclude that he is a careful and trustworthy observer. The general arrangement of the book is clear. The syllables of which abbreviations are given are discussed in alphabetical order, with references to the plates of photographic facsimiles; and the source from which each specimen is drawn is clearly indicated. The plates themselves constitute a great portion of the value of the book for purposes of reference. Handbooks of palaeography are useless without facsimiles, and facsimiles are almost invariably misleading unless they are photographic. On the other hand, photographic reproductions are apt to be somewhat indistinct; and the Clarendon Press is therefore to be congratulated on having produced facsimiles which are at once photographic and clear. Within its own limits, in short (which Mr. Allen would be ready to admit are not very wide), there is little to be said of this book but praise. On one point only is it to be regretted that there has not been more distinctness, and that is in the difference between the "ordinary" and "tachygraphic" systems of abbreviation. Several of the examples which are given among the ordinary compendia are properly tachygraphic, and consequently the second section of the work, which professes to deal with tachygraphy, goes over much of the same ground as the first. No doubt it is not easy to say where abbreviation stops and shorthand begins. Many of the symbols used in the ordinary late minuscule MSS. are really as much shorthand as anything in the British Museum Nonnus, or others of the recognized "tachygraphic" MSS.; and it is not impossible that they are in fact borrowed from the earlier shorthand system, which existed as far back as the first century. Still, for the purposes of classification distinctions must be drawn if possible, and we require really a threefold division of the subject into (1) abbreviations properly so called; (2) shorthand forms habitually used in "ordinary" writing; (3) tachygraphic forms, i.e., those characteristic of professed schools of shorthand, like the Byzantine or Grotta Ferrata scribes. But the indistinctness, if it is such, which we have mentioned is not serious, and does not detract from the real value of the book, which every palaeographer will find useful for purposes of reference. It is at once a testimony to the merits of the system under which the Craven Fellowships are at present bestowed, and an earnest of good work in the future in a science in which good work is required; and we are thoroughly glad to hear of the important commission which the Delegates of the Clarendon Press have given to Mr. Allen, to examine and report on the Greek MSS. (meaning presumably those of classical authors) in the various libraries of Europe. There is much that will still repay investigation in many MSS. of comparatively late date, which have often been overlooked, though they may represent a valuable text; and Mr. Allen's present pamphlet seems to indicate that the work has fallen into competent hands.

Gai Valeri Catulli Carmina. Recognovit Joh. P. Postgate. (Bell & Sons.)—This elegant little book should be on every scholar's table. The editor has taken immense pains to do something for the very corrupt—perhaps in many cases hopelessly corrupt—text of Catullus, and his preface gives, in a very short space, a clear idea of what the manuscript evidence is and what is the present position of the problem. Difficult as that problem is, we are inclined to agree with Prof. Postgate that modern scholarship has done much for the text of Catullus, and that probably it will do a great deal more. Since Ellis and Baehrens and Munro, many new conjectures have been proposed, of which a number, no doubt, will be rejected by the judgment of the learned, but some will probably live, either to be adopted or to form the basis for future improvement. This uncertainty about the text, however deplorable in the case of a great poet whose name belongs to literature, is inevitable when the text has come down to us in a badly mutilated condition. If we are not mistaken, Mr. Postgate's new text of Catullus will be recognized as marking, on the whole, an advance on any preceding one—an advance small indeed, it may be granted; but in such a matter rapid progress is now impossible. Among the novel emendations proposed by Mr. Postgate, or adopted by him from others, the following seem to us good, though we should be sorry to call them certain. In xxix. 20, for "Hunc Gallie timet et Britanniae," eine Gallie ultima et Britanniae; "Are the ends of Gaul and Britain to be for him?" Eine is from Baehrens, but ultima is Mr. Postgate's. In lxii. 53, "Hanc nulli agricolae, nulli accollere iuveni," for accollere, which no one has satisfactorily explained, Mr. Postgate writes a, collere, which may be right, unless Baehrens has judged correctly in making the a a mere uncorrected repetition of co in collere. In xxxi. 13, "Gaudete vos o lidie [or lydie] lacus undae," Mr. Postgate would read liquida, which is nearer the manuscript than the limpida of Avantiis. In lxiii. 62, 63, "Quod enim genus figuraest, ego quod non habuerim? Ego mulier, ego adulescens, egoephebus, ego puer," &c., ego mulier is extremely difficult, however it be taken. Ego enim vir, Mr. Postgate's correction, seems to hit the sense required, and is not too far from the manuscripts. On the other hand, we do not care much for "paulum Istos: commodum enim: volo ad Sarapin Deferri" (x. 26) for istos commoda; nor for Baehrens's crissantem for trusantem (lvi. 6); nor for "is mos populi" (lxvii. 12). In lxiv. 109 we do not like Mr. Postgate's "late casu cuncta obvia frangens," of the falling tree, nearly so much as the "lateque comis obvia frangens" of Munro, whose mastery of Latinity, by the by, has been set in a clearer light than ever by the recent discussions on Catullus. In lxii. 21, 22, "Qui natam possis complexu avellere matris, Complexu matris retinentem avellere natam," no alteration seems to us necessary, though Baehrens would read retinente, and Mr. Postgate complexum, in the second line. In lxiv. 282, "Aura parit flores tepidi fecunda Favoni," Mr. Postgate writes aperit for parit, from Mr. Housman. But what then becomes of fecunda, and Lucretius's "genitabilis aura Favoni," and of Callimachus's ἀνθεα.....Ζεφύρον πνέοντος ἔερσιν, which Ellis and Baehrens quote in support of parit? Mr. Postgate, we are glad to say, declines to take the corrupt manuscripts of Catullus as guides for his ancient Latin orthography. He should not, however, have sinned against the laws of Latin formation by writing "Thuanæus" for Thuanus in his modern Latin.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicles from 800-1001 A.D. Edited, with Introduction and Notes and a Complete Glossary, by J. F. Davis. (Whittaker & Co.)—From the character of this book we infer that it is intended for the use of candidates for some public examination for which a portion of the Chronicles is prescribed as one of the subjects. The text consists of extracts from the Winchester and Peterborough Chronicles, so arranged as to form a continuous history of the period embraced. The work is creditably executed, but the omission of the accents in the glossary is a serious defect. In the text the haphazard accentuation of the MSS. has been retained. This is the right course in an edition for scholars, but in a book of this kind the accents should either be omitted altogether or normalized throughout.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MRS. J. E. PANTON'S Nooks and Corners (Ward & Downey) is a companion volume to her former book on furnishing and household management, called 'From Kitchen to Garret.' Not long ago her book about the scenery near London—"By-Paths and Cross-Roads"—was noticed in these columns, and, if the opinion may be expressed without impertinence, it is more agreeable to meet her indoors than in suburban lanes. Her good-humoured, optimistic, unflinching flow of talk does not seem at all out of place among comfortable armchairs and pretty corner-seats, and if only one-third of the book deals with the matters indicated in the title, and the rest is devoted to domestic details of a still more intimate nature, a lady writing for ladies is within her right when she runs off into such enthralling topics as the nursery and the girls' dress. Mrs. Panton evidently has had much experience in furnishing, and supplies a number of useful hints, but the style in which she chooses to give them takes away from their value, because it would be impossible to find the particular piece of information for which one might seek without reading through several chapters. The key of Mrs. Panton's system is "Aspinal," a word which is to her not only a proper name, but a neuter substantive, an adjective, and a verb. She is not always wise—who cares to be in the course of a long gossiping conversation? Her Edwin and Angelina will find it expensive work if they determine to paint a whole room with "Aspinal's neat little tins" of paint, and they really ought not to be advised to choose blue for a London hall—it is too cold and dark. Mrs. Panton advises them to live in London rather than the country. She has tried both, and knows better than to say that the country is cheaper. But whereabouts in London will they find a house rented at 100*l.* a year (see p. 192) where "you can at any moment hail any vehicle" (see p. 8)? It is, moreover, a counsel of perfection to advise people with an income of 1,000*l.* a year to live in London at a rent of no more than 100*l.* a year. Emphasis must be laid upon the words "in London," because in the suburbs "the house rent and taxes would come to 50*l.*" Edwin and Angelina will do well to distrust Mrs. Pantons' finance; but they will find her a useful lady-guide on a shopping expedition.

THE late Lord Lytton says somewhere that the only notion a Scotchman has of humour lies in the use of a broad form of Scotch dialect. The judgment is hasty and untrue; but such a book as Lays and Letters from Linton, by Samuel Mucklebackit (James Lumsden) published by Mr. Sinclair, of Haddington, goes far to justify the dictum. The author deprecates criticism on the ground of the trials and troubles during which the greater part of his volume was composed. With such allowance, or even without it, it may be acknowledged that the writer shows a sound knowledge of Lowland Scotch, a form of English that is too forcible and too tender to be lost without regret on the part of every lover of his native tongue, and that some of his verses have a ring of originality and vigour. Such lines as the following,—

An' lasses sweet as lads are stoure,
Braw, cockernooned leddies,
Wi' faces that would papists sour
Mak' benedicts an' daddies!
Nae prim-faced, dwarfish, dolly jades
That lad or guidman bothers,
But licht an' strappin', stately maids, Proud Scotland's future mothers!

are above the average of the contributions to the poets' corner of a local newspaper. He is also well skilled in the old Scottish forms of rhythm, though his employment of them is apt to provoke invidious comparisons. Altogether his muse is too imitative. The long prose dissertations between Samuel and the Auld Dominie are too like the 'Noctes' with the wit eliminated; and when the lines of Burns run in his head the author generally manages to weaken the flavour of the original.

Time seemed still to augment the force
Of that great grief which o'er me flowed is a poor substitute for

Time but th' impression deeper makes,
As streams their channels deeper wear,— surely one of the finest similes in poetry! The best quality of the book is the graphic representation of homely life in the Lothians ('Hansel Monday' and 'Hiring Friday' are good instances of what we mean), and from an agricultural point of view there is much humour in the way in which the astute Dominie made his excellent bargain with Lord Glum for the farm of Blae-braes.

MR. JOSEPH HATTON collects a store of personal and incidental gossip—which has done service already from week to week—under the title of Old Lamps and New: an After-dinner Chat (Hutchinson & Co.). Some of it is unmistakably interesting, and even well written, whether fresh or stale. Some is merely vamped up, as must of necessity be the case when an average writer undertakes to supply virtually unlimited "chat" about the notabilities of the day. But the piecing together has been done cleverly enough to serve its turn, and Mr. Hatton's book does him as much credit as he could wish. It might have done him more without the elaborated and rather pretentious preface, in which he has thought well to write a little essay on lamps.

Palestine. By Major Conder, R.E. (Philip & Son).—The editors of the "World's Great Explorers and Explorations" have been fortunate in their selection of an author for the 'Palestine' volume of their series. Major Conder is well known from the active part he has taken in the exploration of Palestine, and by his numerous published works on subjects connected with the Holy Land. No one has seen so much of the country, and few men have been brought into such close and continuous contact with that most interesting of people the fellahin of Palestine. He therefore writes with authority; and the present volume, which we think is the most finished work that has come from his pen, will certainly add to his reputation. It is charmingly written, contains much information in a convenient form, and is well illustrated by woodcuts and maps. Major Conder, in an introductory chapter, gives a useful sketch of previous explorations in Palestine, with portraits of some of the explorers, amongst whom we are glad to see the celebrated American Dr. Robinson, who was the first to attempt a scientific investigation of the geography of the Holy Land. He then describes the explorations in Judea, Samaria, Galilee, Moab, Gilead, and Northern Syria; and concludes with a valuable chapter on the results of the explorations. A notable feature of the book is the number of maps. There are a good general map of the country; physical and geological maps; and maps of Palestine, as apportioned amongst the Twelve Tribes, as it was in the beginning of the Christian era, as parcelled out into fiefs about 1187 A.D., and as it is now divided for administrative purposes by the Turkish Government. There are also specimens of ancient maps of considerable interest. A good index, and lists of Old and New Testament sites in Palestine which have been identified, add much to the value of the work. Several of the identifications and conclusions proposed for acceptance are still open to question, but any discussion of them would exceed the limits of a short notice. The story of the great work which a young engineer officer was called upon to undertake, and which, sometimes under most trying circumstances, he carried to a successful conclusion, is one that no one can read without pleasure and profit.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. send us Clubs for Working Girls, by Miss Maude Stanley, an unpretentious little book, the title of which explains its nature. Miss Stanley is of opinion that there is no better means of preventing those improvident early marriages to which she traces the greater portion of the miseries of the poor than the institution of clubs for working girls, which form in many cases a home for those who would otherwise have none.

The Letters of the Rev. John Ker, D.D. (1866-1885), which Mr. David Douglas of Edinburgh has published, are, as might be expected from a Scotch minister, largely taken up with theological matters. Dr. Ker was evidently an amiable and accomplished man, but unless his correspondence belies him he took little real interest in any but professional topics, or he may have supposed that his correspondents did not. The tone of the letters is excellent.

Our Cats and All about Them. By Harrison Weir. (Tunbridge Wells, Clements & Co.)—Mr. Harrison Weir, who is President of the National Cat Club, has written a nice book about cats. Of the two great subdivisions of mankind—more marked, perhaps, than that of man and woman, certainly than that of good and bad, or white and black, or indeed any other—that of those who do and those who don't like cats, the former will be delighted to have this book, the latter will not. The former are certainly the more to be envied, and they will find the book decidedly agreeable reading.

The Letters of the Duke of Wellington to Miss J., 1834-51 (Fisher Unwin), had better not have been published. "Miss J.," who was apparently at once vain and self-righteous, commenced the correspondence with the idea of converting the duke to her own religious ideas, but speedily showed a longing to become the second Duchess of Wellington, a wish which the duke had no desire to gratify. Why he allowed Miss J. for so many years to pester him with her letters it is hard to say. The editor of the volume, an American lady of the name of Herrick, is rightly distrustful of Miss J.'s statements; but it seems to us that not one of them can be accepted which rests on her authority only. For instance, her assertion that in 1834, when she first wrote to the duke, "she was not aware that he was the conqueror of Bonaparte," is on the face of it incredible.

FROM MESSRS. HARRISON & SONS we have received Sir Bernard Burke's massive volume, his Dictionary of the Peerage and Baronage. No new peerage has been created during the year and one has become extinct, or rather, three have been extinguished by the disappearance of one, the Dukedom of Buckingham. Seven baronetcies, on the other hand, have been created, and four have become extinct. There has not been time to mark the decease of Sir Percy Shelley in the body of the work. We observe that Sir Bernard still maintains his quaint entry "Mr. Shelley was unfortunately drowned 8 July, 1822."—Another well-known peerage, Debrett's Peerage, Baronage, and Knightage (Dean & Son), is also on our table. Like Sir Bernard's magnum opus, it is an encyclopædia in disguise, and its extraordinary wealth of addresses makes it most useful to journalists.

OF the other books of reference before us The Educational Annual (Philip & Son) of Mr. Johnson deserves praise for its utility and freedom from pretension.—The Service Almanack (Harrison & Sons) is also useful; but as we have said before, we think it is unwise in the "chronological synopsis" to omit almost every British defeat.

THE journal of "The Ruskin Reading Guild" has now taken to itself the name of Igdrasil, and enlarged itself from being a medium of communication between sundry Ruskin and Carlyle societies into a magazine appealing to a wider public. Mr. W. Marwick and Mr. Kineton Parkes are the editors, and Mr. Allen, of Orpington, is the publisher.

EVERY man of science knows how difficult it is to keep up with the literature of his special study, and the enormous increase in the number of periodicals published in various parts of the world makes it highly desirable that some summary of their contents should be accessible for reference. But the Review of Reviews, of which the first number is before us, only gives an account of the contents of a few of the most popular periodicals published in this country, France, the United States, Italy, and Germany. Not only is the whole of the great mass of foreign periodicals of a scientific character ignored, but English magazines dealing with art, science, or philology are passed over, such as the Portfolio, the Classical Review, the Journal of Philology, the Antiquary, the Reliquary, the Archæological Review, the Philosophical Magazine, the Law Quarterly, Botanical Magazine, &c. Mr. Stead promises to remedy this defect in future numbers, and if his journal is to be useful, he must not be afraid of being encyclopædic. Such "character sketches" as that of Mr. Stanley in the present number might be dispensed with, as they have no real connexion with the proper aim of the new periodical.

OF the annual volumes which the New Year brings, we may mention the third volume of the new series of the Reliquary (Bemrose & Son), containing excellent contributions by Father Hirst, Mr. Romilly Allen, Mr. Harold Dillon, Dr. Cox, Mr. Phillimore, and other antiquaries,—the Journal of Education, one of the best periodicals of the day,—the Monthly Chronicle of North-Country Lore (Scott), and Vol. VIII. of the Western Antiquary (Redway), two good specimens of popular magazines of an antiquarian cast.

WE have on our table Short Biographies for the People, by Various Writers, Vol. VI. (R.T.S.),—Reports of Artisans on the Paris Exhibition, 1889 (Roworth),—Appeal to Conservatives, by A. Comte, translated by T. C. Donkin and R. Congreve (Trübner).—Five Months' Fine Weather in Canada, Western U.S., and Mexico, by Mrs. E. H. Carbutt (Low).—The Teacher's Manual of Geography, by J. W. Redway (Boston, U.S., Heath).—The Art of Breathing, by L. Kofler (Trübner).—A System of Harmony for Teacher and Pupil, by J. A. Broekhoven (Novello).—Spacial and Atomic Energy, by F. Major, Parts I. and II. (Eyre & Spottiswoode).—Key to Lock's Arithmetic for Beginners, by the Rev. R. G. Watson (Macmillan).—Rose and Thorn, by K. L. Bates (Nelson).—After Shipwreck, by J. A. Owen (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Company).—Divided Lives, by E. Fawcett (Drane).—A Warrior King, by J. Evelyn (Blackie).—Dora's Dolls' House, by the Hon. Mrs. Greene (Nelson).—Golden Silence, by Emma Marshall (Nisbet).—My "Hansom" Lays, by W. Beatty-Kingston (Chapman & Hall).—Verses written in India, by Sir Alfred Lyall (Kegan Paul & Co.).—Milton's L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, Arcades, Lycidas, Sonnets, &c., with Introduction and Notes by W. Bell (Macmillan).—Psalms of the West (Kegan Paul & Co.).—Les Artistes Littéraires, Études sur le XIX. Siècle, by M. Spronck (Paris, Lévy).—Dix Contes, by J. Lemaitre (Paris, Lecene & Oudin).—Ueber Pausanias, by W. Gurlitt (Grätz, Leuschner & Lubensky).—Education et Hérité, Étude Sociologique, by M. Guyau (Paris, Alcan).—Astronomisches aus Babylon, oder das Wissen der Chaldäer über den Gestirnen Himmel, by I. Epping (Freiburg, Herder).—Die Echtheit der Paulinischen Hauptbriefe, by R. Lindemann (Zurich, Schröter & Meyer).—and Shakespeare der Autor seiner Dramen, by K. H. Schaible (Siegle). Among New Editions we have Celticism a Myth, by J. C. Roger (E. W. Allen).—The Ancient British Church, by W. L. Alexander, D.D. (R.T.S.).—Manual of Object Lessons, by A. Park (J. Heywood).—and A Treatise on Dynamics of a Particle, by P. G. Tait and W. J. Steele (Macmillan).

AUSTRALIAN CANNIBALS.

Athenæum Club, Jan. 6, 1890.

ALLOW me to state (though without in any way impugning Mr. Lumboltz's accuracy as to the tribe amongst whom he dwelt) that there are—perhaps I ought to say were, since they disappear so quickly—many Australian tribes to whom cannibalism was as repulsive as it can be to Europeans.

Taplin's 'South Australian Folk-lore' confirms as to South Australia my own observations in New South Wales. The strange rite in vogue among the Dieyerie tribe in South Australia was horrible, but scarcely comes under the category of using human flesh as food. Moreover it is hard to visit upon all the sins of some. It would be harsh to accuse the English of being cannibals because a few years ago a poor English boy was devoured by his countrymen in a boat.

I doubt whether any necessity would have brought an Australian to such a pass. Hungering almost to death, an Australian would, if food were given to him, divide it equally with his companion. This may not be a great virtue, but neither is its contrary, which is often found in Europe.

I thank you for your exposure of the brutalities which, it seems, occur in Queensland still on what we idly call the fringe of civilization, where rifles in the hands of white barbarians destroy the helpless holders of wooden weapons. Such exposures as yours form the only hope of amendment; for the rascals who do these deeds are afraid of criticism, if of nothing else.

G. W. RUSDEN.

SURNAMES ENDING IN "S."

New Club, Glasgow.

I CAN confirm Mr. Rybe's conjecture that the final s in names frequently means "son of,"

from the usage of our kin in the North Frisian islands. Until the latter half of the eighteenth century surnames were unknown in Heligoland. A child was named after his grandfather (or other relative), with his father's Christian name as second name. Thus, as Oetker has observed, if a man called Jasper had a son who was to be named Pai, the boy's full name would be Pai Jaspers; his son, again, would be Jasper Paiens, and so on. "Son of" was indicated by s or en or ens. In 1763 the Government insisted on the use of proper surnames, but the usage seems long to have been variable, such names as Jasper Jaspers, Klaas Klaasen, &c., indicating some confusion between legal and customary nomenclature. I know one name of this kind now borne in Heligoland, viz. Heike Heikens. I may, perhaps, mention that Oetker does not notice that as a matter of fact the old system of naming is kept up by the use of three names. The surname is now fixed, the first name is variable, but the middle name generally commemorates the father or grandfather. A man is just as often known by his first two names as by his surname. Thus a young fisherman named Hans Dreier Paiens or Payens (pronounced Poins), whom I know very well, is nearly always called by his friends "Hans Dreier." Oetker has noticed the extensive use of nicknames in Heligoland; he wrote in 1855, but I can fully confirm his statement, and, indeed, not only an interesting, but an amusing paper might be written about Heligoland nomenclature.

WILLIAM GEORGE BLACK.

Bury, Lancashire, Dec. 30, 1889.

I HASTEN to correct an error in my former communication, wherein I quoted a certain family document as substantiating Mr. Rybe's suggestion as to the final cognominal s being an abbreviation for "son." I quoted from memory, and I now find that my information is inaccurate, my slip having been caused by a confusion often latent in many minds after perusing a legal fabrication! I feel it my duty, therefore, to recall my former statement before it shall have time to mislead. I was unable at the time of writing my letter to verify the information it sought to give, and, trusting in a usually faithful memory, was seduced into the statement of a substantially inaccurate assertion. S. C.

MR. WILLIAM GILBERT.

BORN in 1804, the late William Gilbert died at his house in the Close, Salisbury, on the 3rd of last month, after having been the witness of the most stirring events in this century, and having seen the rise and decline of many a great literary reputation. He was not an author by early choice or inclination. He began life by being a midshipman in the service of the East India Company; after leaving that Company's service, he qualified himself for practising as a surgeon, but when he was prepared to do so, a legacy enabled him to live without labour. He began to write books, not as an occupation, but as a means of making life more interesting, his first work of note appearing when he was not much under sixty. He displayed originality at the outset, and if he had been stimulated to write by the necessity of earning his daily bread, he might have been a second De Foe. No modern writer has written so closely in De Foe's style as William Gilbert; indeed, he readily admitted that the author of 'Robinson Crusoe' was his master in the art of putting things. The works by him which will be remembered the longest are 'Dives and Lazarus,' 'Margaret Meadows,' 'Dr. Austin's Guests,' and 'Shirley Hall Asylum.' Perhaps a book for boys deserves an immortality which none of them may achieve; that is, 'King George's Middy.' The most ambitious was one on 'Lucrezia Borgia,' which proved that writing history was not William Gilbert's forte. The qualities for which his well-known son, W. S. Gilbert, is celebrated, were marked in him. He wrote of himself, with perfect truth, that he had "a keen sense of the ridiculous," and that "to avoid the painful, I often find myself seeking shelter in the ridiculous." Few of the men who are buried in the crypt of Salisbury Cathedral were more painstaking in their generation than William Gilbert, the last person, we believe, who is to be interred there. His works number upwards of twenty-five, and though he died at a great age, he had not lost hope of adding to their number. Happily for his fame, he did not live to write what no admirer could read, and happily also for it his son continues the best traditions of his father as a man of letters.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

DURING a recent stay on the Continent, I was much astonished to find that American editions of English copyright books were sold in all the principal cities of Italy. It seemed to me an extremely unfair thing that the sale of the legitimate Tauchnitz edition, in countries which have agreed to the terms of the Berne Conference, should be injured by an edition published in America, which can be sold at a lower price because nothing is paid for authors' rights. Baron Tauchnitz is, however, so intimately acquainted with the customs of continental booksellers that he may well be left to take care of his own interests, but for the large number of writers who have not disposed of their rights to the great German publisher there seems but little protection against piracy. It may be thought that so few of the pirate copies are sold that the evil is hardly worth notice. Such, I believe, is not the case. In Florence, Venice, and Rome there are large colonies of English people in addition to the crowds of tourists who visit Italy each year. Now these persons are all of them more or less cultured, and may be expected to take some interest in contemporary literature. I have been told that a single bookseller in Rome has sold over two hundred copies of different works by Mr. Ruskin. The greatest trade is of course done in works which are very famous and at the same time very expensive in England. A complete edition of 'Modern Painters' is to be had for seven francs, and 'Atalanta in Calydon' with other poems may be had for about a franc and a half. People unfortunately buy in the cheapest market, and so long as pirate editions are the cheapest, people will buy them if they can get them. I have written to Messrs. Chatto & Windus on the subject, and they intend, I believe, making further inquiries. I have ventured to trouble you with this letter in the hope that some steps may be taken to put an end to a scandal which is daily assuming greater proportions.

CHARLES T. J. HIATT.

THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS.

A MEETING is to be held in London next Wednesday for the purpose of considering a series of resolutions drawn up by Prof. Douglas and Dr. Leitner on behalf of 130 Orientalists. The first of these is an expression of gratitude to the King and people of Sweden for their reception of the Congress last autumn. The second runs:—

"That the original principles of the International Congress of Orientalists, as laid down at its first meeting in Paris in 1873 in the 'Statuts définitifs adoptés par l'Assemblée Internationale,' be maintained in their integrity."

The third proposes that the next Congress should be held in London from the 1st to the 10th of September, 1891. The fourth fixes a subscription of 25 francs for all members, natives or visitors, ladies or gentlemen. The fifth is as follows:—

"That the committees proposed by the French General Assembly for the various countries (with power to add to their number) be accepted, and that the English organizing committee for the next Congress thus elected place itself in communication with the above-mentioned committees and with Orientalists generally in order to receive and give early information of the questions to be discussed at the next Congress, to suggest subjects or methods of inquiry to specialists and travellers, to arrange for prize essays and other awards, to summarize the researches made on every field of Oriental learning since 1886, and to propose measures for the cultivation of Oriental studies in various countries as indicated in the enclosed circular."

The sixth and seventh are self-denying ordinances, abolishing special privileges for any one class of members and distinctions of any kind, except those conferred by the Congress itself, and laying down that there shall be only two banquets, one at the beginning and the other at the end of the Congress, and only two excursions out of London after the conclusion of the labours of the Congress. The seventh provides that the prizes and other awards be, as far as possible, equally distributed among the various branches of Oriental learning.

THE BOOK SALES OF 1889.

THOUGH the number—fifty-seven in all—of sales by auction during the season 1888-9 has been much the same as in preceding years, the quality of the books offered for competition is by no means remarkable. Where a sale shows an average of 1*l.* per lot the record may be considered good; but in the majority of instances this has not been reached. The most noticeable collections were the Hopetoun House library, dispersed in February last; the Mansfield-Mackenzie and a portion of the Buccleuch library in March; the Burnett and the Goldamid sales in April; the "Library of a Collector" at Messrs. Puttick's, and the Thornhill sale, also in April; the Smith and the Gatton Park sales in May; the Streatfield, Hildyard, Crawford, and Burton-Constable libraries in June; the Halliwell-Phillipps, the Buckinghamshire, and the Perkins collections in July. In these nearly everything of any importance is to be found, the remainder consisting mainly of works which, though doubtless desirable from one point of view, are continually being offered for competition, excite but little interest, and are knocked down, one after the other, at sums which might be predicted beforehand, so little do they vary. It is from the least important sales that the most certain results are obtained, average books on these occasions being disposed of for average prices; excitement culminating in reckless bids is unknown; the whole proceedings are reduced to one dead level, the most favourable for critical observation. On the other hand, the Roxburghe sale, which took place at the duke's residence, St. James's Square, in 1812, and which occupied forty-two days, indicated a state of things which is repeated to a greater or less extent on every occasion on which a library of more than ordinary importance comes to the hammer. Prices rule high, and books which at any other time would pass almost unnoticed suddenly acquire an interest by reason of their proximity to works of undoubted rarity and great pecuniary value. Nicol, the Pall Mall bookseller, who compiled the Roxburghe catalogue, was aware of this tendency, and by a process of wedging managed to lift into prominence a considerable number of the ten thousand volumes under his charge, which had they been sold by themselves or in bad company would not have realized anything like the sums paid for them. If the much-talked-of Althorp sale should ever become an accomplished fact we shall probably find that the greatest dispersion of the century will proceed upon lines historically laid down so long ago as 1812, which have been followed more or less ever since.

The season 1888-9 opened with a high-class sale at Sotheby's on December 10th and 11th, Ariosto's 'Orlando Furioso,' 4 vols. 4to. 1773, large paper, selling for 27*l.*, while a month later a small-paper copy was disposed of for 2*l.*, a sum rather below the average. The difference between these amounts calls attention to the undoubted fact that the productions of the Baskerville press are at a discount, save in the case of the best examples. In this respect they rank with the works turned out by Aldus, with most of those of the Elzevirs—in this country at any rate—and with nearly all classics. Even the golden fleece of Longpierre could not rescue a copy of Virgil, 8vo. 1743, Edinburgh, nor prevent it changing hands for thirty shillings. The sale of Sir Thomas Phillippe's library, or rather of a portion of it, in January, 1889, disclosed nothing of much importance, except a copy of Schoiffer's 'Epistles of St. Jerome,' Mayence, 1470, folio, 53*l.* 10*s.*, and a private press copy of the 'Testamenta Lambethana,' 1854, folio, 13*l.* Passing by a number of smaller sales, and noting on the way Tennyson's 'Poems,' first edition, in the original boards, 1833, 8vo., 10*l.*; 'Æsop's Fables,' Verona, 1479, 4to., 43*l.*; and a set of the Ray Society's publications from the commencement in 1844 to 1885, 37 vols. 8vo. and 18 vols. 4to., 22*l.*, we come to the Hopetoun House library, dispersed by Messrs. Sotheby on the 25th of February and three following days. Here a copy of the so-called Mazarin Bible of 1450 (!) was knocked down for 2,000*l.*; the copy was damaged, and consequently could not compare with Sir John Thorold's, which sold for 3,900*l.*, or with the Earl of Crawford's, which fetched 2,650*l.* A beautiful specimen of Clovis Eve's binding on the 'Noctes Atticæ' of 1566, Lyons, realized 25*l.*, and a large-paper copy of Cicero's 'Epistolæ,' Aldus, 1533, in its original Venetian covers, 21*l.* The 'Chronica Hungarorum,' printed at Buda in 1473, folio, sold for 79*l.*, an autograph inscription, "Gregorius Biccicus Budisinus, 1539," and notes in the same hand, doubtless greatly affecting the price. 15*l.* 15*s.* for the first Aldine edition of Dante, Venetiis, 1502, 8vo., would half a century ago have been considered little, though perhaps the 'Cose Volgari' of Petrararch, first Aldine edition on vellum, Venice, 1501, 8vo., never was worth any more than the price paid for it, viz. 300*l.* That scarcest and most valuable of all the first editions of the ancient classics, the editio princeps of Virgil, printed at Rome by Sweynheym and Pannartz, most probably in 1469, realized no less a sum than 590*l.* Not more than seven copies of this famous work can now be traced, and the last occasion on which one was sold by auction was at the La Vallière sale at Paris in 1784, when, though imperfect, it realized 4,101*fr.* With a note of the first Aldine edition of the same author's works, Venice, 1501, 8vo., 24*l.* 10*s.*, the first book, it will be remembered, ever printed in italics, the record of the Hopetoun House sale is necessarily cut short. Most of the books sold consisted of Greek and Latin classics, and were therefore, with a few exceptions, in ill repute.

The Mansfield-Mackenzie sale, which occupied eight days of March, was remarkable for its picture-books. By "picture-books" I mean modern works illustrated by popular artists, such as Rowlandson, Cruikshank, "Phiz," Leech, Buss, and the rest. There was also a fine assortment of theatrical works, all in good condition, and many of them so scarce as to be practically unprocurable. The prices realized point more clearly to the prevailing mania than any amount of speculative inquiry could possibly do. We have here proof positive that the public have discarded Virgil and Homer for Pierce Egan, and the talented author of 'Airy Nothings in a Circumbendibus, Hop, Step and Jump,' who in the year 1825 clothed himself with the pseudonym of "Olio Rigmaroll." The following prices, extreme though they may be, appear to have been easily obtained. The thirty-seven numbers of 'Actors by Gaslight,' 8vo. 1838, 5*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*; 'The Attic Miscellany,' 1789-91, 8vo., 7*l.*; the Bon Ton Magazine, 1818-21, 6 vols. 8vo., 14*l.* 15*s.*; 'The British Stage and Literary Cabinet,' 1817-21, 5 vols. 8vo., 17*l.* 10*s.*; 'A Dialogue in the Shades,' between Mrs. Cibber and Peg Woffington, 1766, 4to., 63l. A collection of eighty-four works illustrated by the Cruikshanks, and all in the finest condition, comprising some of Ainsworth's novels, and the usual assortment of comic almanacs, table-books, and fairy libraries, was sold in distinct lots for a total sum of 553l. 1s. 8d., probably the largest amount ever realized for books of the kind. Another extensive collection of seventy-seven volumes of Dickensiana brought in the aggregate 725l. 3s., the account of the origin of the 'Pickwick Papers,' n.d. 8vo., going for 72l., and a set of the Christmas books for no less a sum than 20l. 10s. After this we can look with considerable nonchalance on a sum of 67l. paid for a copy of the first edition of 'The Vicar of Wakefield,' 2 vols. 1766, 8vo.; 55l. for the first edition of Gray's 'Elegy,' 1751, 4to., and 45l. for Charles Lamb's fairy tale of the prince with the long nose—'Prince Dorus,' 1818, 8vo. At this same sale a complete set of the first editions of Lever's works in 59 vols. 8vo. realized 275l., and a set of Strutt's works, mostly originals, 14 vols. 4to., 1773-1810, 72l. Thackeray's Snob, the eleven numbers complete, together with the Gownsmen in seventeen numbers, brought 125l., while Westmacott's 'English Spy,' 2 vols., first edition, 1825-6, made the altogether unusual sum of 30l. 10s.

The Duke of Buccleuch's sale included some high-class books, though of a totally different description. Among them were 187 volumes of Valpy's Delphin Classics, a complete set on large paper, 37l.; Dame Juliana Barnes's 'Fysshynge with an Angle,' 1496, 4to., 44l.; the Florentine edition of the 'Decameron,' 1527, 4to., 185l.; Caxton's 'Dictes and Sayengis of the Philosophers,' 1477, folio, perfect, and measuring 11½ in. by 8 in., 650l.; 'The Chronicles of England,' W. Caxton, 1480, folio (9½ in. by 7 in.), 470l.; Higden's 'Description of Britayne,' W. Caxton, 1480 (11½ in. by 8 in.), a "made-up" copy, 195l.; 'The Ryal Book, or Book for a King,' W. Caxton (1487?), folio, imperfect, 365l. Wynkyn de Worde's 'Lyf of Saint Katherine of Senis,' printed with Caxton's types about the year 1492, realized 99l., the hunters after black-letter in this case declining to make up the century.

The Burnett sale is noticeable for the same reasons that made the Mackenzie sale famous, Dickens, Cruikshank, and Thackeray occupying the principal and almost the only places. The Goldsmid library, on the contrary, consisted of 461 lots, representing sound literature in almost every department. This library had evidently been formed with great taste, and only after much expenditure of time. It is satisfactory to find that it realized rather more than 750l. Passing along, a first-rate copy of Walton's 'Angler,' 1653, 8vo., first edition of course brings 180l., and Whitbourne's 'Discovery of Newfoundland,' 1620-22, 4to., 51l. This latter sum is hard to understand, for though the book is extremely rare it would hardly seem to be worth the amount paid for it. At the Halliwell-Phillipps sale in July last a very good copy sold for 5l. 15s.

The Thornhill sale, in April, was productive of some good topographical works, among which were Aubrey's 'Surrey,' 5 vols. large paper, 1719, 8vo., 19l. 15s.; Blomefield's 'Norfolk,' with continuation by Parkin, 5 vols. 1739-75, folio, extra illustrated, 50l.; Butcher's 'Survey of Stamford,' large paper, 8vo. 1717-18, 2l. 12s.; Dallaway's 'Western Division of Sussex,' 2 vols. 1815-30, 4to., containing the rare plate of Shilling Park, the portrait of the Bishop of Chichester, and the cancelled leaves and plan, 38l.; Drake's 'Eboracum,' large paper, 1736, folio, 27l.; Gage's 'Hengrave,' in Suffolk, large paper, 1822, folio, 6l. 5s.; Harris's 'Kent,' vol. i. (all published), large paper, 1719, folio, 3l. 18s.; Hasted's 'Kent,' 4 vols. uncut, 1778-99, 25l. 10s.; Hodgson's 'Northumberland,' 3 parts in 7 vols. 1820-1858, 4to., 40l.; Hutchins's 'Dorsetshire,' 4 vols. large paper, 1796-1815, folio, 15l. 10s.; Morant's

'Essex,' 2 vols. 1768, folio, 27l.; Shaw's 'Staffordshire,' 2 vols. large paper, 1798-1801, folio, 38l.; and Thoresby's 'Ducatus Leodiensis,' large paper, 1816, 2 vols. folio, 12l.

The Lee sale, at Messrs. Puttick's in April, was not noticeable for anything except a set of Ray Society publications in 41 vols. 8vo. and 18 vols. 4to. 1844-87, which realized 22l. 10s. The Smith sale, in the following month, was, however, more important. A fine uniform set of 'Chronicles,' consisting of thirty 4to. volumes of various dates between 1803 and 1827, brought 111l.; Dibdin's 'Tour in France and Germany,' 3 vols. 8vo. uncut, 1821, 26l.; Lodge's 'Portraits,' 4 vols. 1821-34, folio, 18l. 18s.; and a good copy of Walton's 'Angler,' by Nicolas, 2 vols. 1836, 8vo. india proofs, 17l.

The Streetfield sale, in June, disclosed a small collection of the works of Cotton and Increase Mather, among which was the third edition of 'The Wonders of the Invisible World,' 1693, 4to., 20l. 10s.; but the chief feature consisted of a number of original autograph manuscripts of Lord Tennyson's 'Maud' (16 pp. 4to. and 4½ pp. 8vo.), 111l.; 'The Brook' (8 pp. 8vo.), 51l.; and of 'The Daisy' (4½ pp. 8vo.), 24l. 10s.

The best of the Earl of Crawford's books appear to have been sold; at any rate, the second portion of his library was not to be compared in point of quality with the first. There were, however, some good volumes of Americana, which brought heavy prices; three Caxtons, and an enormous number of liturgies, the last filling the numbers 586-722. The most curious among them was a fine specimen of the 'Prymer in Englishe' (London), 1558-9, 16mo., which fetched 120l.

The Halliwell-Phillipps collection disappointed many people on the look-out for Shakespearean rarities, for it was neither better nor worse than many other libraries which are being sold without comment every year. There were nine early quartos, but only one among them a first edition, and that imperfect; the First Folio realized no more than 95l.; the third and fourth were worse still. Perhaps Mr. Halliwell-Phillipps was more of a commentator than a collector; though, from another view of the case, his choicest relics of the great dramatist may even now be awaiting the tardy will and pleasure of the Birmingham Town Council, which, if its decision be much longer deferred, may ensure the whole collection passing away to other and more appreciative hands across the Atlantic.

Of late years but few early Shakespearean quartos have come to the hammer, the Daniel sale, in 1864, being the last occasion on which any quantity have been disposed of at one and the same time—the last, that is to say, with the exception of the comparatively inferior assortment gathered together with so much labour and expense by the late Mr. Frederick Perkins, whose large library was sold by Messrs. Sotheby in July last. Since the days of the Roxburghe sale, when these little books first received a measure of public recognition, a great change has come over the dreams of the English book-buyer. Then it was primarily a question of money; now there is always some one who holds it in such little account that the possession of a few printed leaves is regarded as an equivalent for the loss of it, or who considers that books of a certain class are so certain to rise still higher in the market that his judgment of their value must be right so long as a competitor is left to dispute the possession with him. The latter assumption may be correct; and assuming that the value of these books should increase in the same proportion during the next eighty years as it has done during the last, then there is no doubt that it is so. The difference between prices then and now cannot be better exemplified than by pointing out the chief Shakespearean rarities disposed of at the Perkins sale, and contrasting the prices realized with those obtained for similar books nearly a hundred years ago.

Shakespeare's First Folio, 1623, title and Ben Jonson's verses mounted, 415l. (Perkins); a perfect copy, 100l. (Roxburghe); the Second Folio, 1632, wormed, 47l. (Perkins); a perfect copy, 15l. (Roxburghe); the Third Folio, 1664, perfect, 100l. (Perkins); a perfect copy, 35l. (Roxburghe); the Fourth Folio, 1685, repaired, 14l. (Perkins); a perfect copy, 6l. 6s. (Roxburghe); 'Romeo and Juliet,' 4to. first edition, 1599, cut down, 164l. (Perkins); the same, perfect, 12l. 12s. (Roxburghe); 'Much Ado about Nothing,' 4to. 1600, first edition, cut down, 75l. (Perkins); the same, perfect, 2l. 17s. (Roxburghe); 'The Merchant of Venice,' printed by Roberts, 1600, 4to. first edition, 121l. (Perkins); the same, 2l. 14s. (Roxburghe); a perfect copy of the edition by Heyes, 1600, 4to., 10l. (Roxburghe); the 'Second Part of Henry IV.,' perfect, 4to. 1600, first edition, 225l. (Perkins); the same, perfect, 2l. 4s. (Roxburghe); 'Hamlet,' fourth or fifth edition, W. S. for J. Smethwicke, n.d. 4to. cut down, 60l. (Perkins); the same, perfect, 4l. 13s. (Roxburghe); 'Pericles, Prince of Tyre,' 1609, 4to. perfect, 60l. (Perkins); the same, perfect, 1l. 15s. (Roxburghe); the spurious 'Life of Sir John Oldcastle,' 1600, first edition, 4to. perfect, 27l. (Perkins); the same, perfect, 19s. (Roxburghe). Examples might be multiplied, for both at the Perkins and Roxburghe sales many other specimens of the early quartos were brought to the hammer, but the difference between the prices realized corresponds closely with that disclosed in nearly every one of the selections I have made. The change in the value of money is, no doubt, responsible to a slight extent, but the real reason of the great disparity must be sought for in the almost universal desire on the part of collectors to purchase rare originals under any circumstances and almost at any price. Of late years the opportunities of doing so have greatly diminished, and a glance at the pages of Book Prices Current, with its long lists of thousands of works in every department of literature, shows that there is every probability of these opportunities becoming fewer still as time goes on. J. H. SLATER.

Literary Crossp.

THE issue of the next part of 'Præterita' is indefinitely delayed, owing to Mr. Ruskin's continued illness. It is, however, the author's intention to add, when his health permits, eight more chapters to the twenty-eight already issued of these "outlines of scenes and thoughts perhaps worthy of memory in my past life." The series, as will be remembered, began in the spring of 1885, and at the rate of past publication it ought to be completed before the end of 1891.

MR. MURRAY announces the speedy publication of the 'Speeches and Addresses' delivered in India by Lord Dufferin. The same publisher promises a translation into Latin verse, by the accomplished Bishop of St. Andrews, of the Collects of the Prayer Book as well as of some psalms and hymns.

MR. F. C. BURNAND is reissuing, greatly revised, his 'My Time, and what I've done with it.' The publishers are to be Messrs. Burns & Oates, instead of Messrs. Macmillan, and there will be a portrait of the author for a frontispiece.

IN the February number of Scribner's Magazine Mr. W. H. Mallock will give an account of a visit made to a number of old Hungarian castles. The article is illustrated by photographs by Mr. Mallock.

THE late Dr. Charles Mackay has left behind him a large quantity of unpublished MS., most of which has been quite recently written. It includes a novel in two volumes entitled 'For Love's own Sake'; 'Old English Rhymes made New: a Handbook for Poets and Versifiers of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries'; 'Phœnician Origin of the Grecian Mythology'; 'Stonehenge and Druidism'; 'Walks and Talks among the People,' and a number of poems dating up to the very latest day the deceased author was able to hold a pen, the quality and vigour of these last showing, it is said, no signs of decreasing vitality or failing intellectual power.

MR. W. W. BEAN is going to issue a volume containing a list of the members of Parliament for the six northern counties (Northumberland, Durham, Yorkshire, Lancashire, Westmoreland, and Cumberland) and the cities and boroughs in the North, from 1603 to 1886; the petitions to the House of Commons on disputed elections and the decisions relating to them; notices relating to candidates and election matters taken from authentic sources, and various analyses of polls, showing the plumpers and split votes for the respective candidates; and a series of biographical notices of most of the members and candidates. There will be an index of names at the close of the work.

MR. JOHN ASTLE, who died at Teddington on Christmas Day, was a journalist and author whose name is well known in various parts of the country. He was a man of much ability, and his memory was remarkably good. Many years ago he edited the Cheltenham Times, and afterwards the Cheltenham Express. In 1872 he became the first editor of the South Wales Daily News, Cardiff. A few years subsequently he edited the Manchester Evening News, and with that journal he maintained an unbroken connexion as leader-writer during his ten years' residence in Teddington. He was the author of 'Wolsey, Lord Chancellor of England: an Historical Romance,' 'Rawson Gargrave,' and several brochures and poems. His son is a South Wales journalist, and his daughter resides at Cardiff. He also leaves a widow (second wife) to mourn his loss.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. are about to reissue their well-known French, German, and Latin dictionaries in threepenny monthly parts, commencing with the French dictionary.

WE regret to hear of the sudden death of Mr. Swayne, one of the best known of the American publishers who visit England. For the last eleven years he made annual journeys to this country, and latterly came more often still. He was a partner in the firm of Messrs. Dutton & Co., of New York, which concerns itself chiefly with books for children and theological works.

BERROW'S Worcester Journal has been celebrating its bicentenary by publishing facsimiles of early numbers. Yet sceptics will doubt if it can really claim an earlier origin than June, 1709,—a highly respectable antiquity.

WE are sorry to learn from the Bombay papers just received that the registrarship of the University of Bombay, long and honourably held by Dr. P. Peterson, has passed out of his hands, a candidate unknown to literature having been elected in his stead. It was certainly not an unreasonable expectation entertained by all the best friends of that rising university that when the vice-chancellor happens to bear a name to which no scholarly associations attach, at least the registrar should have made his mark in literature and enjoy a fairly wide reputation as a savant. But the Senate of that university has disregarded these considerations.

THE electric light installations at the British Museum are nearly completed. It is in contemplation to open the public galleries from eight to ten o'clock at night before long, so that those who are unable to pay a visit to the Museum during the daytime will have an opportunity of inspecting the collections. The temporary exhibition of Tudor books, engravings, and MSS. will, no doubt, prove attractive to evening visitors. The electric light is also nearly ready for lighting at the Public Record Office.

THE death of Baron Kremer reduces the committee nominated at the last Oriental Congress to three members. If each of them elects an additional member by co-optation, as the Baron will certainly be replaced by another Austrian, there will only be room for a Frenchman and an Englishman, Russia, Italy, and other countries being thus excluded. The movement for a meeting in London appears to be growing, some five-and-twenty more scholars having given in their address, among them Prof. Foucart, of the Collège de France, and Prof. Lanman, of Harvard.

THE friends and colleagues at the Museum of Mr. Geo. Bullen, F.S.A., Keeper of the Department of Printed Books, are setting on foot a testimonial, which will be presented to him on his retirement at the close of this month after fifty years of active and assiduous service in the Library.

MR. CHANCELLOR T. E. ROGERS is engaged in bringing out a volume of 'Records of Yarlinton,' in which much information will, it is said, be given concerning the great families of the district. The publisher is Mr. Elliot Stock.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

"In the oration of the new Chief Justice of the United States before Congress, on George Washington, which has been published, he says, 'We love to hear again what the great Frederick and Napoleon'—other large names follow—'said of him.' There are some who would like to hear for the first time what Frederick the Great said of Washington, one of the most noticeable things in 'the great Frederick's' works and letters being their resolute silence concerning Washington, though D'Alembert tried hard to extract his opinion. Chief Justice Fuller, whose oration is notably barren of novelty, may have had in mind a sentence in Mr. Cabot Lodge's work which mentions a tribute which 'it is said' Frederick paid to some achievement of Washington. But no reference is given by Mr. Lodge. The greatness of Washington is not concerned in the question suggested. It is not wonderful that the relations of Frederick to England should have made him reserved on American affairs. It is wonderful that a Chief Justice of the United States should be inexact in a 'centennial' oration before both Houses of Congress."

MISS JENNETT HUMPHREYS writes:—

"In your 'Chesterfield' review of January 4th allusion is made to the poems of Miss Jane Brereton. May I say that Brereton was the lady's married name? She was born Jane Hughes. Vide 'Dictionary of National Biography.'"

THE united firms of Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton & Co. have sixty of their staff laid up with influenza.

THE Rev. W. A. Heard, who has been elected Head Master of Fettes, was for some years a House Master there and gained a considerable reputation, which he more than maintained during the last five years, when he has had a house at Westminster School.

THE Rev. J. Kennedy, who has been for many years Head Master at Aldenham, and has greatly raised the school, has been appointed to Tonbridge.

THREE German professors of some note died last week: Dr. von Hase, of Jena, the theologian; Prof. W. Müller, of Göttingen, distinguished as a student of German philology and folk-lore; and Dr. E. Nasse, of Bonn.

MR. JOSIAH GILBERT writes:—

'To the poem entitled 'Rephan' in 'Asolando' Mr. Browning appends the following note: 'Suggested by a very early recollection of a prose story by that noble woman and imaginative writer Jane Taylor of Norwich.' Of the eminent Norwich family I do not remember one of the name of Jane, and I feel sure the story referred to is that called 'How it Strikes a Stranger,' among the 'Contributions of Q. Q.,' the signature of Jane Taylor of Ongar. The story describes the arrival in an ancient city of a remarkable personage, who eventually acknowledged himself to have been an inhabitant of the most brilliant star in the heavens, permission to visit the earth having been granted on condition that he should remain there, subject to all the circumstances of earthly existence. The story made a great impression at the time, and would be well known amongst Mr. Browning's early friends."

To the new edition of his work on 'The Great Silver River,' which Mr. Murray announces, Sir Horace Rumbold will add a chapter on the commercial resources of the Argentine Republic.

WE believe that Prof. A. Socin, of Tübingen, the well-known author of Baedeker's 'Palestine and Syria,' will be the successor of the late Prof. Fleischer in the Arabic Chair at the University of Leipzig.

THE Rev. C. Macdonald writes:—

"In the Athenæum of the 21st of last month I am said to recognize Admiral Robertson Macdonald as the 'present Clanranald.' It should have been Admiral Sir Reginald Macdonald—quite a distinct personage. These two gentlemen, the one representing the Kinlochmoidart branch, the other the main and principal family, i.e., the Clanranalds, happen to be both admirals in the Royal Navy; hence, no doubt, the reviewer's mistake."

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are United States, Contract Labour Law, Correspondence (5d.); Births, Deaths, and Marriages, Scotland, Report for 1887, Thirty-third Annual (2s. 1d.); and Friendly Societies, Reports for 1888, Part A. (1s. 2d.).

SCIENCE

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

The Birds of Berwickshire: with Remarks on their Local Distribution, Migration, and Habits, and also on the Folk-lore, Proverbs, Popular Rhymes and Sayings connected with Them. By George Muirhead. Vol. I. (Edinburgh, Douglas.)—As the title indicates, this handsome volume is far more than a mere account of the avifauna of Berwickshire. The illustrations—chiefly vignettes—are eighty in number, and although, of course, they vary in importance, we can safely say that all of them are good. The map is not so much to our taste, for, owing to the absence of contour-lines, it resembles the flat plan of a parish divided into holdings and allotments. This is, however, a small matter, and, for the rest, the work will be an ornament to any drawing-room table as well as a useful addition to the library shelf. Not only has the ornithological portion been written with accuracy, but the style also is scholarly, and displays a great deal of antiquarian as well as etymological knowledge. Many quaint sayings, proverbs, and scraps of old ballads attest the important part played by birds in the daily life of the Lowland peasant; and in this connexion we may observe that the unscientific reader will not be frightened from these pages by dry descriptions of plumages or tables of comparative measurements. The introduction, in which the natural features of the county are described, is an excellent bit of writing, the sketch of the gradual transformation of the Merse, through drainage and plantations, being particularly happy. We look forward to the appearance of the second volume with eagerness, as marking the completion of a work which, while it appeals to a wider circle than that of the ornithologist, will also do much towards promoting a genuine interest in bird-life.

Hydraulic Motors: Turbines and Pressure Engines. By G. R. Bodmer. Illustrated. (Whittaker & Co.)—Mr. Bodmer's treatise on hydraulic motors has been written to supply the want of a comprehensive modern work in English on the subject of turbines. He explains the principles underlying the action of turbines and water-pressure engines, and the application of these principles to design. He gives descriptions of the more distinctive types of these machines, with details of results obtained, and reviews the various methods of water measurement. A turbine is a machine for utilizing the energy of water by causing it to flow through curved channels or buckets on which it exerts a pressure which is converted into motive force. The machine consists essentially of a ring, or pairs of rings, to which are attached curved vanes or blades arranged uniformly round the circumference, connected with a shaft or spindle on which the apparatus revolves. The principle of the action depends on the motion and pressure of the water relatively to the vanes. Turbines are radial, axial, or combined. In radial turbines the water in passing through flows in a direction at right angles to the axis of rotation. In axial turbines the flow is parallel with the axis of rotation. In combined or mixed flow-turbines both the systems are combined. Turbines work either entirely full of water, when they are said to be drowned, or with a free admission of air into the compartments or buckets. The former are frequently termed reactive, the latter impulse turbines. Mr. Bodmer discusses in seven chapters the general principle and design of the turbine, and the peculiarities of each of the two main divisions of the subject above indicated. He gives a full summary of rules and formulas, and numerical examples of the efficiency of different machines. This is followed by a lucid chapter on the various methods by which the quantity of flowing water is measured. There is then a long chapter containing descriptions of various turbines and of experiments upon them, which is followed by a chapter devoted to American turbines, showing the leading characteristics in which they differ from those usually employed in Europe. The last chapter of the book is directed to the subject of hydraulic pressure engines, in which water acts by its pressure on pistons or plungers, in the same way that steam or compressed air acts by elastic force in steam or air engines. The author is at home in his subject; his descriptions and definitions are for the most part clear and good; and the illustrations, of which, unfortunately, there is no list, are generally well executed. If the full and careful work of Mr. Bodmer be compared with the comparatively brief notices on the subject which are to be found in the best English mechanical text-books, it will be seen at once that he has made a contribution of standard value to the library of the hydraulic engineer.

The Southern Skies: a Plain and Easy Guide to the Constellations of the Southern Hemisphere. By R. A. Proctor. (Allen & Co.)—The reader may be surprised to see a new work announced by Mr. Proctor, which sounds, in fact, like a voice from the dead. But the maps and accompanying explanations were originally published in the pages of Knowledge (which has been so ably edited by Mr. Ranyard since its founder's death) in 1886 and 1887, and now appear in collected form. They are twelve in number, and give the positions of the principal star-groups visible in southern latitudes between 24° and 46° for the successive months of the year, whilst the letter-press furnishes some useful hints how to find them, so that the whole forms a handy guide to the heavens for observers located in the southern hemisphere.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

SAD indeed has been the news received from Demerara with regard to the solar eclipse party sent to the Salut Islands under the charge of Father Perry, so well known for the observations of the transit of Venus at Kerguelen in 1874 and of several total eclipses. Five days after obtaining successful observations of the late eclipse, Father Perry died of dysentery on the 27th ult. He was born in London on the 26th of August, 1833, studied at Douay and Rome, and was appointed Professor of Astronomy at Stonyhurst College and Director of the Observatory in 1860. He was elected Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society in 1869, and of the Royal Society in 1874, and President of the Liverpool Astronomical Society in 1889. The photographic results of the recent eclipse will, undoubtedly, prove of great value; but the failure, through bad weather, of the parties sent to Loanda, off the west coast of Africa, to obtain any observations during totality will disappoint the hopes of resolving one of the objects proposed by Mr. Turner (of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, who organized the English parties), namely, to ascertain whether the corona would change in form during the time which elapsed between totality at the western and eastern stations.

The French Academy has adjudged the Lalande prize for last year to M. Gonnissiat of the Lyons Observatory, the Valz prize to M. Charlois of Nice, and the Janssen prize to Mr. Norman Lockyer.

Dr. Zelbr has determined elliptic elements for the comet discovered by Prof. Swift on November 16th, by which it appears that the period amounts to about seven years. As the comet has long passed its perihelion and is also receding from the earth, it is not likely that many more observations of it will be obtained.

Mr. S. C. Chandler (Astronomical Journal, No. 205) has made some further investigations into the motion of the comet (d, 1889) which was discovered by Mr. Brooks on July 6th, with the interesting result that it is highly probable that the body in question is identical with a comet discovered by Messier in 1770, often called Lexell's lost comet, because that astronomer calculated that it was moving in an elliptic orbit with a period of about five and a half years, but it was not seen afterwards. It is now well known that this was due to the fact that at the return in 1776 its position was such as to render any observation impossible, and before another could take place the comet made, in 1779, so close an approach to the planet Jupiter as completely to change the nature of its orbit. We referred in our "Notes" for December 7th to Mr. Chandler's previous paper, in which he pointed out that Brooks's comet also made a near approach to that planet in 1886, which must have greatly altered the character of its orbit. He now finds, in fact, that that approach brought it at one time (May 20th, 1886) within a distance of about nine diameters of Jupiter, only a little outside the orbit of his third satellite. Calculation of the elements of the comet's orbit before this appulse leads to the conclusion that these present a great similarity to those of Lexell's comet after its approach to the planet in 1779, rendering the probability great that the bodies are identical. Continuing his investigations, Mr. Chandler shows that no similar serious disturbance will occur until 1921, so that appearances may be looked for in 1896, 1903, 1910, and 1917, at each of which returns the conditions of visibility will be favourable, giving opportunities for further investigations into the motions of this interesting comet, which it appears narrowly escaped being converted into a fifth satellite of Jupiter.

Herr Berberich, of Berlin, has published a determination of the elements of the orbit of Borrelly's comet (g, 1889), by which it appears that it will pass its perihelion about the 26th inst., at the distance from the sun of 0.27 in terms of the earth's mean distance. It will be nearest the earth (distance about 0.80 on the same scale) early next week, when its theoretical brightness will be ten times as great as at the time of discovery. The following is M. Bigourdan's description of the appearance of the comet as seen at the Paris Observatory on the 15th ult.: "C'est une nébulosité vaguement ronde, de 2' de diamètre, légèrement plus brillante dans la région centrale, sans condensation notable. On soupçonne dans son étendue plusieurs points stellaires dont deux sont nettement visibles." It is now in the constellation Aquila, moving towards Capricornus, and will probably be visible (though much fainter) in the southern hemisphere after the perihelion passage.

Dr. Matthiessen's revised computation of the elements of the orbit of Denning's periodical comet (Astronomische Nachrichten, No. 2942) shows that the next perihelion passage will be due this year on the 9th of May. He gives an ephemeris commencing on the 17th inst., but the comet's brightness will not be so great as when it was last seen in 1881 until nearly the middle of April, and it will at no time during the forthcoming return be more than a quarter as bright as when discovered by Mr. Denning on the 4th of October, 1881.

Prof. Schiaparelli, of Milan, has communicated to the Astronomische Nachrichten (No. 2944) a very interesting paper on the rotation of Mercury. From a large number of observations (extending over the last ten years) of markings noticed by him on the disc, he has arrived at the conclusion that the planet rotates on its axis in the same period that it revolves round the sun, similarly to the rotation of the moon with reference to its revolution round the earth.

SOCIETIES.

SHORTHAND.—Jan. 1.—Mr. H. Richter, V.P., in the chair.—The following new members were elected: Fellows, Messrs. F. G. Harwood, F. J. Hallett, and R. L. Woolcombe; Foreign Associate, Mr. G. Browning-Browning (South Africa).—A paper by Mr. E. T. Harwood 'On Alphabetic Symbolism' was read by Mr. A. W. Kitson. The author, a Pitman writer and teacher, stated that "while holding the very highest opinion of the Pitman system of shorthand," he ventured to say "that it has a few weak points," and that one of them lies in the direction of "long or awkward outlines" for "most frequently recurring words." He had endeavoured to find a remedy in "Alphabetic Symbolology," which consisted of the use of most of the letters of the common longhand, in position, above and on the line of writing, to represent the awkward or long outlines that he had found to militate against speed in writing.—A lively discussion followed, a very general opinion being expressed that the plan adopted by Mr. Harwood was legitimate enough for the rapid writer of a detached-vowel system like Pitman's, yet the curtailment of words by the method adopted in the joined-vowel systems is a better plan for gaining brevity, being more distinct and legible.

ARISTOTELIAN.—Jan. 6.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. R. E. Mitcheson read a paper 'On Practical Certainty the Highest Certainty.' That to be certain is no more than to have the "courage of our convictions" is at the root of Kant's philosophy. Greater or less certainty is measured by the gravity of the interest which we are willing to stake upon it, just as Kant says of pragmatic or contingent belief that its best test is a bet. Other forms of belief distinguished from pragmatic belief by Kant are the same in kind. This he practically admits of all but mathematical knowledge. Judgments dealing with the facts of nature and the laws derived from their observation are empirical and not necessary, and the categories which make such judgments possible are applicable only to possible experience, and do not justify the anticipation of its existence. He agrees with Hume that the principle of causality rests on no a priori necessity, but on a kind of subjective necessity arising from its general usefulness in experience; he differs from him in insisting on its necessity when referred to a possible experience, but without the anticipation of such experience necessity has no meaning. What of the a priori synthetical judgments of mathematics? This possibility depends on the pure intuition of space and time, the universal conditions under which the manifold of sense becomes an object. The argument requires that we should have a priori intuition of the object itself; for the a priori character of the conditions means only their universality within experience. The principles of mathematics are thus regulative, not constitutive. In the Ideas of Reason Kant only professes to give regulative principles. The highest of them are, however, morally certain, for the absolute imperativeness of moral laws makes us postulate a moral governor of the world. But this imperativeness means only that we are compelled to act upon them. This is all we mean by the highest certainty, and if we speculate on the possibility of higher intelligences, the greater certainty of their knowledge would be shown in greater immediacy of action.—A discussion followed.

Science Gossip.

MR. MURRAY promises several scientific works for the early spring:—A treatise by Major Sydenham Clarke, of the Royal Engineers, on 'Fortification, its Past Achievements, Recent Development, and Future Needs,'—a translation of M. Berthelot's celebrated work on Explosives, by Mr. Cundill, H.M. Inspector of Explosives, and

Mr. Napier Hake, who fills the same office in the colony of Victoria,—a volume on the 'Railways of America' by various writers,—and a reprint of Mr. Acworth's articles in Murray's Magazine on 'The Railways of Scotland.'

MR. HERBERT WARD, the African explorer, has written an article on 'Life among the Congo Savages' for the February number of Scribner's Magazine. It will be fully illustrated, the engravings including a full-page portrait of Tippeo Tib.

MICROSCOPISTS, abroad as well as at home, will hear with great regret that Mr. Frank Crisp is about to resign the office of Secretary to the Royal Microscopical Society, which he has held for twelve years. During that period the character and position of the Society have been greatly improved, and the numerous microscopical societies which have sprung up elsewhere have come to regard it as their common parent; the number of its fellows has been doubled, and its Journal has been converted into one of the most useful aids to research which are now put into the hands of working biologists. For twelve years this Journal has averaged a thousand pages in each volume, and its circulation is understood to be more than one thousand copies. This result, it is generally known, has only been obtained by the yearly expenditure of a sum of money larger than the annual income of the Society; Mr. Crisp's banker alone, in all probability, knows how large that sum is. But Mr. Crisp has not only given money; he has also devoted a large amount of time to editing and improving the character of the Journal, and by his own contributions and criticisms has done a great deal in making intelligible to microscopists the modern theories of the microscope. His retirement from, no less than his election to, the office which he holds marks a critical period in the history of the Society. But though his legal duties are so much increased as to leave him no choice, he will still be intimately associated with the Society, as he is willing to act as its treasurer, and we may be sure that his interest in it is in no way abated.

In our obituary notice last week of Sir Henry Yule we referred to the univalued position which he held among British geographers. It might have been better, as his achievements in that line are not all of very recent date, to enumerate shortly some of the labours on which his reputation rested. He had a profound and intimate knowledge of the geography of Eastern Asia, and, above and beyond this knowledge, a remarkable power of intuition which enabled him to sift and to apply it. This is well shown, to quote a crucial instance, by the way in which, without ever having visited the regions in question, he evolved light and order out of that extraordinary jumble of conflicting authorities, medieval and modern, the geography of Central Asia. Not only had he to deal with inaccuracy, ignorance, and medieval credulity, and great lacunae which had to be filled up by ingenious inference; there were also the famous frauds of the learned geographer Klaproth, which—Lord Strangford and Sir H. Rawlinson collaborating, but not directly aiding—were successfully exposed, and of themselves form a very curious episode in geographical research. The reader who is interested in these subjects will find this particular question of Central Asian geography treated with rare fullness and acumen in Col. Yule's introduction to Lieut. Wood's 'Journey to the Source of the Oxus,' as well as in the Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society. The notes to 'Marco Polo' abound with scattered instances of the same kind of work; but we may draw attention to a comparatively unfamiliar essay, prefixed to Capt. Gill's 'River of Golden Sand,' where the system of the great rivers which flow down in a parallel series from the high lands of Tibet into the Bay of Bengal is treated with equal lucidity and learning, enlivened by characteristic flashes of wit and humour. It will be understood that this is not intended as an exhaustive record of work, but merely as a note supplementary to our notice of last week.

THE general meeting of the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching is to be held in the Botanical Theatre of University College, Gower Street, on Friday next. At the morning sitting the reports of the Council and the Committees will be read; the new officers will be elected; and the following will be proposed for election as members of the Association: Rev. E. H. Kempson, Harrow; Mr. W. G. Lax, M.A., Kensington; Mr. A. Martyn, B.A., South Eastern College, Ramsgate; the Rev. H. S. Milner, M.A., The College, Hurstpierpoint; Mr. Arthur Ransom, editor of the Bedfordshire Times; Mr. R. N. Roseveare, M.A., Harrow; Mr. H. A. Saunders, M.A., Sunbury House, Sunbury; and Mr. R. Viccari, Kensington. At the afternoon sitting papers will be read by the Rev. Dr. C. Taylor, on 'A New Treatment of the Hyperbola'; by Mr. G. Heppel, on 'The Teaching of Trigonometry'; by Mr. E. M. Langley, on 'Some Geometrical Theorems'; and by the President (Prof. Minchin), on 'Statics and Geometry.'

THE fifth edition, which Messrs. Williams & Norgate will publish shortly, of Sir John Lubbock's 'Prehistoric Times' will contain several additions.

STAATSMINISTER VON GOSSLER lately proposed to a number of scholars in Berlin the issue of a periodical to deal exclusively with the Prähistorie of Central and Eastern Germany, and particularly to report on all excavations and "finds" throughout the district from the Ems and the Neckar to the Riem. The Rhine district already possesses a serial of this character. The Berlin Gesellschaft für Anthropologie und Ethnologie has resolved to start such a Zeitschrift as the minister suggested.

Devia Cypria: Notes of an Archaeological Journey in Cyprus in 1888. By D. G. Hogarth, M.A. (Frowde.)

MR. HOGARTH'S little work on Cyprus may be taken as an appendix to the numerous archaeological works and articles which have been already written on this island. It contains an exhaustive archaeological survey of the two extreme points of Cyprus, namely, the Paphos district and the long jutting headland of the Karpas, offering valuable hints to future excavators, and pointing out localities to avoid, and those which, in Mr. Hogarth's opinion, may yield satisfactory results. It is much to be regretted that the author has not made his work more general; a good archaeological account of Cyprus in all its varied branches is much needed; and it is extremely disappointing on reaching some point of interest to be referred for particulars to an article in a periodical, or to some German work not easily procured. Then, again, General di Cesnola is our authority for certain excavations and certain archaeological features in the island; and if Mr. Hogarth had taken these in hand instead of limiting himself to attacks on the genuineness of Cesnola's work, his accuracy and his truthfulness, it would have been more satisfactory to the general reader. Such remarks as the following are not calculated to satisfy us with the General's book as an authority for even his own special work:—

"Several conversations with those who had worked for him [General di Cesnola] shed a (to me) new light on the subject, and showed me the genesis of much that seems mythical in the book. The truth of the matter seems to be that the General seldom directed his excavations in person, and was not present when the treasures were found; he undertook rapid tours about the island, stopping, for instance, one day only at old Paphos (cf. his book, p. 206, 'I superintended excavations there in 1869 for several months'), but his collection was amassed by the labours of his dragoman Besh-besh, both by excavation and by purchase in the villages and in the bazaars of the towns. Thus, for example, no mention is made of Drimu in the General's book, although all the villagers aver that Besh-besh found a number of things there. The ridiculous depths to which excavations are said to have been carried, e.g., forty-one feet at old Paphos (p. 209), in a spot at which solid rock lies only two or three feet below the surface, and forty to fifty feet at Amathus (p. 255), where a tomb twenty feet in depth is quite exceptional, appear to be inventions of Besh-besh's, who spent so much of his patron's money on mastic and other things unarchæological that he was obliged to manufacture satisfactory explanations of his large expenditure."

Mr. Hogarth has done a good turn for Cyprus in proving that the numerous monoliths with which the island is studded are not, as Cesnola and other travellers have asserted, religious symbols of a revolting character, but merely supports of olive presses long since disused. He and Dr. Guillemard together have found more than forty of these stones in their wanderings, and in many cases the original use can be distinctly and satisfactorily traced.

The suggestions thrown out by Mr. Hogarth respecting the prospect of digging at Salamis, at which site the Cyprus Exploration Fund is this year engaged, are interesting from a prophetic point of view. Above ground it would appear that the indications are not satisfactory, but that the seaward side of the site is a succession of hillocks, clogged with drifted sand. Here "the digger must run exploratory trenches in all directions before fixing on a spot for his work, but considering the evident depth of deposit, the rapidity with which archaeological treasures were probably hidden from rapacious eyes by the sand, and the fact that whenever the peasants of Eukomi or Agios Sergios filch a corner of land from the Crown and proceed to plough it, they find gems, coins, and small antiques in greater abundance than on any other site in the island."

If these instructions are carried out, Mr. Hogarth expresses a hope that the excavations at Salamis may prove more productive than those conducted on the island by the Exploration Fund have hitherto been.

Still one cannot help being struck, as one peruses Mr. Hogarth's journal, by the paucity of sites, both in the Paphos district and in the Karpass, which from external evidences give signs of encouragement to the excavator. Mr. Hogarth's examinations on the sites of such towns, for example, as Urania and Carpasia, were the reverse of encouraging. "Search as I might," he says,

"I could find neither columns nor mouldings of any description: only very large blocks of stone, a carefully built water channel, some large 'oil stones,' and rough red pottery."

This absence of good indications is all the more remarkable on an island like Cyprus, which had such a measure of prosperity in antiquity. Perhaps it may be, as Mr. Hogarth suggests, that great energy must be displayed, and much money must be spent, and that by boring deep into the sandhills of Salamis results commensurate with the hopes of the excavators may be obtained.

GIFT-BOOKS.

Most sumptuously printed by M. Viel-Cazal, and illustrated by artists of rare skill directed by some of the ablest brains and most poetic sympathies in France, is the noble volume for which we are indebted to MM. Hachette & Co., entitled Les Œuvres Poétiques de Boileau-Despréaux. The text follows the edition of 1713, which appeared only two years after the death of Boileau, and differs little from the first edition of 1701. The spelling and punctuation have been modernized with taste and judgment, without in any degree, so far as we have discovered, changing the character of the great French classic. Boileau bears judicious modernizing better than many, and few would desire to find the older orthography and its somewhat loose, if not cumbersome punctuation in a thoroughly modern édition de luxe such as this, with its wealth of designs by MM. Bonnat, Boulanger, Cabanel, Chapu, Lechevalier, Chevreignard, Delort, F. Flameng, Français, Gérôme, Laurens, Lhermitte, Maignan, Merson, and Vibert, etched by MM. Boilvin, Chauvel, Courtry, Heilbuth, L. Flameng, A. Jacquet, Lalauze, Le Rat, Mathey, Mongin, Toussaint, Waltner, and others of hardly inferior renown. The admirers of Boileau cannot but rejoice in the honour done to his verse. Probably never were so many noble artists combined for such a purpose. Not the designers only, but the engravers likewise are illustrious. Thus, it is a pleasure for artistic eyes when they find Chapu's fine statue of Louis XIV. a truly beautiful example, representing him not when, as Thackeray had it, he was

Old, lonely, and broken-hearted, but as he must have seemed in 1665, soon after the satires were written, and while the brilliant 'Discours au Roi' itself could aptly hail the young Apollo of his time as the

Jeune et vaillant Héros, dont la haute sagesse
N'est point le fruit tardif d'une lente vieillesse,
Et qui, seul, sans, sans ministre, à l'exemple des Dieux, Soutiens tout par toi-même, et vois tout par tes yeux,
Grand Roi!—

and even Boileau himself could, with more or less sincerity, speak of his "muse tremblante." To have a drawing of Vibert etched by M. Boulard filis is a pleasure only inferior to finding a painting by M. Gérôme engraved by M. Le Rat, and representing with admirable spirit and sympathy, wealth of detail and richness of tone, the appeal of Boileau for rhymes to Molière, with the motto "Enseigne-moi, Molière." M. Boilvin has engraved in his best manner, or nearly so, a design of M. Flameng's of the episode of the dashing of the contents of the bard's plate in the face of his rival, as described in Satire III. M. Delort was at home in designing 'Les Embarras de Paris,' a crowded street scene, with circumstances Boileau did not dwell upon, the conception of which by the modern artist, who has delineated the city of our time with admirable zest, shows how familiar he is with the manners and characters of the Paris of Louis's early days. It is a capital work and finely etched by M. Boisson. M. A. Maignan has taken an austere view, yet imparting plenty of grace to it, of the degradation and banishment of 'Équité' from her throne, where

L'imposteur monte, orné de superbes habits;
La Hauteur, le Dédain, l'Audace l'environnent,
Et le Luxe et l'Orgueil de leurs mains couronnent.

And he has made a fine composition, with stately lines and energetic figures, of the whole group, which is highly dramatic, yet not theatrical, and charming in tone and style. The design was etched by M. P. Lefort. The salutation of Cinéas in Épître I. by the nymphs, his attendants, has been delineated with unwonted animation and characteristically fine draughtsmanship by M. Boulanger, and most learnedly and soundly engraved by M. A. Blanchard. The mere names attest the excellence of the work. M. Lhermitte's sorrowful Adam and Eve labouring to subdue the rough glebe are but loosely-jointed figures set in a telling landscape. The "petit village," a halcyon landscape by M. Français, a beautiful and tender view of a river, its wooded banks in a vista, with meadows and humble abodes, the whole shrouded in delicately drawn foliage, is worthy of the deft fingers of M. A. Chauvel. The coquette before her mirror watched by her admirers, whose diverse faces are capital studies as engraved with wealth of tone and apt chiaroscuro by M. Boilot, is one of the latest works of M. F. Heilbuth. The often painted subject the combat of the books in 'Le Lutrin' was wisely entrusted to M. O. Merson and the brilliant etching needle of M. L. Muller, who on a small scale has done his best, which is admirable. The work is exceptionally bright, clear, and rich, and the design picturesque in the extreme. We have nearly exhausted our space, but not our praise of this magnificent volume, leaving ourselves only room enough to say that the frontispiece, as well as headpieces to the 'Satires,' 'Épîtres,' and 'L'Art Poétique' severally have been engraved in a delicate line manner by M. L. Flameng after designs by M. Chevreignard, who, especially in the frontispiece, has wisely adopted the mode of Boileau's time, its ornate allegories and graceful, if highly artificial manner and types of fancy.

Nilfahrt. Von C. von Gonzenbach. (Stuttgart, Hallberger.)—To illustrate lively letter-press, full of picturesque descriptions, anecdotes, and dialogues, with numerous drawings of landscapes, animals, architecture, and antiquities of all sorts is a notion by no means peculiar to the German artistic voyager whose comely and well-printed book is before us. The literary portion, a sort of diary, is animated, discursive, and interesting without being new or profound. Several of the marginal sketches are neat and deftly drawn; the page cuts, especially those which represent boats and reaches of the river, are very spirited. The plates hors texte, which seem to be copied from photographs, are not so good. The whole is well worth having as a gift-book for readers of German. Herr R. Mainella made the drawings, about two hundred and fifty in all.

La Poupée, par É. Pailleron (Paris, Lévy), comprises some highly spirited and whimsical vignettes and larger designs by "Adrien Marie," showing what befell a pretty little girl of Paris, her doll, friends, and admirers. The text, in rhymed verse, is gay, pretty, and quite worthy of the eminent tact of M. Pailleron.—Monsieur Badaud, par G. Vautier, illustrations par L. Laurent-Gaell (Paris, Librairie de L'Art), abounds in capital little sketches of a witty and sarcastic turn, full of character and spirited. The comical doings of M. Badaud, his wife and six daughters need no commendations of ours. The story is in the best style of Parisian badinage.—Zerbeline et Zerbeline, par L. Perey (Paris, Lévy), is a quaint and amusing conte de fée of a sort, illustrated by a few neat and trivial vignettes.

In Epithalamium, by M. M. Barnes, drawings by D. Wheeler (G. P. Putnam's Sons), two ladies have combined to produce a wedding hymn, which, if we take it as a religious allegory, is passionately mundane, and if it is to be received as a bridegroom's address to his bride, is conspicuously deficient in strength to control and exalt its raptures. It is difficult to think of an epithalamium without reference to Spenser. The Misses Barnes and Wheeler are both artists in their ways, but their inspiration is not equal to their common theme, and this appears in the unbalanced rhetoric of the poetess as well as in the unbeautiful though sometimes spirited designs and not always ungraceful figures of Miss Wheeler. We presume the demi-figures of two ladies, one of whom wears a bridal veil, which, enclosed by a cartouche, supply a tailpiece over the word "Finis," are portraits of the ladies concerned in this work. If so, we hope the artist has done her looks injustice; but was it not a little premature to bind her own locks with laurel?

MR. NIMMO has published the first part of a handsome work, which deserves to have its French reputation extended, entitled The Soft Porcelain of Sèvres. It is to be completed in ten similar parts, in royal folio, comprising five beautifully drawn plates, printed in gold and colours, representing some of the choicest specimens of that very popular manufacture, which, splendid as it undeniably is, is detested by artists more than any other production of that thoroughly bad and vicious school of design which rose under Louis XIV., and was patronized by Mesdames de Pompadour and Dubarry. The French text of that accomplished connoisseur M. E. Garnier, which treats of the history of soft-porcelain making from its first beginning in Europe, has been translated with skill and care by Mr. H. F. Andresen. When the whole publication is before us will be the time for commenting at length on this text, which comprises a complete series of marks used at Sèvres from 1753 to 1800. Meanwhile it is our duty to commend the book to all whom it may concern; the plates are first rate, extremely delicate, brilliant, and, in their way, charming. The daintiness of the original colours is most happily given. The book is of the highest rank in its class.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION. (First Notice.)

THERE is not a single work of Italian origin at Burlington House, there are no archaic pictures of any kind, and when all are told, there are fewer pictures than in most of its twenty fore-runners. Still, by common consent, this is one of the most interesting and instructive of the series of exhibitions. There is a superb series of Rembrandts; an unprecedented collection of works of Velazquez and his school; several noble instances of Zurbaran, who is comparatively little known in this country; three first-rate Van Dycks; a dozen important Reynoldses, of nearly all of which there are prints; nine capital Remneys; and some charming portraits of Gainsborough. Among the other English artists are Linnell, Danby, Landseer, Leslie, Mulready, and Wilkie. Five Cuyps and two Maeses no one ought to overlook. To these let us add Tenierses, Terburgs, Metsus, and Ostades in extraordinary numbers and of choice quality. In the Water-Colour Room Alfred Stevens is represented, for the second time in his own country, by a collection of works which might have been richer as well as more numerous. If for nothing else, this gathering will be remembered for the groups of life-size, whole-length portraits of ladies and soldiers of the seventeenth century from the collections of the Marquis Townshend and the Earl of Suffolk, which represent the art of a period that has not been dealt with en bloc since the National Portrait Exhibition of 1866.

Gallery III. is, as usual, the centre of attraction, and, apart from the British works, is more than usually interesting on account of the pictures of Velazquez and his scholar and son-in-law, Juan Bautista del Mazo, the artist who was employed to finish pictures his master left incomplete at his death in 1660. It was Mazo to whom King Philip (Velazquez being in Italy) entrusted the task of painting his fresh-complexioned and fair-haired bride, who ought to have been the bride of Don Balthazar Carlos, a picture which is not here. The picture No. 132, which Sir Clare Ford has lent, is of later date. After the Spanish fashion recorded by Madame d'Aulnoy, she wore rouge, and this may account for the bright isolated roses in the cheeks of her portrait (No. 132), an admirable Velazquez. Her attire and coiffure are astoundingly bizarre. Its monstrous skirt, huge as an Elizabethan wheel farthingale, and almost as ugly, is one of the veritable guarda infantes, the embroideries of silver gleam on intensely black silk, and her dark wig is crimped into large waves of shiny hair, expanding on each side of the cheerful face. The Portrait of Mariana of Austria (No. 129), by Mazo, is a replica of a picture belonging to the Villahermosa Collection at Madrid, and the queen wears the habit of a nun, which Spanish custom enforces on widows. She looks younger than her years, which could not have been less than thirty, if the date 1668 on the picture has been correctly read. This cannot be, because Mazo died in February, 1667. He has given the widow the features and air of, say, twenty-five. Her hair is almost hidden in a white wimple, and her small figure and flat contours are concealed in a stiff and voluminous robe. Her face wears an expression of sadness which time and trouble were to deepen into the sour and resentful melancholy of Carreno's portrait of her in her later years, which is now at Munich. Madame d'Aulnoy says that her son Carlos II. was, till his tenth year, so feeble as not to be allowed to stand on his legs. If this were literally true, the feeble-looking boy here represented in the gloomy chamber behind the seated figure of Mariana would not be rightly named; but as the dates agree well enough, it is probable that the picture is right and that Madame d'Aulnoy exaggerated. Charles II. was seven years of age in 1668, and had reigned (but not governed) since Philip's death three years before. Don Philip Prosper died in 1661. Therefore the rickety Infant here shown cannot be he. The broad and simple coloration, the effective chiaroscuro, and the somewhat heavy illumination of this picture are characteristics of Velazquez which his pupil, who often painted much better than on this occasion, learned from him. The dark hair of Mariana of Austria (132) agrees rather with the portraits of her predecessor, Isabella of Bourbon, than with the fair tresses of Philip's second queen. The features are, however, entirely Austrian. In 1873 the same owner sent here a picture by Velazquez of Queen Isabella. The harmony of the black, shimmering silver and the rich greyish-white of the wide collar falling upon her shoulders in the portrait before us, and her almost ruddy carnations are all Velazquez's. The picture belonged to General Mead, and was sold in 1847 for 13l. 13s., and is said to have been given by Ferdinand VII. to Canon L. Cepero in exchange for two Zurbarans. It was at the British Institution in 1852, and the Academy in 1873. It is a close repetition of a portrait in the Prado, where the hair is red and tied with red ribbons.

The grim and stalwart Adrian Pulido Pareja (133) was painted c. 1639, i.e., soon after September 1st, 1638, when that warrior had, with stubborn fury worthy of his nation, stood for six hours in a breach at Fontarabia. The portrait reminds us, as Prof. Justi said of another version at Longford Castle, of Murillo's 'Andres de Andrade' in the Northbrook Collection, which was here in 1870 as No. 86. But the Duke of Bedford's picture is a portrait of far higher strain and fibre than the Murillo. There is no ground whatever for questioning its perfect authenticity, distinguished as it is by the strong virility of every touch, the kind of sullen glow that marks every tint in the dark ruddy complexion, the steadfast air of the figure, and the sombre vigour of the whole work. It seems to us better than the Longford Castle version, and is certainly a masterpiece. One of them is said to be the subject of the story that Philip, going to Velazquez's studio and seeing the picture, mistook it for the life, and reproached the seeming captain for delaying to depart when he had been ordered away on duty. Convinced of his error, the king said to the painter, "I assure you I was deceived." In Lord Radnor's version the admiral wears, instead of the red cross of St. Iago, an oval medal. Very rarely did Velazquez sign or date his pictures as before us.

The portrait of Don Balthazar Carlos (137) is a full-length and standing. When Velazquez painted him this handsome and intelligent boy was called "the Heir of the World." It is among the latest of a numerous class, and depicts the prince not very long before he died, to the dismay of the Spaniards. It is a repetition of a fine picture at the Hague, and it is said to have been given by Philip IV. to our Charles I. It is probably that which in 1651 was sold for 10s. by order of the Commonwealth. It now belongs to the Buckingham Palace Collection. The boy seems to have just dismounted from the pony which in numerous other portraits by and after Velazquez (see Nos. 136 and 138) he is depicted riding with much grace. He is clad in black and gold armour, and his boots are of russet leather; he wears large gold spurs and a sash of red. The design is full of spirit, and the characterization is good; but the smooth surface and even handling, to say nothing of the soft coloration, deficient in vigour and fibre as it is, do not look like the work of Velazquez. The picture is doubtless a fine old version by a contemporary hand, perhaps that of an Italian, trained in the mode of Titian and not so energetic as Velazquez's. No. 134, another Don Balthazar Carlos, formerly belonged to the Standish Gallery (Louis Philippe's), and, as it deserved, was much admired by Richard Ford (see Athen. No. 1337, p. 710) and Dr. Waagen. In 1853 it was sold for 1,680l. The little prince seems about three years old, and wears the petticoats of babyhood, richly embroidered with silver on a dark grey fabric. A gorget of steel is about his neck; a sword, sustained by a broad baldric, hangs at his side; and the whole is exquisitely attuned in colour and tone to suit the rich rose sash. The flesh is a delicious illustration of Velazquez's power to deal with the carnations of youth. Another of the very numerous portraits of this prince bears the number 136, and comes from Sir R. Wallace's noble collection. About 1827 it was, on the recommendation of Wilkie, bought in Spain by Woodburn for Samuel Rogers, at whose sale in 1856 Lord Hertford gave 1,270l. for it. It was at the British Institution in 1838 and 1855, and at Manchester in 1857, where it attracted much attention. The boy is about eight years old, and mounted on that "little devil of a pony" which it was the delight of the vigorous Infant to ride, although the beast required careful bridling and six lashes before he would "go like a little dog." The prince is taking a lesson in the riding school (?) of the palace at Madrid, and bestrides the saddle with that jaunty air which enchanted the courtiers and most of all the king, his father. Prof. Justi was probably right in supposing Velazquez was directed thus to record Don Balthazar's first feat in horsemanship with a correct pesade. The boy wears black and white armour, that red sash in which the painter delighted, and a wide-rimmed hat with a dancing white plume in it, both of which shade the animated face. Behind are numerous figures, with a building, probably the royal stables, a dove-cot over them, and, in a balcony, two ladies (including, perhaps, Queen Isabella), and one of those dwarfs Velazquez frequently painted among the king's entourage. The tonality is even more beautiful than the colour of this superb picture, and more remarkable than even the spirited design itself. The subordinate portions, minor figures, and background have all been reduced in tone, force, and colour, their shadows softened and their substance sacrificed, in favour of the leading element.

In No. 138 the Duke of Westminster has sent a similar Velazquez, painted at a later date, when the Infant was about nine years old, and showing him mounted on the same pony. Its qualities are similar, but the general tone is somewhat warmer; there is a different arrangement of the clouds, and in the background are very different figures. The building is the same, and so is the general design. There is somewhat less spontaneity in the prince's action and that of his horse. The subordinate figures before us, the famous Conde Duque Olivarez standing and taking a lance from the riding master, and, in the balcony, King Philip in a black dress and brown leather boots, Queen Isabella, one of the Infantas, and two ladies, one of whom (the Camarera Mayor?) is dressed as a nun. The atmosphere and general tone are almost as exquisitely graded as in No. 136. They were both, no doubt, as the critics have remarked, sketches at large, or experiments for the design of that magnificent masterpiece, No. 1068 in the Prado, where the boy prince, leading-staff in hand, in armour (as in No. 136), long buff boots, a black hat with a plume, and a red sash trailing from his waist upon the breeze, eagerly gallops his chestnut pony through a sunny landscape in unclouded weather, as if he sped to victory afar off. It is the very finest instance of what is affectively called Velazquez's second manner, where tender bronze-greens, warm greys, blacks, russets, and blues obtain in place of the clear silvery greys, pure whites, and fine scarlet reds of other days, such as we see in the earlier portrait of Philip IV., which is among the finest things in the Dulwich Gallery, and always reminds us of Van Dyck, while the second manner is obviously based on Titian. Several versions of Nos. 136 and 138 are in existence. A good copy is at Dulwich. Sir R. Wallace sent another Don Balthazar to this gallery in 1872, being a full-length figure in black velvet standing near a chest covered with red velvet.

In their attractiveness to students few pictures shown in this gallery equal the life-size full-length nude figures of young Spaniards which, in the Titianesque mode, is called Venus and Cupid (135), and is the property of Mr. Morritt, of Rokeby. To surpass Titian's masterpiece in the Prado, to which this admirable group of a naked female model extended on a couch, while a handsome Spanish boy holds a mirror to reflect her face for us, has been compared, was not given to Velazquez, in his later days at least. He could not compass the ideal of the Venetian, associated as it must needs be with the antique and founded on the sumptuous damsels and dames Bellini, Giorgione, and Palma took for models. Spanish prudery may have compelled Velazquez to select the back view of his model, who, if somewhat attenuated, is graceful and very animated, but it was Spanish prose which hindered him from attempting to give her a beautiful face—or, at any rate, something better than the commonplace, if not almost vulgar, visage of a peasant girl in the mirror's reflection. That he was unfamiliar with the nude—we know that Pacheco, his master, declared against painters studying the nude—is proved by the imperfect drawing of the model's outline, the figure's more than questionable anatomy, and inexact proportions. Very elegant is the attitude, while the legs and supple waist declare a form made for dancing with an air and spirit such as the stately, more solid, and voluptuous Venetians had not the least notion of. We are told that in Spain Velazquez was the first person to treat a naked figure at full length. The greater praise is due to him for modelling with so firm, researchful, and deft a hand the shoulders, neck, and long limbs before us, and, so far as chiaroscuro goes, developing the carnations with a taste so pure and in keeping with the surrounding black, red, and yellow elements on which his coloration at this time was generally based. We differ from Prof. Justi in thinking the modelling of this form better than Venetian in the "harmony between the tender touch and the firmness of the undulations of the inner surfaces." This phrase is a little difficult, but it seems to mean that the modelling is exact, delicate, and faithful to nature. The morbidez of the figure before us is, perhaps, more complex; but surely it is neither so fine nor so subtle as Titian painted now and again. The "tones" of the carnations do not seem, although Prof. Justi thinks otherwise, truer than the Venetian's. The Spanish and the Italian models differed, that is all, and Velazquez could not depart from his model, this long-limbed, slender, tall, and very human woman of the lower classes. Had his model been a prototype of Pauline Borghese, who sat to her sculptor without fear, the Spaniard might have approached Titian in flesh painting, and avoided that excess of purplish red with almost cold half-tints which impairs our delight in his great achievement. He would not, in that case, have needed to put these somewhat raw carnations on the black (telling as grey) silk quilt which surmounts the white linen of the couch. It may be that this figure has lost some golden and rosy hues; it is almost certain that an under-painting (say of Indian red) has "come through" the lighter pigments of the surface and damaged the harmony Prof. Justi thought he saw. Of the sensuousness he recognized we see none in the figure, attitude, or colour. With it Velazquez might safely defy the Inquisition. Mr. Curtis has shown that it was probably painted late in Velazquez's life; it was in the Alcázar, Madrid, in 1666, 1686, and 1700; in 1734 that palace was burnt, and doubtless this must have been one of the pictures saved. A scorched part has been recognized near the head of Cupid. Ponz found the work in possession of the Duke of Alva in 1776; Conca, 1797, and, later, Cean Bermudez recognized it. It was next found (one knows how it got there!) in the hands of the Prince of the Peace, who, with 'A Sleeping Nymph' by Titian, sold it to Wallis, the English picture dealer, in 1813; the latter passed it to Buchanan, his chief, from whom the late Mr. Morritt bought it for 500*l*. It could not have been on the advice of Reynolds, who had long been dead, this was done, as the authorities say. The Duke of Devonshire's Portrait of a Lady (141), which looks as if it had been cut from a larger canvas, seems to be a less developed version of the noble portrait of 'A Lady with a Fan' which is at Hertford House, and was here as No. 132 in 1888. The same person is represented in the same manner, except that here, seeming about thirty-five years old, she holds a handkerchief, and there she seems rather younger, say thirty; her air is more amorous and refined. It is a lovely exercise in colour embodied by means of citron, black, white, and brown, with the carnations. It was here in 1876, at the British Institution in 1852.

Pictures by Zurbaran, the most intensely Spanish of all Spanish artists, are comparatively rare in this country or elsewhere out of Spain. Passionate and austere devotion moved him so deeply that his paintings inspire awe, and force us to recognize elements in the Spanish character at once grimmer and sterner than Murillo or Velazquez cared to delineate. Zurbaran, who almost lived in a monastery at Seville, might be called artist of the most austere of the monastic orders. With a zest that was almost fierce he entered into the severities and the unrelenting ardour of ascetic devotion. The vehement rapture of his faces is not the less affecting when, as in Lord Heytesbury's St. Benedict (130), they are far from being demonstrative. On the other hand there is in the National Gallery a 'Franciscan Monk Kneeling in Prayer,' whose fervent asceticism is almost terrible in its self-abandonment. Another phase of the contemplative life is exemplified in the pale and handsome but prayer-worn features of St. Benedict standing with a vase of whitish grey clay in his hands and seeming to bless its contents as he holds it forth. Apart from the noble pathos of the face and the high imagination displayed in the design at large—merits which raise Zurbaran to the first rank in his country's art—the treatment of the black robe is of the finest, and as a piece of colour very grand indeed. The painter's chief defect, want of skill to harmonize the lines of his figures and their accessories, is manifest in the rocky cliffs before us, and unsuitable mountain pass which they enclose. The cup in this picture is that in which the envious hermits of the wilderness of Subiaco, to whose neighbourhood Benedict had retired, put poisoned wine, hoping he would drink its contents and die. Stretching forth his hand to bless the treacherous gift, the vessel fell to pieces and its deadly contents stained the ground. Of course this incident, which has its analogue in the history of St. John, was often painted for Benedictine convents, whose black robe the saint before us wears. This indicates that Zurbaran's employers were monks of the Order. St. Jerome (140) is another life-size, full-length figure in a vigorous attitude and with expressive face. With one hand he points to the angel's trumpet which, awkwardly enough, appears close to him on our left. The design is not so touching as that of St. Benedict, and the unrest of the figure is less impressive than the reserve of the companion design. St. Jerome is represented as listening to the tremendous cry of the angel of the Last Trumpet, which, as in one of his visions, was sounded in his ear, and because he had abandoned himself to the classics, a minatory voice denounced him as "No Christian, but a Ciceronian," adding "Where the treasure is, the heart is." The awe-struck Doctor of the Church is remonstrating with his interlocutor, and protesting he will, in future, read less of Cicero, and more of the Scriptures, studying Hebrew, which he had shirked, although necessary for his work as a translator. The lion, emblem of his fervid nature and his fortitude in the desert, appears at his feet; his cardinal's hat and cape are near. That his dress resembles the Benedictine costume may be a compliment to the Order. This subject is the same as that of a Domenichino in the National Gallery, and it is commonly called 'The Vision of St. Jerome.' Lord Heytesbury lent these pictures to the Academy in 1875 as Nos. 197 and 200.

The Duke of Sutherland's three Zurbarans, St. Thomas (142), St. Andrew (143), and St. Cyril (144), small figures painted in a broad, solid, and masterly manner, and designed in what is very like the mood of Michael Angelo, were here in 1870, 'St. Thomas' and 'St. Cyril' in 1876; they deserve the student's very best attention. They all belonged to Marshal Soult. The white draperies they all exhibit were painted with the fine skill of the artist, who was fond of such feats. —Lord Rothschild's Good Shepherd (131) is a capital Murillo, possessing all the best qualities and worst weaknesses of the popular painter. We need not describe or criticize it. Lord Wemyss has a replica. Mr. Curtis has traced the history of Lord Rothschild's picture. With its pendent 'St. John,' which is now in the National Gallery, it belonged before 1736 to the Comtesse de Verrue, one of the Aspasias of her age, who owned the 'St. John' and 'The Flower Girl' at Dulwich. She bequeathed it to her lover, the Comte de Lassy, who died in 1760. Next it fell to the Comte de la Guiche, and was sold, March 4th, 1771, for 12,999 livres; at the Marquis de Presle's sale, November 18th, 1779, it changed hands. In 1801 it belonged to "Citizen" Robit, of Paris; he sold it for 40,650 fr. Bryan bought it for Sir S. Clarke, at whose sale in 1840 Baron Rothschild gave 3,045*l*. for it. It was at the British Institution in 1816, 1838, and 1862; at Manchester in 1857; and at the Academy in 1870.

legend of the Sleeping Palace, which is rapidly approaching completion, has been compelled to put aside for the present the works he intended to send to the New Gallery and the Royal Academy exhibitions. It is, therefore, improbable that he will be represented this year in the New Gallery or at Burlington House.

MR. ALMA TADEMA'S 'A Dedication to Bacchus,' which was exhibited in the past summer at Mr. Lefèvre's gallery, is now, and for a time will be, on view in Messrs. Agnew & Sons' rooms, Exchange, Manchester.

MUSIC

SEÑOR GAYARRE.

THE death of this artist was announced on Thursday night last week just too late for notice at the time. Up to the present Señor Gayarre is the most prominent public man who has succumbed to the prevailing epidemic, for it was during a performance of 'Les Huguenots' at Madrid that he was seized with the influenza, which resulted in a fatal attack of pneumonia. As he had passed his forty-sixth year the Navarrese vocalist had no doubt reached the apogee of his fame; but his removal must be widely deplored, as he was only inferior to Jean de Reszké among operatic tenors of the present day. Like the majority of gifted musicians, Gayarre was of humble origin, and was "discovered" by a Spanish teacher named Slava. His progress was rapid, but his first conspicuous success was as the creator of the part of Enzo in 'La Gioconda,' at La Scala in 1876. His reputation had by that time reached this country, and in the following year he was engaged at Covent Garden Theatre, and made his debut as Fernando in 'La Favorita,' not as Gennaro in 'Lucrezia Borgia,' as stated in several papers and in Grove's 'Dictionary.' It was at once evident that he could not be accepted as the successor of Mario, but he made a favourable impression, more particularly by his rendering of 'Spirto gentil,' which remained one of his finest efforts. For several seasons he was acknowledged the foremost tenor in the Royal Italian Opera Company, and his last appearance was in the production of 'La Vie pour le Czar,' during Signor Lago's management in 1887. Señor Gayarre has been described as a tenore robusto, but this is scarcely correct. He could produce a powerful tone, but it was unpleasant in quality, and he did not possess the physique necessary for such parts as Jean of Leyden and Raoul. His voice was peculiar in timbre, and his use of the vibrato, though excessive, was rarely disagreeable. No other vocalist of the present generation had such a delicious mezza voce, or a more perfect command over the various gradations of tone in cantabile phrases. As an actor he was generally acceptable, though not remarkable, and his stage presence and bearing were characterized by a certain nobility and distinction too rarely found among operatic performers.

Musical Gossip.

A MEETING will be held at the German Athenæum on Saturday next on behalf of the Beethoven House Society in Bonn. Sir George Grove will occupy the chair on the occasion.

THE much-discussed production of 'Die Meistersinger' at La Scala, Milan, has taken place with somewhat equivocal results. Indeed, it is difficult to comprehend the notices which have come to hand, for we are told that the overture was applauded, and the finale of the second act encored. To those familiar with the work these statements are astounding, as there is no legitimate opportunity for applause after the overture, and a repetition of the street disturbance in the second act would surely be deemed an absurdity even by a Milanese audience. The representatives of Eva, Hans Sachs, and David, seem to have given satisfaction; but Signor Novelli as Walter and Signor Carbonetti as Beckmesser are said to be unsatisfactory. The orchestra and chorus, under Signor Faocio, are highly praised.

WE refer above to the curious error in various biographical notices of Señor Gayarre concerning the opera in which he first appeared at Covent Garden. Another lapse of memory on the part of several writers has occurred respecting Mr. Ferdinand Praeger's Symphonic Poem in F, which is in the programme of Mr. Henschel's Symphony Concert on the 23rd inst. It seems to be entirely forgotten that the work was performed at the Crystal Palace on November 27th, 1886 (Athenæum, No. 3084).

DR. WESTLAND MARSTON.

AFTER a long, wearing, and painful illness, which had reduced to a skeleton a figure once inclined almost to portliness, Dr. Westland Marston expired on Sunday last at his rooms, 191, Euston Road. He was born, according to 'Men of the Time,' January 30th, 1820, or, according to other accounts, in 1819, at Boston, Lincolnshire, and was article to his uncle, a solicitor in London. So soon as his term was out he began writing for the stage. 'The Patrician's Daughter,' a five-act drama in verse, produced by Macready at Drury Lane, December 10th, 1842, with a prologue by Dickens, spoken by Macready, lifted him into immediate prominence, and introduced him into the best literary circle of London. Douglas Jerrold spoke of him always as "the younger Marston," allying him thus with the author of 'The Malcontent,' 'Borough Politics,' a two-act comic drama, was given by Webster at the Haymarket, June 27th, 1846. 'The Heart and the World' followed in 1847; 'Strathmore,' Haymarket, June 20th, 1849; and 'Marie de Méranie,' Olympic, November, 1850. 'Anne Blake' was produced by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean at the Princess's, October 28th, 1852. His play 'A Life's Ransom' was given at the Lyceum, February 16th, 1857, and he had a share in 'Trevarion; or, the False Position.' 'A Hard Struggle' was played at the Lyceum by Charles Dillon, February, 1858; 'The Wife's Portrait,' Haymarket, March 10th, 1862; 'Pure Gold,' Sadler's Wells, November 9th, 1863; 'Donna Diana,' a poetic adaptation of 'El Desden con el Desden,' Princess's, December, 1863; 'The Favourite of Fortune' was produced by Sothern at the Haymarket, Easter Monday, 1866; 'Life for Life' at the Lyceum, March 6th, 1869; and 'A Hero of Romance,' translated from 'Le Roman d'un Jeune Homme Pauvre,' at the Haymarket in 1867. 'Broken Spells,' written in conjunction with Mr. W. G. Wills, was played at the Court, March 27th, 1872; 'Put to the Test,' Olympic, February 24th, 1873; and 'Under Fire,' Vaudeville, April 1st, 1885. With the decline of a taste for the poetical drama Westland Marston dropped out of fashion. An inflexible believer in the virtue and purity of woman, he could not be induced to present those features of womanhood which the present generation demands. After a dawn of unusual brilliancy, accordingly, he faded into comparative poverty and neglect. Fate fought against him relentlessly. His wife, a Miss Bourke, belonging to the family of Lord Mayo, died, and, owing to the disposition of her property, shortly after her death the fabric of his fortunes fell to pieces. One after another his two daughters, the husband and child of the elder (who alone was married), and lastly his son Philip Bourke Marston, his chief pride, went before him to the grave, and the prosperous writer, whose home had been the favourite resort of not a few of the best men of his day, finished his life in all but complete loneliness. Applications for a grant from the Civil List, supported by the signatures of all the most celebrated men of the day, were sent in, once under a Liberal and once under a Conservative Government, and met with strange and inexplicable refusal. The gatherings between 1860 and 1870 at Marston's house, 7, Northumberland Terrace, Regent's Park, are already quasi-historic. Rossetti, Swinburne, Theodore Watts, Ford Madox Brown, Dr. Garnett, Hepworth Dixon, Parnell, Lady Duffus Hardy and her daughter, Miss Neilson, Miss Ada Cavendish, and many others, assembled there on Sundays and a favoured few finished the evenings in the sanctum below. As a conversationalist Marston was most excellent, and as a courteous and attentive listener he had no equal. He had a phraseology singularly graceful and epigrammatic, and many of his casual speeches deserve to survive. When his attention was drawn to a celebrated actress who, in her later years, was betrayed into grievous exaggeration, he said, "Yes, poor dear; she makes wrinkles of what ought to be dimples." Scores of similar things fell from his lips; and more than one man had the temptation to constitute himself a Boswell. By those who knew him Marston will never be forgotten, and the estimation in which he was held in literary circles was very high. A couple of years ago a performance of 'Werner' for his benefit was got up at the Lyceum, and, thanks to the lavish generosity of his friends Henry Irving and John L. Toole, produced a sum of 1,000l. In his later years Marston depended for society wholly upon his friends, the service of many of whom was heroic and enduring. His degree of LL.D. was honorary, and was conferred on him by one of the Scottish universities. In addition to his plays, Marston published 'Gerald, a Dramatic Poem, and other Poems,' in 1842; 'A Lady in her Own Right,' a novel, in 1860; 'Family Credit, and other Tales,' in 1861; and 'Our Recent Actors,' 1888, two volumes of sound criticism and pleasant recollections. He was one of the editors of the National Magazine, and contributed some lyrics and reviews to the Athenæum. His remains were buried on Thursday in Highgate Cemetery. Marston left in manuscript 'At Bay,' a drama twice purchased by Sothern for a term of years and never acted; 'Charlotte Corday,' and portions of a play called 'Montezuma.'

Dramatic Gossip.

MRS. BERNARD BEERE resumed on Saturday last her representation of La Tosca, and displayed all her former power. Her return brought back to the Garrick Theatre the tide of public interest diverted during her illness into other channels.

THE rehearsals at the Criterion of Albery's comedy of 'Forgiven' have been suspended, and the piece, it is now decided, will not be played. Byron's 'Cyril's Success' is to be substituted.

DURING the short remainder of his stay in London Mr. Toole changes his programmes from week to week. On Saturday last, accordingly, he appeared in 'Paul Pry' and 'Domestic Economy,' which to-night will give way to 'The Don' and 'The Birthplace of Podgers.'

'THE TAMING OF THE SHREW' is to be the next revival at the Globe Theatre. It will be given on two nights in each week, the other nights being assigned to the 'Midsummer Night's Dream.' This plan of varying performances has often been recommended to managers, who, however, have a strange if explicable reluctance to interfere in any way with the run of a successful piece.

THE obduracy of the illness to which Mr. Thorne has temporarily succumbed has still further delayed the rehearsals of 'Clarissa.' As a stopgap, accordingly, 'The School for Scandal' will be revived to-night.

MR. MURRAY is going to republish from his magazine Mrs. Kendal's 'Dramatic Opinions.'

MR. H. P. GRATTAN is dead. He was born in 1808, and gave to the stage several plays, the best known of which are 'The Rebel Chief,' 'The Fairy Circle,' 'The Sisters,' and 'The Rake's Will.'

'A SINLESS SECRET,' an adaptation by Mr. Frank Lindo of a story of the Franco-Prussian war by Rita, was produced on Tuesday afternoon at the Comedy Theatre. It is an improbable and a clumsily constructed piece, that contains the germ of a possible melodrama, but requires different treatment and a wholly changed interpretation. With the exception of Miss Marion Lea, who, as the heroine, showed real, if imperfectly trained power, the actors were seen to disadvantage. 'Mademoiselle de Lira,' a rather lackadaisical piece by Mrs. G. Thompson and Miss K. Sinclair, was also played in amateurish fashion.

LITERATURE

Asolando: Fancies and Facts. By Robert Browning. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

It is difficult and almost impossible to criticize in cold blood this volume of noble and high-toned verse, issued on the very day of the writer's death. Calm judgment of the poetry is so invaded by memories of the man that every line of the book seems to throb with the living personality of him who had become a general centre of London's artistic life. And if the disturbance in the world of letters and art has not been adequately responded to by the world outside, that is because we live in a time when poetry is no longer a passion, as (for a brief space) it was when Byron wrote—no longer even a fashion, as it was in the early part of the eighteenth century—but a taste cultivated by the few. To have expected that the news of any poet's death would in these days ring through the land with as loud a sound as did the news of the death of Scott or of Dickens would have been to mistake altogether the signs of the times.

The place filled by poetry in the palmy days indicated above is now filled by no form of pure literature at all—not even by prose fiction. Science, as Lord Tennyson has just been telling us, bids fair to still the voices of the muses altogether. It is, indeed, the peculiar misfortune of pure literature in this country that, after having been dragged through the mire by 'The Dunciad'—dragged through the mire till men of position who were formerly proud of their connexion with letters became ashamed of it—and after having fought its way slowly up again in the early years of the present century—science came and drove it back—drove it back, not, indeed, to the Grub Street whither it had been driven by Pope's viperous malignity, but into the cold shadow of another kind of neglect. So it is, however, and consequently there is nothing that shows Browning's fame more strikingly than the fact that his death has been accepted by so many Englishmen as a national loss.

As to those who move in the world of letters, they must find it hard indeed to gauge such a loss—hard indeed to imagine London without him. Moreover, his mere physical vitality was so marvellous that to associate him with the idea of death was, notwithstanding his seventy-seven years, almost impossible. Had those who bade him good-bye when he left England for Italy been told that they had felt for the last time that hearty pressure of the great man's hand—heard for the last time that voice whose tones were so honest and so sincere—had they been told that before the close of the year they would find themselves following his coffin along the aisles of Westminster Abbey—they would have felt as though the death of a middle-aged man had been prophesied. For though, in the poem we are about to quote from this volume, he speaks of himself as being old, we, his admirers, could never think of his gazing upon nature with the eyes of an old man.

PROLOGUE.

"The Poet's age is sad: for why?

In youth, the natural world could show

No common object but his eye

At once involved with alien glow—

His own soul's iris-bow.

"And now a flower is just a flower:

Man, bird, beast are but beast, bird, man—

Simply themselves, uncinced by dower

Of dyes which, when life's day began,

Round each in glory ran."

Friend, did you need an optic glass,

Which were your choice? A lens to drape

In ruby, emerald, chrysoptas,

Each object—or reveal its shape

Clear outlined, past escape,

The naked very thing?—so clear

That, when you had the chance to gaze,

You found its inmost self appear

Through outer seeming—truth ablaze,

Not falsehood's fancy-haze?

How many a year, my Asolo,

Since—one step just from sea to land—

I found you, loved yet feared you so—

For natural objects seemed to stand

Palpably fire-clothed! No—

No mastery of mine o'er these!

Terror with beauty, like the Bush

Burning but unconsumed. Bend knees,

Drop eyes to earthward! Language? Tush!

Silence 'tis awe decrees.

And now The lambent flame is—where?

Lost from the naked world: earth, sky,

Hill, vale, tree, flower,—Italy's rare

O'er-running beauty crowds the eye—

But flame? The Bush is bare.

Hill, vale, tree, flower—they stand distinct,

Nature to know and name. What then?

A Voice spoke thence which straight unlinked

Fancy from fact: see, all's in ken:

Has once my eyelid winked?

No, for the purged ear apprehends

Earth's import, not the eye late dazed:

The Voice said "Call ray works thy friends!

At nature dost thou shrink amazed?

God is it who transcends."

Although he never put on the airs of youth—never had that jaunty bearing which is not a welcome ornament of old age—vigour was his chief characteristic up to the last. And although no one would have said to him, as Curran once said to Capt. Morris, "Die when you may, Charles, you will die in your youth," certainly those who knew him might have said, "Die when you may, you will die in your maturity." Maturity indeed—a long-reaching maturity—was the special characteristic of the man and his work. Whatever may be said of 'Pauline,' 'Paracelsus' (published in 1835) was just as mature as the volume before us. It had just the same marvellous intellectual merits, just the same, or nearly the same, marvellous artistic defects. What we long ago said in reference to English poetry, that "the Muse of England never grows old," may be said also of Browning's muse: it never grew old. And so with his physical resistance to the approach of age. "The great are ever young," said one who knew him well—one who began his own career as brilliantly as Browning ended his—Westland Marston; but perennial maturity, not perennial juvenility, was the characteristic of Browning's greatness.

Exhilarating and manly as was the teaching of every sentence that came from that busy pen of his, those who knew him in the flesh, and those only, could realize how great a man he was—how magnanimous and genial and brave—how full of that high conscience which is the "streak of angel" in man's nature destined to redeem the human race yet. We have heard it said that in order to enjoy the high privilege of his friendship it was necessary to be a blind and uncritical admirer of his work. The very opposite of this was the truth. Sympathy was, of course, what he sought—entire sympathy, like every other artist—but did he exact it? Certainly not! This, indeed, was one of the most beautiful sides of a character that was entirely beautiful.

The very incarnation of honesty himself, what he loved most was an honest man. If the honest man could also be a thorough-going admirer of his artistic methods, this lent him an added charm; that was all. Those methods of his were always peculiar; oftentimes they were nothing less than eccentric, nay, nothing less than grotesque. To one set of readers his very eccentricities gave delight. To others they were the bitter of the sweet of Browning's art. Towards the first class he had hearty goodwill; towards the second class he had no less. This is why we call him great. This was what made him beloved whithersoever he went. This is what gives such an interest to a volume published at such a pathetic moment as this. Yet that interest, intense as it is, cannot be called a painful one either. No true lover of Browning can call it a painful one. The loss is ours, not his; there is full consolation in that. In the time and in the manner of his death he was happy—no less happy than he had been through his long life. If ever the inevitable summons of death comes as a beneficence to a man, it comes so to him who answers it as Browning did, full of years, but still enjoying the plenitude of every power. It would have been peculiarly grievous had Browning died in any other way. Whom the gods love die as Browning died: young in body and spirit, old in years, loving life and yet prepared for death. For let it never be forgotten that a new meaning has been given to the phrase "old age" by this wonderful epoch of ours, which has produced Goethe, Victor Hugo, Lord Tennyson, and Robert Browning—Moltke, Bismarck, and Mr. Gladstone. When Shakespeare mourned over his "forty winters," when Coleridge called himself an old man at fifty, they little dreamed of a time to come when the fortunes of the civilized world should be lying in the hands of men of over seventy years of age. In the beautiful land for which he had a positive passion, in the arms of the son he so dearly loved and of that devoted sister whose name should be as musical in the ears of Englishmen as that of the sister of Charles Lamb, Browning passed away; he died without a long illness and without pain—died at a moment when all his previous triumphs had been crowned by still another.

There is a sense of solemn satisfaction, we say, in the thought of Browning's death. Not often is the poetic life woven after this design, alas! but let us take it as an earnest for the future—let us hope that the poets are the earth's infanti perduti no longer—let us hope that the fates have at last arranged a new pattern for the "life poetic," and that we shall hear but little more of Mighty poets in their misery dead.

To every man, whatsoever his life-history, death under such circumstances would have been happy, but especially so was it to him, whose joy in the clash of social life had a quite peculiar keenness—a keenness which would in a man of seventy-seven have been unaccountable did we not remember how peculiar had been the course of his poetic career. For ages have poets and philosophers been talking as though to enjoy fully the wine of life the drinker must in youth drink of life's best vintage, and drink his full. But is it so? There is this drawback to early success in life: "we think it will be always holiday," as Bishop Taylor says. To be in youth the spoilt child of Nature or of life is worse than to be snubbed by Fate or Chance.

No doubt to a poet early success is very sweet; but thinking "it will be always holiday," he is unprepared for the bitterness that is pretty sure to follow. It is not merely that his own ambitious dreams are likely to become too large, and that his vanity is likely to become unduly fostered, but there is the fickleness of mankind to be taken into account. In the matter of public sympathy with a poet's song there is at work a movement of flow and ebb which has nothing to do with the merit or the demerit of the work. Quite without reason, and governed by no law save that of action and reaction, it is as irresistible as the movement of the tide. He whose song had so entirely enslaved the public ear that for decades it was deaf to all other notes is at last discovered to be not so very musical after all, and, indeed, a very poor singer compared with new favourites. This would not signify if poets were also philosophers. But few poets were ever yet able to see how utterly contemptible is popular opinion upon poetry. There is no victim of popular ostracism so impatient as a poet, and his sufferings more than counterbalance all his former joys.

On the other hand, to have one's verses neglected during the whole of one's early manhood must certainly be unpleasant. During the period from the rise of Tennyson to the rise of those who used to be called (comically enough) the Pre-Raphaelite poets—Rossetti, Mr. William Morris, and Mr. Swinburne—the neglect of Browning's work must have given him many a pang. When Mr. Philip James Bailey leapt into fame by 'Festus,' Browning had already given 'Paracelsus' to the world. When by 'The Patrician's Daughter' Westland Marston scored brilliantly the success that Browning coveted above all others, Browning had written important works, and was still but little known. Some poets there are without the "last infirmity of noble minds"—poets to whom, as to Coleridge, poetry is its own exceeding great reward —poets who would rather have the appreciative sympathy of half a dozen well-equipped friends than all the noisy welcome of two hemispheres of incompetent applauders. But these are very few. Fame is mostly the goal before the poet's eyes. It was before the eyes of Browning. But what zest must his early disappointment have lent to his later successes! It is not men's winnings, but men's expectations, that govern their happiness. This is what makes us say that the peculiar course of his poetic career added to the keenness of his enjoyment of life, and helped to make the most exhilarating and delightful of men this great poet who went everywhere—so literally went everywhere that it is not easy to find the man who did not know him. Not even Ben Jonson kept himself so entirely in touch with the social life surrounding him—not even he was so known to everybody as Browning was known; and since that time there has been no other great poet who in this particular can be named. Byron was merely the literary lion of a year or two, and his great contemporaries never even touched "society" at all. But upon this subject of Browning's contact with the world so much has lately been said (and apparently is going to be said), with more or less of unwisdom, that a word or two of common sense upon the subject may not be inopportune here.

According to certain critics, who have been discussing the poet as a diner-out, the true waters of Castalia must have the sparkle of dinner champagne. But the principles of this gastric school of poetical criticism are entirely wrong. We believe that as a poet Browning gained as much by dining out as Lord Tennyson, Mr. William Morris, Rossetti, Mr. Swinburne, and others have lost by dining at home—that is to say, nothing at all. Browning himself was the last man to countenance any such confused twaddle as this. He dined out, went to functions, private views, &c., because he liked it, not because it could be of the slightest use to him when he sat down to write his verses. A great scholar once said that "it is only the highly educated man who knows the sham of education." This may or may not be so; but certainly it is he who has had most experience in the world who knows how little this kind of experience will do for him when he comes to write verses—unless, indeed, the verses be vers de société. To suppose otherwise is to confound the poet's function with that of the novelist—the function of him who deals with the innermost kernels of life to the exclusion of life's husks with him whose function it is to deal with husks first and kernels afterwards. The elemental in man, and not the accidental, is the poet's material, and that is why Homer's rendering of the interview between Achilles and Priam is at this moment fresher, more modern, as well as more ancient, than any scene in 'Tom Jones.' But this is the very quality which no amount of dining-out will enable a poet to seize. Nay, for aught we know the much dining-out may be in the poet's way. It is in "society" more than anywhere else that our souls hide themselves within the net of manners. Is the objective power of the poet a whit more apparent in the poems before us—the result of innumerable dinner parties according to the gastric critics—than in 'Paracelsus,' written when the social dinners had been few?

The effect of Browning's close contact with social life was seen not in his poems, but in himself. It gave him more savoir-faire than poets generally show. It made him "more like other people." The very opposite was he of the typical poet as imagined and painted by poets of the order of Alexander Smith and Sydney Dobell. A very prosaic figure would he have appeared in 'The Life Drama' and in 'Balder.' Entirely deficient in that uncanniness which was supposed to be the special and denoting characteristic of the bard, he would have been despised by the poet "Walter," who scaled Hampstead Heath to "die like a forsaken watchfire." But then, in place of these high qualities, he had that lightness of tread in the crush of feet around him—feet bristling with every kind of corn, hard and soft—which only contact with real life can give. In "society" it is an axiom that a poet is "not a safe man," but a kind of spoilt child of the gods, to be petted and humoured by the hostess for social purposes beyond his ken. But Browning's tact was as wonderful as his genius. By the one he was made popular as by the other he was made famous. As to his conversational powers, of which much has been said, it is, of course, impossible in mixed society for talk ever to be brilliant without becoming dangerous, or profound without becoming ponderous. And very likely it was always so. In Coleridge's time it was only on the retired slopes of Highgate Hill that talk about the Logos would have been found specially interesting. Perhaps in Shakspeare's time it was only at the Mermaid or the Devil that "wit combats" could ever be fairly fought out. But as profound as it ought to have been, and as witty as it ought to have been, was Browning's talk. And it was as bracing and genial as his verses. Indeed, it may be said that, unique as was Browning's work in English poetry, it was not more so than was his own personality in the various circles where he moved. Not that he, apart from his work, was one of those dominant personalities around which others instinctively cluster—cluster by that law of attraction which, with the opposite law of antagonism, makes up the economy of social life, even as, according to Sir W. R. Grove, they make up the economy of the entire physical universe. In Browning was not to be seen what Goethe calls the "dæmonic element" in man—the inscrutable and perhaps unconscious magnetism which enslaves all alike, but which seems to be neither genius, nor talent, nor virtue, nor even strength of will, nor anything that can be defined—the mysterious force which may exist, as in the case of Napoleon, alongside all that is mean and properly hateful, and may exist also, as in the case of Mazzini, alongside all that is exalted and noble. But something far more precious was his—the influence of a nature that was at once nobler than most others and more sweet, as, indeed, might well be expected of the producer of a body of work so noble and sweet as his, from 'Pauline' to the volume before us. Since Scott, and perhaps since Chaucer, there has been no more healthy writer than he; and this is to say that his work is to England a possession beyond all price.

And if this book shows any abatement of Browning's best qualities we fail to perceive it. At no period of his life did he write a lyric fuller than the one below of that power of rendering passion by suggestion which is one of the special characteristics of his method:—

BAD DREAMS.

Last night I saw you in my sleep:
And how your charm of face was changed!
I asked "Some love, some faith you keep?"
You answered "Faith gone, love estranged," Whereat I woke—a twofold bliss:
Waking was one, but next there came
This other: "Though I felt, for this,
My heart break, I loved on the same."

For concision as well as for suppressed emotion this is as good as anything by Heine, though, of course, in Heine the form would have been faultless. It is in brief snatches like this that Browning is always at his best. No poet that ever lived surpassed him in producing such dramatic flashes as 'Meeting at Night' and 'Parting at Morning.'

The volume is as full as any of its predecessors of that oracular poetry of which he is the greatest master in the English language. Without his oracular qualities, indeed, he would lose much of the worship of that sect to which he said he did not belong, the Browningites. From time immemorial there has been nothing so dear to the human soul as the oracular style of utterance, and the nearer the oracle approaches the conundrum the better. To play the Œdipus is to most people an intellectual delight beyond all others. The first to recognize the value of the conundrum among the "properties" of the vates was really Goethe. In one of his recorded conversations he expatiates on the importance to the poet of not being understood; but then he was discussing the second part of 'Faust,' and allowance must no doubt be made for parental bias. There is nothing very profound in describing a man as a being with four feet, that has two feet and three feet and only one voice; but its feet vary, and when it has most it is weakest. To say the truth this is rather silly. But put in the form of the Sphinx's riddle it becomes very profound, and to solve it requires the best intellectual forces of man. Of course the oracular style is legitimate enough in poetry—perhaps, indeed, it may be a natural attribute of the poet as vates—but we should be sorry to have too much of it. It is not really so difficult to write as the poetry of simple utterance, and is more likely to be imitated by people who are far from possessing any of the great master's genius.

'Flute Music with an Accompaniment' is an instance that as regards rhyme-music there was no change in the poet's ear. We confess to being of those who hold that his position among our great poets would have been higher if he had eschewed rhyme altogether and written only in blank verse. We believe that among poets there are those who are fitted by nature to do their best work in rhyme and those to whom rhyme is a positive hindrance. It is this which makes so futile the comparison between Browning and two or three of his contemporaries in which people are fond of indulging. Comparable, no doubt, are the methods of Lord Tennyson, Mr. William Morris, and Mr. Swinburne, but to compare the method of these with the method of Browning is absurd. The marvel is, indeed, that any art should be so expansive as to comprise methods so widely divergent as are his and theirs. But in order to state where the difference lies we should have to go to the very root and rationale of rhymed verse, and this is impossible here. Nothing can be more unlike than the mental process at work when a poet of one type writes in rhyme and the mental process at work when a poet of the opposite type does so. The function of rhyme is clear enough. Every poet, like every man, has been filling his mind with memories, thoughts, and emotions. Before these can pass into literary expression, they have to be stirred and disintegrated by some mental movement or another. With a poet who has an instinct for rhyming there is no such efficient lever to raise up the garnered riches of the soul as the quest for rhymes. With people of the opposite temperament this mass of poetic material, lying deep down in the poet's consciousness, is reached and disturbed by some other mental exercise than the quest for rhymes, and then, when this poetic material is recovered, it is afterwards manipulated by the poet within the restrictions of the rhyme scheme. Of course rhyme in the latter case becomes in very truth a clog upon expression. Rhyme is then used not to emphasize the "sense-rhythm," but to disturb it. Now, although Browning uses rhyme as a lever to reach the poetic substance within his mind, he manipulates his lines with so little industry, or else with so little skill, that the rhyme-emphasis disturbs the sense-emphasis as much as though he worked on the other method, and he is as rugged as Donne or Quarles, or any of those who make the rhyme subservient to the sense. On the other hand, without actually beating on the rhyme in the Dryden fashion, Lord Tennyson, and also Mr. Swinburne and Mr. William Morris, follow instinctively the same quest as Dryden, but under great modifications—that of using the rhyme-emphasis to strengthen what Biblical critics would call "the sense-rhythm." The great object of each of these poets is so to manipulate the rhymes as to make them seem to fall into their places naturally, inevitably, and, so to speak, unconsciously. In this their method is akin not only to the earlier English poets, Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, and the rest, but also to the methods of all the great poets of the Georgian era; for though Keats in 'Endymion'—perceiving that the eighteenth century poets ran into excess in their desire to make sense-emphasis and rhyme-emphasis meet and strengthen each other, and thereby sacrificed fluency of movement—broke up his lines until the rhyme-emphasis was lost altogether, he soon became aware that he had achieved nothing more than mere ruggedness, and in his really great work, the Odes, he returned to the normal method of writing in rhyme, and sought that last grace of rhyme which produces the effect of an unconscious movement.

If this last grace is the proper quest of the writer in rhyme, there is one among English poets who stands alone—unapproachable. The unconscious grace of the rhyming in 'Christabel' would be wonderful if it were achieved by some considerable sacrifice of pictorial power or of dramatic strength or of masculine concision. But it is achieved without any such sacrifice. Take, for instance, the description of Christabel praying in the moonlight beneath the old oak tree,

Amid the jagged shadows
Of mossy leafless boughs,

Into the entire passage the poet has packed more physiognomic detail than Dryden packs into his sonorous lines or than Browning packs into his rugged ones. The time is the end of March, and "the Spring comes slowly up this way." The boughs are leafless, they are mossy, and their shadows cast by the moon are "jagged." But so musical is 'he fall of the rhymes and the inter- f the lines that the picture slides into the reader's mind he knows not how. Unconscious, however, as the effect seems to the reader, it could hardly have been produced unconsciously by Coleridge, who combined a first-rate musical ear with that knowledge of the laws of cause and effect in metrical art which is the special function of the mere critical student. Lord Tennyson and Mr. Swinburne can achieve marvels of metrical music, some of them, as far as mere variety goes, beyond even Coleridge himself. But apparently they do not know why the effects are produced, as Coleridge always did. Hence Mr. Swinburne can invent new metres with more surety of ear than he can modify old ones. Let us give one instance out of many. Let us take the old octosyllabic quatrain, used by Ben Jonson and others after him, which Lord Tennyson has adopted with such success that it is now called "the 'In Memoriam' stanza." It has, of course, many beauties, but among them no one would pretend to discover that of easy grace. Its naturally elephantine movement is not, even in the hands of its great master, rendered quite so graceful as that of Perdita dancing "like a wave o' the sea." It has, however, one peculiar merit, that of continuity. Not being hampered by any suggestion of epigram (as is always the case with stanzas of short alternate rhymes), the stanzas can be run into each other with the freedom of couplets, and this especially adapts it to such a poem as 'In Memoriam.' Several attempts have been made to produce variations of this metre, the most notable being Mr. Swinburne's poem 'The Common-weal,' where a fifth line—a line of six syllables and rhyming to the first and third lines—is added. But this deprives at once the stanza of its continuity. Each quintet becomes more epigrammatic than even the octosyllabic quatrain of alternate rhymes. Now Coleridge also saw that something might be done by varying this structure. As a poet he knew that what the stanza needed was lightness; as a critic he knew why. He knew that what was needed was to abridge the rhythmic interval between the first and fourth lines, and he knew that this could only be achieved by giving to the second and third lines a rapid tripping movement, thus:—

Yea, she doth smile, and she doth weep,
Like a youthful hermitess,
Beauteous in a wilderness,
Who, praying always, prays in sleep.

By thus truncating by a syllable the second and third lines he gives the lines the rapid movement he desires, and this causes the reader to expect with increased eagerness the fourth line which is to rhyme with the first, so that even this stanza, which in other hands is so heavy, shares the easy grace of the entire passage in which it is introduced.

We have entered upon this discussion in order to show that this quality of easy grace, which all our poets who work in rhyme, save Browning, sought, and which some have been more or less successful in finding, Browning cannot be said to have missed, because he never tried to find it. With him a war between rhyme-emphasis and emphasis of sense is as perpetual as it is among poets whose instinct is not for rhyming at all. And why is this? Because, if he had been asked to define the rhymers' art, his definition would have been that of certain French critics, "Difficulty overcome." The moment he found a new and strange-looking word he seemed to ask himself, "How can I rhyme upon it?" and the more grotesque the word the better he liked to exercise his ingenuity upon it. His passion for double rhymes is explained by the same bias, and his ingenuity in the use of them is certainly the most striking feature of his work. This it is which so often robs his poems of that appearance of sincerity without which no poem can satisfy the reader's soul. Wherever there is a sense of difficulty overcome there is but little sense of sincerity, as need scarcely be said. English is, in genius, monosyllabic. Hence so poor is it in double rhymes that it is impossible to work in them without in some measure distorting the sense or else making the verses seem like metrical exercises. But, on the other hand, they have a music—an emotional swing—so far beyond single rhymes that the lyrical and impassioned writer cannot dispense with them. When, however, a poet works in them and secures thereby neither music nor lyrical swing he loses much and gains little:—

That's an air of Tulou's
He maltreats persistent,
Till as lief I'd hear some Zulu's
Bone-piped bag, breath-distent,
Madden native dances.
I'm the man's familiar:
Unexpectedness enhances
What your ear's auxiliar
—Fancy—finds suggestive.
Listen! That's legato
Rightly played, his fingers restive Touch as if staccato.

He. Ah you trick-betrayer!
Telling tales, unwise one?
So the secret of the player
Was—he could surprise one
Well-nigh into trusting
Here was a musician
Skilled consummately, yet lusting
Through no vile ambition
After making captive
All the world,—rewarded
Amplified by one stranger's rapture,
Common praise discarded.
So, without assistance
Such as music rightly
Needs and claims,—defying distance,
Overleaping lightly

Obstacles which hinder,—
He, for my approval,
All the same and all the kinder
Made mine what might move all
Earth to kneel adoring:
Took—while he piped Gounod's
Bit of passionate imploring—
Me for Juliet: who knows?

The chief interest here lies in following the poet's ingenuity as a rhymers, though when the reader finds among these metrical gymnastics "captive" rhyming with "rapture" he feels that sense of disappointment which comes to the spectator of a faulty acrobatic performance. The book is rich in Browning's lovely sketches of women, as the two following poems will show:—

SUMMUM BONUM.

All the breath and the bloom of the year in the bag of one bee:
All the wonder and wealth of the mine in the heart of one gem:
In the core of one pearl all the shade and the shine of the sea:
Breath and bloom, shade and shine,—wonder, wealth, and—how far above them—
Truth, that's brighter than gem,
Trust, that's purer than pearl,— Brightest truth, purest trust in the universe—all were for me
In the kiss of one girl.

A PEARL, A GIRL.

A simple ring with a single stone
To the vulgar eye no stone of price:
Whisper the right word, that alone—
Forth starts a sprite, like fire from ice,
And lo, you are lord (says an Eastern scroll)
Of heaven and earth, lord whole and sole
Through the power in a pearl.
A woman ('tis I this time that say)
With little the world counts worthy praise:
Utter the true word—out and away
Escapes her soul: I am wrapt in blaze,
Creation's lord, of heaven and earth
Lord whole and sole—by a minute's birth—
Through the love in a girl!

Facsimiles of Manuscripts in European Archives relating to America, 1773-1783, with Descriptions, Editorial Notes, Collations, References, and Translations. Vols. I. and II. (B. F. Stevens.)

So long as the relative importance of the American Revolution to other events in the world's history remains an undecided question, the best way to settle it is to ascertain and weigh the facts; and, despite all that has been written on the subject, many important facts relating to the beginning, progress, and conclusion of the American Revolution have not yet been made public. The historians who have had access to the national archives in this country and France have dealt with the facts from their own point of view, and their views have been often biased by a patriotism which is but a synonym for prejudice. Moreover, large numbers of documents containing particulars of great value have not been accessible even to the most painstaking inquirer. It is with a twofold object that Mr. B. F. Stevens has planned the great work of which the first and second volumes have appeared. In the first place he proposes to make public the documents which relate to America during the revolutionary war, and thus to enable those who read them to test the truth of the statements based upon them by the historians who have consulted these papers in the original; in the second, he wishes to add to the store of information by issuing documents which have not been consulted by any historian, and of which the existence might not even be suspected. This twofold design is intended to help students to ascertain the truth about a part of modern history which has been the subject of much rash writing and of many foolish allegations.

A summary of the introduction to the first volume will best convey the purpose which animates Mr. Stevens, who certainly deserves, what he will doubtless receive, high praise for the boldness of his project, and hearty thanks from all the students of history who profit by his labours. Before doing this we may state that Mr. Stevens's plan, as set forth in a prospectus, was "to supply subscribers with facsimiles of the American manuscripts from 1763 to 1783." Each facsimile is a faithful transcript by photography of the original. Thus the student, instead of proceeding to the British Museum, the Record Office, the Royal Institution, and the Government offices in France, Spain, and Holland, has an exact reproduction before him of the papers to be found there, the facsimile being sometimes more convenient than the original, in which the ink may be faded and the paper decaying.

What Mr. Stevens proposed to perform has been accomplished with complete success in the two volumes before us, which, as is said in the introduction, relate to the secret intelligence obtained by the British Government. Five volumes are to be devoted to this department of the subject, in which the conciliatory Bills introduced into Parliament and the efforts to restore peace made in accordance with them will be included. With regard to secret intelligence Mr. Stevens writes:—

"The confidential and private correspondence of the British Government with its political agents and spies, includes secret and intercepted intelligence from the time of the receipt in England of the news of the signing of the Declaration of Independence until the signing of the Paris treaty of peace in 1783."

It is quite true, as Mr. Stevens goes on to say, that "this correspondence is absolutely essential to a clear understanding of the diplomatic, political, and military phases of the peace negotiations, and will very considerably modify, and sometimes conflict with, current opinions of persons and events."

A perusal of the facsimiles now supplied enables us to confirm the opinion enunciated by Mr. Stevens. There was nothing with which the ministry of which Lord North was the head was more often twitted by the Opposition than with ignorance of what was passing in France and between France and America. There were blunderers in the Government, of whom Lord George Germain was the most culpable, for it was due to his unpardonable carelessness that Burgoyne had to capitulate at Saratoga, yet all the members of the Government were exceptionally well informed of what was in progress or impending. The spy system, which in modern phrase is styled "the Intelligence Department," was organized most skilfully, and appears to have worked admirably.

Our Government had a double channel through which information was procured. The first was the reports of spies in its pay, and Americans appear to have been ready to undertake the work for an ample pecuniary consideration; the second was by intercepting letters passing through the Post Office. If we may judge by some remarks made in these documents, the letters intercepted were not always sealed up again so carefully as to hinder suspicion being aroused that they had been opened. Before France joined the rebels in America the latter could keep up a correspondence with their friends in France and in this country. Even before hostilities began, and when communication went on in the regular way between England and France, there were difficulties in carrying or sending papers, and methods for overcoming them were resorted to. Our Post Office authorities became acquainted with these devices by opening suspicious letters. One of the discoveries is thus described in the document numbered 138:—

"Captain Burton of the Dieppe packet to whom Mr. Bancroft had been particularly recommended by Daniel Wistar, finding that Mr. Hake was an American, took occasion to intimate to him that he had a place in his vessel to conceal letters which the strictest search could never discover—and that it was constantly used for this purpose."

We fancy that Capt. Burton had cause to regret having made this confidential communication, and that he may have been puzzled to know why he was no longer able to carry letters undetected.

One of the most useful spies seems to have been the Rev. John Vardill; but Capt. Hynson, also an American, appears to have been the greatest rascal. Mr. Vardill's tactics will be understood by those who glance at the following extract from a letter dated the 29th of May, 1777, to William Eden at Downing Street:—

"I have placed an American, who is supposed to be in the interest of the Congress (a student in physic attendant on Dr. Fordyce, in Essex Street), as a lodger in the same house with Mr. Maise, alias Synaman, and doubt not but he will accompany him in all his movements."

Capt. Hynson, who probably posed as an honest and unsophisticated sailor, tried to make money by betraying those whom he had undertaken to serve as a spy. He made the offer to Silas Deane, one of the commissioners from Congress to Europe, and his treachery was discovered by opening a letter at our Post Office, which Silas Deane wrote to him from Paris on the 22nd of October, 1777. As the letter does the writer great credit, we give it in full:—

"To Captain Hynson. I do not write you to reproach you for the ungrateful and treacherous part you have acted;—I leave this to your own reflections, but as you have had the assurance to write to me, and propose the betraying your new patrons in the manner you have wickedly but vainly attempted to betray your former, and with them your country, I must tell you that no letters from you will hereafter be received by DEANE."

George Lupton, another American patriot who received large sums for his information, furnishes the following curious piece of information to Mr. Eden from Paris on the 9th of July, 1777; he wrote after breakfasting with Silas Deane. It was to the effect that he heard Silas Deane express the wish that Great Britain would effect a reconciliation with the American colonies, in order that both might unite in a war against France!

Enough has been said to show how much information of a curious kind can be extracted from these documents. As facsimiles they are excellent. The translations of the French are generally accurate, and such a slip as translating livre by pound instead of franc is rare, though it does look strange to see it gravely stated that a vessel of 300 tons was sold for 72,000*l*. No public library, nor any private one of any pretension, ought to be without a set of Mr. Stevens's facsimiles. Sir Robert Walpole irreverently spoke of history as a lie. These documents are full of facts out of which the intelligent student can frame a history of an episode in the American Revolution which shall be trustworthy.

The Land of an African Sultan: Travels in Morocco, 1887, 1888, and 1889. By Walter B. Harris. (Sampson Low & Co.)

A Selection of Sketches and Letters on Sport and Life in Morocco. By Richard Wake. (Field & Tuer.)

MR. HARRIS'S volume has the merit of not being a very large one. Yet small as it is the impression which its perusal must leave on the mind of the critic familiar with the bibliography of Northern Africa is that it has appeared rather late in the day. Once upon a time, when Dr. Leared ranked as an authority and Dr. Rohlfs's slipshod notes were accepted as geography, Mr. Harris would have compared not unfavourably with Ali Bey and Lemprière, possibly with Host and Jackson, Gräberg and Godard, or even with Chenier and Richardson. But after reviewing in such rapid succession the travels of De Foucauld, Stuttfeld, Thomson, and Martinière, we are compelled to criticize a fresh work on Mulai Hassan's empire from a higher standpoint than would have been permissible a few years ago. The result of the examination is a reluctant conviction that the world would have been little the worse had Mr. Harris reserved his journal for the amusement of his private friends, or, since he has thought fit to appeal to a larger audience, had asked some discreet friend to revise its pages.

The book contains almost nothing with which we have not long been acquainted. The writer visited Tangier and the other coast towns, in addition to Fez, Mekines, Morocco, Wazan, and Sheshouan, which are less known, and part of the Beni M'Sara country, previously, he thinks, an untravelled district. But all the capitals of Morocco and the coast have been repeatedly described, and the gist of Mr. Harris's narratives has already appeared in various publications. However, almost every part of Morocco will bear redescription, provided the tourist possesses special qualifications for the task. Unluckily Mr. Harris is, as he frankly confesses, not a botanist nor a geologist, a zoologist, a geographer, nor an antiquary. Nor do any of his companions appear to have been better equipped for the tours they undertook. The principal of these was made in the train of the British minister on a visit to Marak'sch. An envoy generally sees less than anybody else, though he may be deluded into the belief that the empire has been put at his disposal. But at all events he travels safely and cheaply, for a guard of cavalry is provided as his escort, and as the Sultan finds transport and provisions for the party, the cost of travelling in an innless land is trifling to the fortunate members of the "bashdor's" real or nominal suite. Hence his Excellency is never niggard in his invitations. In reality, the "mouna," or gift of provisions, which is large or small in proportion to the party, must be contributed by the hapless villagers on the route; so that an imposing following, instead of impressing the country folk, "eats them up" to such an extent that curses instead of admiration follow in the minister's rear. Yet it never seems to occur to our envoys—the Germans and French are more intelligent—to attach to the partysome men of science, whose researches would be more likely to immortalize the memory of the minister than the sporting officers from Gibraltar, galloping ladies from the Tangier hotels, sketchers who write about the trip in the illustrated papers, or lads whose only idea of happiness is to burn powder or bawl after a boar.

The latest British embassy to Morocco appears to have been no exception to the rule of its predecessors. It covered little new ground; but it rode leisurely over much of what was then, and is still, very imperfectly scrutinized—over provinces of the geology, botany, and zoology of which nothing is known. Yet throughout Mr. Harris's volume we detect no consciousness of what was missed owing to the ignorance of himself and companions regarding the past and the present of Morocco. Indeed, he only once ventures on a bit of ornithology, but with a success not so marked as to make us regret his abstinence from similar essays; for the "egret" and the "white ibis" (p. 144) are not the same bird. The only ibis found in Morocco is Plegadis falcinellus, which is not white, and is not the sacred species, so that Mr. Harris's theory about the respect paid to the bird he saw being a remnant of "some ancient traditions" handed down from early times falls to the ground. Most likely the bird which he describes "settling on the backs of the sheep and kine" was Ardeola russata, the "tair-el-bukkar" (cow-bird) of the Arabs, the "garrapatosa" of the Spaniards. Nor is Mr. Harris correct in his version of the Moorish legend regarding the origin of the stork. On the other hand, although the geographer must regret the loss of many opportunities, the reader who feels any interest in such incidents may ascertain how Mr. Harris kicked a wretched Jew who merely desired to thank him after the fashion of his ancient people; how he called a Basha a dog, and Alnaschar-like, spurned the humiliated greybeard from his presence. We also learn—and in learning understand why Englishmen are so dearly loved in certain lands—that Mr. Harris cursed a Moslem who performed his religious rites in undesirable proximity to his tent, that he swore in what must have been dreadful Arabic at the tribesmen who displeased him, and demanded provisions without paying for them. We also learn, on the authority of the person primarily concerned, that, to compensate the wealthy owner of a silver stick-top which had been stolen and sold for 4*½d.*, Mr. Harris took from the thief "what money he had.....and his new brown 'jelab.....and gave him five minutes to get out of sight, telling him if he had not disappeared by then, that I would take a shot at him with my pistol."

Amid this and much more silly swagger, which Mr. Harris is still young enough to regret, there are many passages written with good sense, some humour, and commendable vigour. Among these are the descriptions of Fez, Mekines, and Marak'sch, the account of the caves in the Atlas near that city, the Sultan, the Shereef of Wazan and his town, and pig-hunting near Tangier; while the reflections on the contrast between Christianity and Mohammedanism, and on slavery as it exists in Morocco, are distinguished by such acuteness as to make us regret that they are mixed up with so much silly matter. Mr. Harris's remarks on the people are of little weight. "Casual beyond anything," he tells us (p. 110), "are these town moors" (sic). The tale of his trip to Sheshouan is, perhaps, the least attractive part of his book; for here his tendency to play the complete Morocco traveller ceases to be amusing and becomes offensive. It is enough to remark that two accounts of this excursion have already appeared, but that neither is of any value compared with that of De Foucauld, who preceded him. Mr. Harris went "in disguise," though (it is needless adding) his disguise deceived nobody, and only served to arouse the suspicions of the people, just as any such mountebank proceedings as those he narrates would have turned an English village upside down. Nor, except on the theory that his guide hoaxed him to his heart's content—and a Moorish "personal conductor" will always find adventures for his patron, and even hairbreadth escapes when these are required—is it easy to understand how Mr. Harris, whose knowledge of Arabic is inconsiderable and who is ignorant of Berber, could repeat with such circumstantiality the whispered conversation of the Sheshouanees, the majority of whom speak the latter tongue.

In another edition Mr. Harris will do well to add an index and a better table of contents. There are also one or two dubious statements, to the elucidation of which he might profitably devote a little attention. For instance, the English did not "soon" after 1662 "give back" Tangier to the Moors. We kept it for twenty years, and then abandoned the place after blowing up not only the fortifications and the mole, as usually described, but the greater part of the town also, documents in the Public Record Office showing that Charles II. paid a considerable sum to the Portuguese residents as compensation for the destruction of their houses. Nor is there any ground for the common belief that the ruins at "old Tangier" are Roman. They are most likely Byzantine. It is also a moot question whether the so-called "Cave of Hercules" near Cape Spartel is the "Specus Herculi sacer" of Pomponius Mela. A cadi is by no means the Moslem counterpart of a Christian bishop, as Mr. Harris seems to think. Again, what does our author mean by saying that at Dar-al-baida "there is no harbour as at Mazagan and Saffi" (p. 254)? Now, as in Charles V.'s day, "there are no good harbours in Barbary except June, July, and August." Nor is there the faintest historical basis for the story which is related with such trustfulness about a Scotch skipper named M'Dougal being the original of Sidi Mogdul, the patron saint of Mogador. It is not less inaccurate to say that Mulai Idris I. was "the grandson of Mohammed" (p. 107) and cousin to Haroun-al-Raschid, while there never was any doubt why he fled into Mauritania. The object was to escape the truculence of the Kaliph Abdallah, who, in order to secure the succession to his own son, had put to death all the kinsmen of Ali at Medina except this old man. The illustrations to Mr. Harris's book are, though slight for the most part, sufficient; but they are not good enough to save us from a regret that he did not entrust the task of illustrating his book to the artist who accompanied the British mission to Morocco, some of the published drawings of that expedition being among the best views of Moorish life which have ever appeared.

Mr. Wake's posthumous volume is a work of an entirely different character from that just noticed. Its appearance recalls the melancholy circumstances under which the young author met his death; for he was killed at Suakim in December, 1888, while acting as the artist of an illustrated newspaper, and so early in his career that he did not live to see his first sketch engraved. During the previous winter he had visited Tangier, and shared in pig-sticking, bustard-chasing, and the other amusements of the place. His facsimile drawings are the result of this trip. Of the twenty-four, the majority are in sepia and concerned with the wild boar and the bustard. The remainder portray the "Soko," or market outside the walls, the letterpress being, for the most part, confined to the few lines descriptive of each plate. Considering the circumstances under which these memorials of a promising boy are published, it would be harsh to criticize their shortcomings with anything like severity. Happily, however, they suggest little save praise. With a few exceptions the sketches are so spirited that an unavailing regret must be felt at the early termination of so bright a beginning. Here and there, as might have been expected, the drawings are a little rough; but all of them are well calculated to supply a lively idea of those phases of Tangerine life in which the lamented artist was interested.

A Companion to School Histories of England.
By J. E. Symes, M.A. (Rivingtons.)

THIS little book consists of a series of "short essays on the most important movements, social, literary, and political, in English history." The essays do not profess, the author says, "to form a complete history," but he has tried "to make them so far continuous, that they will give a good general impression of the social, material, and intellectual growth of the English nation." He "passes lightly over the details of wars, dynasties, domestic and foreign intrigues, but gives more space than is usual in school histories to the condition of the common people." These statements give a sufficient idea of the scope of the work. In general character it may be regarded as one of the large family called into being by Mr. J. R. Green's 'Short History of the English People.' Social and literary history takes precedence of political, or at least claims an equal place. But Prof. Symes, if in this respect a pupil of Mr. Green, differs from him in allowing much larger space to the later than to the earlier portions of our annals. Four short essays cover the Anglo-Saxon period; five more carry the reader to the end of the Middle Ages; and more than three-fourths of the book are occupied with the history of the last four centuries. It is only from the Reformation onwards that the view of history given by these essays can be considered as really continuous; the treatment of earlier subjects is too disconnected to be readily intelligible without considerable knowledge.

It is not quite clear for what class of students the book is intended; but from its title it may be inferred that it is not meant for beginners. It probably aims at being useful to teachers and more or less advanced students, and to such there is no doubt that it may prove acceptable. Something more than the bare chronological summary, which is all that most learners have put before them, is frequently required, and a book which groups the more important facts together, and which does for its readers what a good lecturer would do, ought to be welcome to masters and pupils alike. Mr. Symes's views are moderate and impartial, and his statements appear to be generally correct. A few errors may, however, be noted, and there are some unexpected omissions. Mr. Symes steers a judicious course between the extreme opinions of Dr. Freeman and Mr. Coote as to the nature of the English Conquest; on the other hand, he adopts, with perhaps insufficient regard to the difficulties involved, Dr. Freeman's theory of the origin of the Witenagemot. In his chapter on "Feudal England" he treats English feudalism as beginning about the time of Alfred; but his account of the matter would be the better for a clear definition of what is meant by the word. The description of the Norman Exchequer as a "committee" of the Curia Regis is likely to convey a wrong idea as to the origin of the former court and its relations with the Curia. A slight slip occurs on p. 43, the first election of borough members being placed in 1264; the right date is given two pages further on. On p. 46, again, the date 1296 should be 1297.

A special chapter, and an interesting one, deals with Langland and Wiclif. There is room for surprise that nothing is said of Chaucer in a work which puts social history and literature in so prominent a place. Another chapter is devoted to Elizabethan literature, in which, by the way, it is rightly pointed out that much of the best of what is generally called Elizabethan is really Jacobean; but next to nothing is said of Milton, Bunyan, and Dryden, while a couple of pages are all that can be spared for the age of Anne. After this date literature almost altogether escapes notice. It is, no doubt, difficult in so short a compass to make a satisfactory selection of subjects; but these are omissions which might be remedied in a second edition without unduly increasing the bulk of the book.

On the other hand, Mr. Symes's summaries of important movements are often terse, lucid, and well expressed. Speaking of chivalry, he justly remarks:—

"It was a curious jumble of piety, morality, gallantry, extravagance, and absurdity. It professed to place woman on a pedestal, to idealize love, to inculcate a lifelong devotion to duty, and a quest for adventures in which the weak and oppressed were to be succoured. In practice these professions were often combined with cruelty, rapacity, and impurity."

It may be doubted whether the treatment of the political and religious movements of the first half of the seventeenth century in separate chapters, for the sake of clearness, really conduces to the correct understanding of either movement. Mr. Symes gives a clear account of the origin of the Whig and Tory parties, the former of which he holds to be, in its origin, the creation of Shaftesbury; but while he calls attention to the remarkable predominance of the Whigs after the Revolution, he does not point out the true explanation, which lies in the fact that the bulk of the aristocracy changed sides. An interesting parallel is drawn between two personages not often brought together—Wesley and Chatham—to whom is attributed the chief part in the rescue of the eighteenth century from materialism, and the elevation of its moral and political ideals. Not much that is new can be expected in a school-book which compresses English history into some two hundred and fifty pages; but Mr. Symes's essays may be safely recommended as containing a judicious selection of much that is most important in a very large subject, treated in a truthful, suggestive, and not unfrequently original manner.

MR. JEFFERY tells an admirable story, pre-faced by a touching dedication to his father, which is not merely pertinent to his narrative, but manifestly serves as its key-note. James Vraile is a plain, big soldier with a pretty, heartless wife. He is on active service in India, and there before long she leaves him for somebody else, without a grain of compunction. He is nobly unselfish, and suffers terribly from his wife's cruelty. As the author says of his hero, he "was bound to make as many mistakes as were possible under the circumstances. Such men deserve, of course, to go to the wall—and they usually do." He has some compensation, however, in the possession of a baby boy, and the companionship of these two is described with as much tenderness as anything else in the two volumes, which are conspicuously tender and delicate throughout. Mr. Jeffery undoubtedly has the art of telling a good story, and it is a long time since an apparently untried hand has commended itself to notice by such genuine and effective work.

Mrs. Walford has written of all sorts and conditions of girls, but so far she has not discovered so sweet and likable a heroine as Elma, "a sage of sixteen." She endears herself to everybody in the story—and out of it—by her glad-hearted, winning ways and her simple little kindnesses. She is welcome wherever she goes; amongst the "best people" or amongst the "half-and-halves," with whom she is particularly in sympathy. The nicest thing about Elma is that she is utterly ignorant that she has adopted a mission of any kind. She is one "whom nature leadeth," and it is into pleasant ways and places that she and those about her are conducted. If there is a fault to find it is that Elma is perhaps a shade too irresistible in her influence, too invincible, and too entirely unspoiled by circumstances, and that those who seek to emulate her may find their task less easy than it looks. But her story is decidedly pleasant and healthful, and it is a relief to find there is something besides "slumming" to be done by unselfish people.

Miss Woolson's former stories, especially 'Anne' and 'East Angels,' have assured her a welcome amongst English readers. 'Jupiter Lights' will not disappoint them. It is a tale of human nature, with little attention to any other kind of nature outside the lives of its principal characters. Adequate motives, abundance of incident, and careful work in fitting the details together have enabled the author to produce a powerful and romantic story.

'The Child of Ocean' was apparently begun as a boys' book of the buccaneering and bluefire order—at least, that is the idea suggested to the reader by the first few chapters—but it develops later into a novel, or rather a romance of a somewhat remarkable kind. Briefly, a young lady is wrecked on an island inhabited only by a man who has lived alone so long that he has lost the use of all the civilized faculties, even that of speech, and whom she educates, or rather to whom she recalls all his lost knowledge. Naturally, the first use he makes of his recovered sensibilities is to fall in love with his benefactress; and this love story, developed in such unconventional surroundings, is so well related that most people who elect to struggle through the rather unattractive opening will consider that they have not wasted their labour, especially if they read with due appreciation the picturesque and vivid descriptions of "wonders of the deep."

'A Cavalier's Ladye' changes its course as completely as 'The Child of Ocean,' but in an opposite direction. Intended, apparently, as an historical novel, its florid description of Despard the pirate's booty and the mystery attaching to his private sorcerer (presumably the founder of the firm of John Wellington Wells & Co.) may make it a fairly attractive Christmas book for boys, though it would be, perhaps, too much to recommend it even to them. But it certainly has no merits as a novel.

There is something so absolutely harmless and even well intentioned about 'Wheal Certainty' that it seems a pity, at a time when so many books are certainly not harmless, to say anything to dissuade the public from buying or reading Mr. Cahill's attempt at story-telling. And, indeed, it is not wanting in the necessary material for a passable novel. It has a hero and heroine (the latter a devoted daughter), a villain of the deepest dye, a mining speculation, and a sudden death; also, everything ends happily, and yet—and yet something is wanting. There is no hiding the fact: from beginning to end the book is hopelessly dull.

There were two families, one Irish and one Austrian, and a family arrangement was made that the two Irish sons should marry the two Austrian daughters; but one daughter would not make up her mind about it, but preferred to interest herself in a Jewish girl with a voice and a marvellous capacity for being imposed upon. Finally she took the Jewess's part in an opera, and next day her Irishman fought a curiously complicated duel, and then they married, and Mr. Fogerty wrote a book which he called 'Countess Irene,' and everybody was happy—except his readers.

'Currie, Curtis & Co., Crammers,' has a beginning and a middle, but is sadly deficient in an end. It consists of a series of scenes, some intended to be serious and some comic, in the lives of three young graduates who start in life as a firm of "crammers." The author has no story at all to tell, but he goes on stringing his commonplace daily incidents together until he has filled a volume—or exhausted his stock; let us hope the latter. Mr. Hyne's last book, 'Beneath your very Boots,' was distinctly amusing; if he will drop slang and drivel, and substitute a good story and decent English, his next should be still more so; but 'Currie, Curtis & Co.' is utter trash.

Miss A. K. Green has never written any other story comparable to 'The Leavenworth Case,' and her latest effort is no exception. It is gruesome enough for the most depraved taste; but there is no excitement in its mystery, and no great ingenuity is displayed in unravelling it. No one but a lover of the horrible for its own sake is likely to find reading 'The Forsaken Inn' a pleasure.

'Cousin Ned' is pleasantly and, in a way, cleverly written. There is a good deal of observation and understanding displayed, and some quiet humour besides. The characters are well individualized and carefully sustained, and the author contrives to avoid the least appearance of exaggeration or caricature. This is specially noticeable in his treatment of the heroine; she is not the most interesting of the group, and yet she is not by any means unlikable. Every now and again there is a touch that recalls—and no more—a something of Miss Austen's manner. The Ramsay Revivalists are in their way excellent, and so is Mr. Hamilton, who, with a very few touches, is made to give the impression of a real person. The story becomes a little too wire-drawn, and rather flags in interest, towards the end especially.

'Dr. Hermione' is a whimsical but clever little story with a character of its own, and a suggestion of reserve power besides. Few people figure in it, but those few are well and crisply drawn, and their talk is often bright and amusing. A shade of good-natured cynicism distinguishes the thing, and is not the worst part of it. It seems a little as though the author of 'Lady Bluebeard' (who is also the author of 'Xit and Zoe') had not been perfectly certain what to do with every one, nor, more especially, where to land them. The Lakes, London, and Egypt are the localities chosen. Dr. Jones is a pleasant, kindly old gentleman, with a sharp tongue and a shrewd eye. On the whole, the men are, perhaps, nicer than the women, about whom, nice as they are, there is just a suspicion of the "minx."

'Captain Jacques' is a romance of the time of the Plague, and is about as good as a great deal of that sort of literature is wont to be. The hero of this romance leads not only a double, but a triple life. He is at once captain of a band of cutpurses and murderers, an eminent physician, and his own servant. For some time he successfully keeps going the three characters in a merry enough manner, till a series of accidents (some rather improbable) betrays him at the close of the story. The reader has all along seen how the land lies, and is not greatly excited when the villain is at last run to earth. Though the story is well enough on the whole, there is no one in it who interests the reader at all particularly, unless it is the man of disguises, and he scarcely enacts his parts with sufficient zest and spirit.

ANTIQUARIAN BOOKS.

The Court Leet Records of the Manor of Manchester. Edited by J. P. Earwaker. Vols. X. and XI., 1806-1832. (Manchester, Blacklock.)—Antiquaries should be grateful to the Corporation of Manchester for the publication of this interesting work. There does not exist, so far as we are aware, in a printed form any series of manorial records covering so long a period. The first volume begins with the year 1552; the earlier rolls or books which must have existed are, it is to be feared, lost. It is the custom of antiquaries to disregard court rolls of modern date, and on their behalf it must be pleaded in extenuation that from the Restoration downwards they become less and less interesting. Though this be admitted, we are still grateful for having the modern records before us. Even in the nineteenth century the manner of governing towns has varied much, and the kinds of offences of which the authorities take cognizance are by no means the same in all places. The Court Leet of Manchester has in recent days exercised considerable power, and many offences which are commonly dealt with by justices of the peace, or not punished at all, came within the limits of its jurisdiction. The editor gives in his preface to the eleventh volume a useful compendium of the business of the court. The illegal acts most commonly complained of were "making use of defective or improper weights and measures; selling bad meat, or selling meat after eleven o'clock at night; allowing chimneys to discharge large quantities of smoke; not properly fencing off land, and not sufficiently guarding cellar steps; not keeping walls in repair, and not repairing bridges; allowing waggons and carts to stand in the streets, or permitting waste water to accumulate there." In 1820 we find the first mention of gas. It appears that William Hyde, a Manchester grocer, was possessed of a building near Market Street, wherein he made great quantities of "gass," and that he emptied the limewater used in the manufacture of the same into the public kennels of the street, by which he caused "divers fetid, nauseous, and unwholesome vapours, smells, and stenchesto the common nuisance of the inhabitants." It was considered that Hyde was at the mercy of the court, but no fine, so far as we can see, was inflicted. Mock auctions and auctioneers ringing bells in the streets, or otherwise making an unpleasant noise for the purpose of attracting attention, gave no little trouble. In 1831 a far more serious offence was dealt with. Thomas Cartwright and Thomas Hilliard were possessed of a certain room in which they permitted pistols to be fired and other loud noises to be made. The offenders were fined 10*l.* each, and a further sum of 50*l.* if the nuisance were not abated within one week. This seems a most severe sentence for keeping what was, no doubt, a shooting gallery. We imagine that the noise was not the chief offence, though probably the only one for which they could be proceeded against. The real ground of such severe measures must have been the fear of accidents. A John Stonehouse is mentioned several times. We have been informed on good authority that in 1797 he was a hat-maker in Oldham Street, and had a private residence in Lever's Row. He was the father of William Brocklehurst Stonehouse, Vicar of Owston and Archdeacon of Stow, 1844-62, whose 'History of the Isle of Axholme' is well known to students of the topography of Lincolnshire, and the far larger number of persons who are interested in the great drainage works of Sir Cornelius Vermuyden, the celebrated Dutch engineer.

A List of Civil War Tracts and Broad-sides relating to the County of Lincoln. Compiled by Ernest L. Grange. (Horncastle, Morton.)—To review such a work as this is impossible. We can but say that it is good or bad. No perfect collection of Civil War tracts is known, nor are we likely to become possessed of such a treasure. The text is given with sufficient fulness, and we have not noticed any omissions; if, as we apprehend, no book has been inserted unless the name of the city or county appears on its title-page; for several that are thus deficient exist, and yet are not inserted in Mr. Grange's catalogue. Take as an example a tract issued "by authority" in 1653, which is entitled 'Lieut.-Col. J. Lilburn Tried and Cast.' This scarce quarto contains much concerning Lilburn's factious doings during the riots which took place in Lincolnshire on account of the drainage of the low lands in the Isle of Axholme, an episode in the Great Rebellion which is commonly passed over by historians.

The Lost Towns of the Humber. By J. R. Boyle. (Hull, Brown & Sons.)—We can say little for the style in which this useful and accurate book is written. It requires a good geologist as well as an accomplished antiquary to do justice to such a subject. The Humber at some far past time was longer in reaching the sea than now. As time went by the coasts of the East Riding and of Lindsey were carried away, and the mouth of the Humber became much wider. The little long point of land on which Spurn lighthouse stands is a remnant of a much larger promontory. Somewhere about that spot, that is at the extreme end of the point, Henry IV. landed, for the towns of Ravenser Spurn and Ravenserodd had long perished. This lonely and desolate place—waste sand almost surrounded by the sea and the Humber—had attracted, as such desolate spots were wont in those days to do, a hermit, who had built for himself a cell or anchorage with a chapel attached. Of that anchorage, Mr. Boyle remarks, the present lighthouse at Spurn is the lawful lineal descendant. The sands of Spurn are continually shifting, though not so much as uneducated people imagine. Matthew Danthorpe probably took his name from a village in Holderness. He met the future king and his retinue on their landing. The presence of this solitary ecclesiastic was held to be a good omen, for hardly had the new king become settled on the throne before he granted to the hermit his royal licence to complete the hermitage and chapel which he had begun to build. The town of Ravenser was part of the great seignory of Holderness, which in the thirteenth century was in the hands of William de Fortibus, Earl of Albemarle. How far the account of its foundation is true or not we are unable to say, but the story is that the first inhabitant of Ravenserodd took possession of a stranded vessel and made for himself a rude home therein. The man's name has not come down to us. He had the monopoly of the trade in his solitary place, and soon became rich by selling food and drink to the sailors who passed by. He acquired very shortly the nickname of "De la Sea," or "At Sea." One of the earliest burgesses of Ravenser was "Peter atte See." This person was probably a descendant of the man who took up his abode in the stranded boat. He sometimes went by the name of "Peter de Mari." He got into a long and acrimonious dispute with the burgesses of Grimsby because he tried, not unsuccessfully as it would seem, to attract trade from the Lincolnshire town of Grimsby to the new place on the Yorkshire side. "Peter de la Mer," as he was then called, represented Ravenser in the Parliament of 1304, and was one of the wealthy merchants who were robbed by the Dutch pirates in 1310, and at about the same time he lent a considerable sum of money to the abbey of Meux. Mr. Boyle has compiled what seems to us a very accurate pedigree of the family of Atte See, or De la Mare. They intermarried with some of the best blood of the neighbourhood. Sheffield, Hildyard, Stapleton, and Monceaux are among the local magnates with whom they were connected.

Genealogy of the Family of Harvey. By W. J. Harvey. (Mitchell & Hughes.)—This is a painstaking twelve-page pedigree of the family of Harvey, of Folkestone, Hackney, Twickenham, &c., with four pages of notes. It begins with Thomas Harvey, of Folkestone and Hackney, who was mayor of the former borough in 1600, and is brought down to the present time. The Harveys were connected by marriage with various families of importance, such as Sawyer of Norfolk, Kynnersley of London, Lord Montague of Boughton, Dering of Surrenden, Whitmore of Salop, Robert, Earl Nugent, Francis, Earl of Bradford, Thomas, Earl of Stamford, Luttrell of Dunster Castle, and Wolstenholme of Edmon-ton. The pedigree appears to be executed with much fulness and precision. The compiler makes a special appeal to all Harveys or Herveys, and to their connexions by marriage, in this country and America, to enter into communication with him as to family history. Surely Harvey is one of our commonest names, and if but a hundredth part of those bearing the name write to Mr. W. J. Harvey, of Melbourne Grove, Champion Hill, London, we do not envy him his correspondence.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Pen and Pencil Sketches, by Nemo (Nisbet & Co.), is one of those volumes which lie beyond the range of a reviewer. When a man, who is presumably over eighty years of age, writes a simple unaffected record of his life's work as an Evangelical clergyman, it is impossible to condemn the results. Every man, whatever his age or profession, now writes his reminiscences. Why should not the parson do the same? One thing may be truly said. On the moral side of the question, this single volume is more likely to do good than hundreds of those with which we are deluged at the present day. But if there is certainly no reason why it should not be published, there is little or nothing, from the literary point of view, to justify its appearance. It is the history of an estimable, hard-working parson of strong Evangelical principles. Those who incline to the author's opinions will doubtless take pleasure in their enunciation. Others may not improbably find them somewhat narrow. It may be worth noticing that Henry VIII.'s Cromwell is confounded with the Lord Protector, and that the old story of Coleridge and the horse-collar is trotted out as a new discovery connected with the Lake district.

DR. WOLFRED NELSON, under the title of Five Years at Panama, publishes, through the Bedford Company of New York, an excellent work on the Isthmus. Dr. Nelson appears to have gone there partly as the correspondent of a Canadian paper and partly as a medical man, and, considering the climate and his hard work in the medical profession, has made good use of his time. Any one who desires to know anything at all about the Isthmus and the canal will find an answer to his questions in Dr. Nelson's work. According to his showing, M. de Lesseps has put out representations which are not only incorrect, but which he must have known to be incorrect; and if Dr. Nelson is right, the directors of the Panama Company, if it were an English company, would undoubtedly be placed in the dock.

THE name of "Cavendish" is sufficient warrant of the excellence of his sumptuous work on Patience Games, which Messrs. De La Rue & Co. send us. "Patience Games" contains a large variety of games, lucidly explained and admirably illustrated, after the well-known fashion of Messrs. De La Rue. "Cavendish" appears to be somewhat eclectic in his choice of the games for illustration and comment, and in particular it is to be regretted that the fascinating game of patience played with two full packs of cards, popularly known as "Job," obtains no notice from so competent a guide.

Tricks with Cards (Warne & Co.), the complete manual of card conjuring, is by the author of "Modern Magic." Prof. Hoffmann's book needs no other recommendation.

THE Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie of the venerable Prof. Erdmann is well known to students of philosophy as a trustworthy manual giving within a moderate compass an accurate account of the subject. Greek philosophy is treated at somewhat less length than usual, while mediæval philosophy receives more attention than is commonly paid to it. In the later editions the section devoted to German philosophy since Hegel has been greatly expanded, to the injury of the symmetry of the book. Not that German philosophy since 1830 is without interest, but because, with, perhaps, one exception, Germany has in the last sixty years produced no metaphysician of the first rank. Drobisch, Weisse, Lange, Trendelenburg, and Rosenkranz—to pick out a few names at random—were able and learned men, but they were rather commentators on other men's thinking than original investigators. Excellent as critics and historians, they contributed little or nothing of their own. The translation in three handsome volumes, published by Messrs. Sonnenschein & Co., is by various hands and of various degrees of merit, and has been edited by Prof. Hough, of Minnesota, U.S.—The veteran Dr. William Smith (not the editor of the dictionaries, but the Scotch Dr. Smith) has reissued his well-known translation of The Popular Works of Johann G. Fichte as two volumes of the "English and Foreign Philosophical Library" of Messrs. Trübner. The excellent memoir of Fichte is, we are glad to see, retained.

THE works of reference on our table include Hart's Annual Army List (Murray), a volume which is a household word in military circles, and has now attained its fifty-first year,—The Clergy List, which has now passed into the hands of Messrs. Kelly, and has been rearranged and improved in various ways,—Mr. Skinner's useful Stock Exchange Year-Book (Cassell & Co.), which grows in size yearly,—The Civil Service Directory (Allen & Co.), which undoubtedly meets a want, but would bear considerable improvement, the "Record of Services" being conspicuously incomplete,—Mr. Shirley Hibberd's perennial The Garden Oracle ("Gardeners' Magazine" Office),—and the Era Almanack, in which, as usual, Mr. Ledger provides a variety of interesting matter.

WE have received the reports of the Free Libraries at Halifax, Manchester (which has acquired the collection of the late Mr. Bailey), Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Swansea, and Watford. All of them speak of continued prosperity, with the exception of Swansea, where the lending library seems to be indifferently maintained, and consequently not so much used by the public as was expected. The third part of Mr. Pink's Catalogue of the Books in the Reference Department of the Cambridge Free Library has reached us.

MESSRS. EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE have issued a new large-type edition of their Variorum Bible. In this handsome volume the poetical books have been printed in paragraphs, the critical annotations have been brought up to date, and the explanatory notes have been enlarged.

WE have on our table A Month in Palestine, by Countess Cowper (J. Bumpus),—Political History since 1815, by C. H. Levermore and D. R. Dewey (Boston, U.S., Schofield),—Elementary Mathematical Tables, by A. Macfarlane (Ginn & Co.),—Miscellanies, by F. W. Newman, Vol. III. (Kegan Paul),—Whist with and without Perception, by "B. W. D." and "Cavendish" (De La Rue & Co.),—Our College Theatricals, by L. Croft (Biggs & Debenham),—How Men Propose, collected by A. Stevens (Fisher Unwin),—Follow the Right, by G. E. Wyatt (Nelson & Sons),—The Child of the Caravan; or, the Boy Musician, by E. M. Green (Griffith & Farran),—Mr. Orde's Grandchildren, by C. S. Lowndes (Nisbet),—Holiday Sporting Stories, by F. Mason (Trischler & Co.),—Girls of To-day, by A. T. Pask ("Judy" Office),—The Children's Treasury (Nelson & Sons),—Holy Gladness, words by E. Oxenford, music by Sir John Stainer (Griffith & Farran),—The Church Monthly, volume for 1889 ("Church Monthly" Office),—The Kingdom of God, by A. B. Bruce (Edinburgh, Clark),—The Church in Modern Society, by J. H. Ward (Boston, U.S., Houghton),—Histoire des Institutions Politiques et Administratives de la France, by P. Viollet, Vol. I. (Paris, Larose & Forcel),—and Les Contes d'Animaux dans les Romans du Renard, by H. Carnoy (Paris, Maisonneuve). Among New Editions we have Cyclopædia of Education, edited by A. E. Fletcher (Sonnenschein),—An Elementary History of Art Painting, by N. D'Anvers, revised by F. Cundall (Low),—List of Bibliographical Works in the Reading Room of the British Museum (Trustees of the British Museum),—and Wives and Daughters, by Mrs. Gaskell (Smith, Elder & Co.).

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

294, City Road, Jan. 14, 1890.

IN reference to Mr. Hiatt's note on p. 49 of last week's Athenæum, will you allow me to point out to British authors and owners of copyright that it rests with them to protect their own interests against the sale of pirated editions of their works in Italy, or in any other country that has become a party to the International Copyright Union. Under Article 2 of the Berne Convention they are entitled to the same rights which the law of any of the countries in the Union grants to natives.

In Italy piracy is punishable by fine, not exceeding 5,000 fr., and confiscation of all pirated copies or editions, together with the plates, if any, connected therewith; and the court also has the power of awarding damages to the author or his representatives. The steps necessary to ensure this protection are to make good their title to the work by registering it at Stationers' Hall, and then to instruct their lawyer, Italian or English, to move the Italian courts to seize the copies and fine the vendors. Registration in any other country than the country of origin is now unnecessary.

I cannot help thinking that if the Italian vendors of pirated editions once realized that English copyright owners were determined to protect their own property, this illegal traffic would soon cease.

SURNAMES ENDING IN "S."

12, Portland Place, West Kensington, Jan. 11, 1890.

I HAVE waited to see if any of your correspondents would draw attention to the Welsh practice as regards surnames in confirmation of Mr. Rye's conjecture. As no one has done so, perhaps you would allow me to say a few words on the point. It is well known that surnames, in the modern acceptation of the term, are of very recent introduction into the Principality. Broadly speaking, they have been formed from a limited number of Christian names, and that in two ways. Taking the names that first occur to me as being the commonest (and omitting such as end in s, as Thomas or Rees), from David, Evan, Griffith, Henry, Harry, Howell, Hugh, Owen, Richard, and Robin, we have Bevan, Penry, Parry, Powell, Pugh, Bowen, Pritchard, Probyn, Propert, &c., by the side of Davies, Evans, Griffiths, Harries, Howells, Hughes, Owens, Richards, Roberts, Robins, &c. The prefix b or p is for ab or ap, and means son. Where that prefix is found, the suffix s is usually omitted, while the series of names that have the s omit the prefix—evidently from a more or less conscious feeling of the equivalence of the two forms. That the attached s is due to English influences is susceptible of easy proof. Thus a farmer known among his neighbours as Dafydd Sion Harry, that is David (the son of) John (the son of) Harry, would have his name entered on a rate-book or register as David Jones or David Harries.

THE BOOK SALES OF 1889.

If the record of a blunder—a bookseller's blunder—in last week's issue ('The Book Sales of 1889') be allowed to pass without explanation, collectors of bibliographical trifles may, under certain contingencies, hereafter consider themselves entitled to nurse a grievance against the Athenæum for which its editor is in no way responsible. We are told that in the Mansfield-Mackenzie sale, held at Sotheby's in March last, a copy of Charles Lamb's charming fairy tale, 'Prince Dorus,' dated 1818, brought 45*l*. Being the second edition, a sovereign should have sufficed. It has been pointed out by myself and others, in your columns and elsewhere, that the original edition of this rare little book is dated 1811; but neither the second-hand bookseller who bought the Mackenzie copy nor those who bid against him seem to follow Capt. Cuttle's golden advice.

THE LONDON UNIVERSITY AND THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

THAT the London University, notwithstanding the rapidly increasing number of its graduates and the professional or political repute which some of its members have gained, is by no means what a university bearing the name of the greatest city in the world should be, is a question concerning which the public appears to have formed a definite opinion. But when it was known that a Royal Commission had been appointed to inquire whether the existing university should be modified or a new university created, the hope was naturally entertained that there would be an exhaustive inquiry into the present condition and the past history of the university, and especially into those particulars in which there is generally supposed to have been imperfect success, if not total failure. And it was to be expected that the results of such an inquiry would form the basis of a well-ordered scheme of reform or reconstruction. But these hopes have not been realized. The questions submitted to the Commissioners were too complicated to be adequately dealt with in nine days; and the changes suggested in the report are as unpractical as they would be found to be useless and mischievous if the attempt should ever be made to remodel the university in accordance with the Commissioners' suggestions.

To show how inadequately, not to say perfunctorily, the Commissioners have discharged their duties is an easy task. One of the worst faults in the present constitution of the university, and that which, perhaps more than anything else, has prevented gradual and useful constitutional reform, is the life-tenure of office by the members of the Senate, who form practically the governing body of the university. Yet the Commissioners have failed to acquaint themselves with the fact of this life-tenure. They speak (clause 28) of its being desirable that the changes they suggest should "not be postponed till the respective terms of office of the existing members of the Senate would, under its present constitution, have expired." This alone might suffice. But to give one other example. The three partially dissentient Commissioners, Sir William Thomson, Prof. Stokes, and Mr. Weldon, while expressing a just scepticism as to the possibility of carrying out effectually the scheme to which their signatures had been appended, state that "the London University has long since ceased to be in any sense a teaching university, and has become merely an examining board." The fact is, that if the London University ever was "a teaching university," it still is such in relation to the medical degrees, which can be attained only by the students of certain prescribed institutions. This important difference between the medical degrees and those in Arts, Science, and Laws places a serious difficulty in the way of reforming or reconstructing the university in accordance with any simple and comprehensive scheme. Perhaps it may involve eventually the distinct organization of the medical faculty.

Of the scheme of reform put forth by the Commissioners, or rather, perhaps, of that on which it was based, and with which it in the main agrees, the Home Secretary is reported to have said recently that to him it had about it an air of unreality. Certainly the Commissioners display a disregard of facts nearly as sublime as that which of old characterized the architects of Nephelococcygia. Including the year 1889, the number of graduates in Arts (B.A.) since the foundation of the university is 3,845, while in Medicine (M.B.) the number is 1,304, in Science (B.Sc.) 648, and in Laws (LL.B.) 470. Thus the number of graduates in Arts very far exceeds that of the graduates in all the other faculties collectively. And this disparity shows no tendency to diminish. The respective numbers for 1889 are—B.A., 238; M.B., 64; B.Sc., 60; and LL.B., 17; the number of graduates in Arts this year being thus not very far from double that of the graduates in Laws, Medicine, and Science together. Seeing, however, that the university, in accordance with its charter, was especially designed to promote liberal culture, this disparity should occasion neither surprise nor regret. But when the Commissioners propose that Faculties of Arts, Laws, Science, and Medicine should be created with equal powers and equal representation on the Senate, it is scarcely possible to characterize the proposal as other than monstrous and absurd. Law and Medicine are, in fact, already represented on the Senate in excessive numerical strength, while the effective representation of literature, learning, and general liberal culture is, to say the least, comparatively scant. This, no doubt, arises from the Senate being in great measure a committee of "grantees"—to use a term employed by Mr. Goldwin Smith with regard to reform at Oxford; and such a committee naturally has faults which have been animadverted upon again and again. A committee consisting mainly of "grantees," lawyers, physicians, and surgeons—and such the Senate would doubtless remain under the Commissioners' scheme—can scarcely be expected to have either the inclination or the ability to deal with many important academical questions. To give a single illustration. Some five-and-twenty years ago the present writer, conversing with the late Chairman of Convocation, Dr. Storror, spoke of the so-called "Scriptural Examinations" as not well suited to promote Semitic and Biblical scholarship. The reply was to the effect that there was no one on the Senate qualified to deal with the matter. Unsuitable and antiquated regulations continue in force to this day. It is probably still true that there is no one on the Senate qualified to deal with them.

Another important particular in which the Commissioners have shown a disregard of facts has already called forth a strong protest from the provincial colleges (see Prof. Hillhouse's communication to the Athenæum, Nov. 2, 1889). This is the proposal to place these colleges outside the university, and to confer extraordinary privileges and powers on University College and King's College, London. The Commissioners are, apparently, not aware that the proportion of graduates from the two London colleges has become comparatively insignificant. At the recent B.A. examination the proportion of graduates coming from these colleges was but 1 in 17 of the total, King's contributing, in fact, only 2 out of 238 successful candidates. The Welsh colleges alone had nearly double the number of B.A.s which came from University and King's together. Probably enough the London colleges have been seriously affected by the changes made at Oxford and Cambridge, and by the establishment of the provincial university colleges. But surely it is not impossible for them so to modify their arrangements as to hold their own in the competition without endangering what has hitherto been the unique distinction of the London University, the comparative difficulty, and the consequent value, of its pass-degrees. To exempt their students from the matriculation and intermediate examinations (as proposed) on the presentation of certain certificates could scarcely fail to result in a diminution of continuous study and an increase of cramming and "correspondence tuition" just previous to the candidature for the degree. Thirty years ago Mr. Grote and his colleagues on the Senate dispensed with the college certificate as a necessary qualification for the B.A. degree, alleging as a reason the lax manner in which such certificates had been given. There is no reason whatever to believe that certificates would be given now with less laxity.

It came out in the evidence before the Commission, and, indeed, was tolerably well known previously, that it was the intention of the founders of the London University to give it eventually a constitution analogous to those of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. No doubt difference of circumstances would require some difference of detail; but it is in this direction alone that useful reform is likely to be carried out. There would be no necessity for cutting off the provincial colleges. Such is now the facility of communication that representatives of institutions in Bangor, or Manchester, or Bristol could easily from time to time attend meetings of Congregation in London. The reproach of being, in any respect, "a mere examining board," would thus be wiped out, and the London University might begin to discharge what are really the highest functions of a university, the encouragement of continuous study and research, and the enlargement of the boundaries of knowledge.
T.

P.S.—A scheme differing to some extent from that of the Commissioners has been issued by the Senate. This scheme is, however, in the main open to the same objections as those indicated above, together with others resulting from the changes made. But the scheme is for the present merely provisional.

THE HOSPITALERS IN ENGLAND.

IF "Cecil Torr" happens to be ignorant of the past history of the Order of St. John in England, and of its quiet and unobtrusive works of charity, about which I write in the current number of the Newbery House Magazine, I venture to think that he might do better by applying to the Secretary General of the Order of St. John (Sir E. Lechmere, Bart.), at St. John's Gate, for a small pamphlet, which will enlighten his darkness, than by proclaiming his ignorance in the columns of the Athenæum. For myself, I have been a member of the Order for some thirty years; it was at meetings of its members that the Red Cross Society's work and the St. John Ambulance work were first inaugurated; and the charter granted to us in 1888 did not make us more an Order than we were before, though the Queen and the Prince of Wales then put their seals of approval to our work—the one becoming our Head and the other being installed as our Grand Prior. Her Majesty and the Prince would not have done this if they had not been convinced that we are what we claim to be, the representatives of those who, five or six centuries ago, in various ways assisted the cause of Christendom. I am aware that a few Roman Catholics sneer at us because we are Catholic, i.e. cosmopolitan, in our charities, and not Roman Catholic; but, as English citizens, we regard the Queen as the sole fountain of honour in Angliā; and if she not only places the stamp of her approval on us and on our works, but allows her children and grandchildren to join our ranks, we can well afford to exist without the countenance or patronage of Mr. Cecil Torr.

THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE ON THE ORDER OF ST. JOHN IN 'NEWBERY HOUSE MAGAZINE.'

DR. VON DÖLLINGER.

IN Dr. von Döllinger Christendom has lost its most learned ecclesiastic—perhaps its most learned man. There are, of course, many men living who excelled him in special departments of knowledge; but it may be doubted if he has left behind him a single person who can match him in the extent, variety, and accuracy of his learning. In the field of ecclesiastical history he had not a rival. A few men might be named who possibly surpassed him in minute knowledge of particular periods or local episodes: Dr. Newman in the preludes, development, and ramifications of Arianism and kindred heresies; Dr. Hefele in acquaintance with the history and correlations of the early councils; Lightfoot in mastery of the Ignatian controversy; Dr. Stubbs in the parts played respectively by the civil and ecclesiastical powers in the growth of the British Constitution; Schulte in familiarity with all the principles and details of canon law. But none of his contemporaries equalled him in the wide sweep of his knowledge, while in certain departments of history—the development of the Papacy for example—his erudition was confessedly unique. That branch of ecclesiastical history had been one of his favourite studies for many years, but he began a fresh and special study of it at the time of the Vatican Council, and it is to be hoped that the enormous mass of materials which he collected during that period is left in such shape that one or more of his eminent disciples will be able to prepare it for publication. It would be a monumental, perhaps an epoch-making work. It was certainly Dr. von Döllinger's own belief that the vast amount of new evidence which he had accumulated would completely undermine the historic basis of the Papacy.

But while thus following with enthusiasm the labyrinthine clues of mediæval history, he made excursions, by way of pastime, into various fields of learning, and produced from time to time works any one of which would have made the reputation of any ordinary man. His nature was wonderfully sympathetic, and he held the oppression and persecution of the weak by the strong in special abhorrence. Thus his early study of Islam led him to espouse eagerly the cause of the oppressed Christians in the European provinces of Turkey in the struggle of 1875-8. But there was nothing sectarian in his sympathy. He hated persecution, by whomsoever inflicted and whoever might chance to be its victims, and he justly hated it all the more when the persecutors were professing Christians. He opposed, therefore, with voice and pen the recent attempt made in Germany to revive the persecution of the Jews, and one of his last publications was a powerful and pathetic account of the wrongs which the Jews in Europe have at various times endured at the hands of Christians.

Döllinger was born in Bamberg, a picturesque town which, with its double-apsed cathedral, always retained a strong hold on his affections. He was born in February, 1799, and was thus at the time of his death within a month of his ninety-first year. Yet his great age had dimmed but slightly the brightness of his powerful intellect; and his magnificent physique, humanly speaking and barring external attack, gave promise of enduring for years to come. To the last he kept up his habit of walking two or three hours every day; and to be his companion in those walks was a rare privilege. He delighted to pour out his immense stores of knowledge on a vast variety of subjects, standing still occasionally, if the topic of conversation chanced to be a matter of controversy, to emphasize his argument. He was a charming talker, full of anecdote and humour, and thoroughly enjoying a hearty laugh. He once told the present writer, with keen zest, an amusing story of the Archbishop of Munich, who subsequently excommunicated him. When it was announced to the archbishop that he was to receive the archiepiscopal pall forthwith, his Grace betook himself to serious religious preparation for the great honour. The tradition is—a tradition in which the archbishop devoutly believed—that this pall is woven by the pure hands of nuns in a Roman convent from wool shorn off the backs of sacred lambs kept for that very purpose, and is then dispatched to the honoured recipient by a special messenger from the Vatican. The archbishop accordingly set apart some days for religious seclusion and meditation, and on the appointed day waited in a proper frame of mind for the messenger from the Vatican with the pall and the Papal benediction. Presently there was a ring at the bell, and the servant announced the advent of the bearer of the pall. Into the archbishop's presence there was speedily ushered a Munich Jewish banker, who at once opened a bag and pulled out the pall, which he handed to the archbishop together with a bill for 200l. The archbishop himself told the story to Döllinger, and gave a pathetic description of the sudden collapse of his holy meditations. But what struck Döllinger was the humour of the thing, and he laughed heartily over his recollection of it. In the course of his walks he sometimes met a file of Seminarists accompanied by one or two priests. When they met him they stood still in single file on one side of the road, and with bare and bent heads saluted him reverently as he passed. His companion on one of these occasions remarked: "That is very strange. They ought all to have turned another way and spat as you, an excommunicated ecclesiastic, passed them." "Oh! they are all sorry for what has happened," he replied. "I believe that if I presented myself at any church in Munich to receive the sacrament, it would be given to me. The priest would conveniently not know me. Besides," he added, with a merry twinkle in his eye, "excommunicated though I am, I still possess a good deal of ecclesiastical patronage." For the King and Government of Bavaria took no notice of the Papal excommunication, and Dr. von Döllinger retained all the offices which he had previously held, including the deanery of the Chapels Royal. An instance of his mental and bodily vigour may here be mentioned in connexion with the two Bonn conferences which he assembled with a view to bring about an understanding on disputed points between Roman Catholic, Oriental, and Anglican churchmen. At the Conference of 1875, Dr. von Döllinger, then in his seventy-sixth year, made a speech of five hours' duration, in which he gave a masterly review of the whole subject. It would have been a wonderful intellectual and physical tour de force for any man; it was a marvellous exhibition on the part of a man of Döllinger's years. He never hesitated, never used a note, and never leant for support on anything all the time that he was delighting an audience of English, American, German, French, Italian, Russian, Greek, and Armenian ecclesiastics and laymen. He was very fond of bodily exercise, and never gave up his habit of having a good swim daily in the Tegernsee during the weeks he spent there in the autumn of each year with his friend and former pupil, Lord Acton.

The main points in Dr. von Döllinger's public life are too well known to require any detailed notice here. His university career was a distinguished one, and he was barely out of his teens when he became a professor. His literary activity was extraordinary, both in its intensity and in the variety of the subjects which occupied his mind and employed his pen. His mind was one of singular independence, and his master passion was unwavering loyalty to the truth, be the consequences to himself or his cause what they might. This fearless love of truth brought him very early under the suspicion of the Vatican. He used himself to tell a story in illustration of this. When a Roman Catholic is admitted to a private audience of the Pope, it is part of the ceremonial that he should prostrate himself a certain number of times between the door of the reception room and Papal chair. When Döllinger had his first interview with the late Pope he noticed that the Holy Father watched keenly to see whether the great German professor would go through the stated number of prostrations. But Döllinger omitted no part of the ceremonial, for he troubled himself exceedingly little, one way or the other, about the visible pageantry of rank and power provided that he approved of the substance.

It is, of course, known to everybody that Döllinger was the very soul of the opposition to Papal Infallibility in the Vatican Council and afterwards. His was the brain that organized the opposition, and supplied, for the most part, the intellectual ammunition which riddled the cause of Infallibility into shreds unless the appeal to history was altogether abandoned. It was one of the many examples of his intimate knowledge of the secret springs and counsels of foreign Governments, and of the Vatican in particular, that he knew, months before any one suspected it, that the main purpose of the wire-pullers of the Vatican Council was to spring the dogma of Infallibility on the world by a sudden movement. He sounded the alarm in that series of powerful articles (inspired by him) which appeared in the Augsburg Gazette, and were afterwards published in collected form in the famous volume which appeared under the designation of "Janus." The German bishops were all opposed to any attempt to impose Papal Infallibility as a dogma, and were incredulous as to any attempt being made in the Council in that direction. The Archbishop of Munich assured him at the railway station, when Döllinger went to see him off to Rome, that there was no likelihood of the dogma being seriously proposed. "But if it should be proposed," added the archbishop, "you may rely on my opposing it." He did take the side of the minority in the Council which opposed the dogma; but when it was carried by the votes of the majority, the archbishop was among the first to yield; and, not satisfied with that, he proceeded—much against his will, it is true—to excommunicate Dr. Dollinger for not following his own example. Dollinger was under no illusion as to the result. He said to a friend at the time: "The bishops of the minority [they numbered more than eighty] must either yield or resign their sees. Look at Hefe [Bishop of Rottenburg]. His Quinquennial Faculties* have expired, and at this moment there are nineteen couples of rank in his diocese who cannot get married because he cannot give the necessary dispensations." The event proved that he was right. Hefe and all the rest of the protesting bishops yielded one by one.

Who can tell what might have been the consequence of their perseverance in opposition? Cardinal Newman has declared in his 'Letter to the Duke of Norfolk' that if the minority had held out he would not have considered the decree of Infallibility binding on his conscience. When the present Pope succeeded Pío Nono he sent an envoy from the Vatican to Dr. Dollinger with the message: "Come back to us, perchè c'è un altro Papa." "Yes," answered Dollinger, "but the same Papacy." Some years before this he had said to the present writer that a new Pope, however well intentioned, could do next to nothing. "The Papacy," he said, "is the growth of centuries, and it will take generations to destroy it." With the Vatican decrees he rejected from the domain of necessary faith both the dogma of the Immaculate Conception and the decrees of Trent, and took his stand on the dogmas accepted by undivided Christendom.

Most of the obituary notices of him have spoken of his "separation" from the Church of Rome. That is an expression which he always repudiated. He did so once in a letter to the writer of this article. "You know," he said, "that an unjust excommunication is quite invalid. I am consequently still in the communion of the Church of Rome, though I think it right to obey the sentence of excommunication, utterly invalid as I deem it." And in his mind the Old Catholic movement aimed at supplying the ordinances of the Church to those who were unjustly deprived of them, and also at working as a leaven of reform within the bosom of the Roman Church rather than as a rival and aggressive communion. He attributed the comparatively small impression made in Germany by the Old Catholic movement to Bismarck's ill-advised Falk Laws. By accepting and proclaiming as an article of necessary faith a decree which the bishops of the minority had denounced as an historic falsehood the bishops, Dollinger said, had lost caste in Germany. But Bismarck, by his persecution of them, had enabled them to show dignity and heroism in suffering, and this had largely rehabilitated them in the eyes of the German people.

Much more might be said if space permitted. All that has been attempted here is to give our readers some of the salient features of the character of one of the most remarkable and influential, and also one of the most lovable, men of the nineteenth century. He was a great politician as well as a great ecclesiastic, and held confidential relations with most of the leading statesmen of our time.

THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS.

A MEETING of English representatives of the International Assembly of Orientalists, consisting of 157 signatories of the circular which we published in our issue of the 14th ult., was held on Wednesday. The resolutions which we published last week were all accepted by the meeting. Subjects for discussion and proposals were suggested by Profs. Montet, Kaulen, de Harlez, Robiou, Van den Gheyn, Houdas, and others,

* I.e., faculties granted every five years to every bishop in the Roman communion. Unless these faculties are renewed on their quinquennial expiration the bishop's hands are tied, and he cannot carry on the ordinary administration of his diocese. It is an admirable system for keeping the bishops in complete subjection to the Pope.

which will be duly circulated among the signatory members. Offers of prizes were also received. The following scholars (subject to their consent to act and with power to add to their number) were accepted as delegates or members of the committees of delegates for the following countries in order to receive adhesions to the Congress, and to suggest subjects for research and discussion: for Germany, Profs. Abel, Kielhorn, Kaulen, Spiegel, Wilhelm, and Drs. von Bilguer and Rafter; for Austria, Profs. Grünert and Steininger, and Mr. Glaser; for Belgium, Profs. de Harlez, Michel, Van den Gheyn; for Denmark, Prof. Fausbøll, Dr. d'Irgensberg, Jensen, Aderssen; for Spain, Prof. D. Delfin Donadieu, Dr. G. C. Naranyo de Palmas; for the United States of America, Profs. Lanman, T. Chase, Gottheil, Hatfield, Platner; for Holland, Prof. G. Schlegel, M. J. Meyer, and Dr. van Logherm; for Italy, Profs. Gorresio, Severini, Turrini, Grossi, Puini, Cora, and M. R. Bonghi; for Portugal, Prof. G. de Vasconcellos-Abreu and G. Vianna; for Russia, Prof. Tsagarelli, Chwolson, Gottwaldt (Finland being represented by Prof. O. Donner and Dr. J. N. Reuter; and Poland by Dr. Karłowicz); Roumania, Prof. Hazdeu; Sweden, Prof. Skarstedt and Rector Malmström; Switzerland, Profs. Montet and Baumgartner; Greece, Dr. D. Melessinos. The English organizing committee, we believe, is to be composed of Prof. Sayce, Dr. Leitner, Prof. Douglas, Dr. Ginsburg, Dr. Bellew, Mr. Hewitt, and Dr. Bullinger; the comité de réception of Sir A. C. Lyall, Sir G. Birdwood, Sir L. Griffin, Sir R. Meade, Prof. Douglas, Dr. Leitner, Dr. Ginsburg, Dr. Badenoch, and Mr. J. Macdonald. The general meetings of members have been fixed to be held once in every three months. Prof. Douglas will specially conduct the correspondence with China and Japan; Dr. Ginsburg with Russia, Germany, and Austria; Dr. Leitner with France, Hungary, Turkey, and India (with the exception of the North-West Provinces, which have been taken charge of by Mr. W. Irvine); Prof. Salmoné and the Rev. Dr. A. Tien with Syria and Egypt; Dr. Phéné with the United States; Mr. Macdonald with Australia; Dr. R. G. Badenoch with Scotland; and Mr. F. W. Percival with, we believe, Belgium, Spain, and Portugal; whilst the general business for the forthcoming Congress will continue to be done by Dr. Ginsburg, Prof. Douglas, and Dr. Leitner in England, and by Prof. Maspero, the Marquis de Croizier, and M. Madier de Montjau in France.

Literary Gossip.

THE original autograph MSS. of the first canto of Sir Walter Scott's 'Lay of the Last Minstrel' and the whole of Tom Moore's 'Lalla Rookh' will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge next month. In the same sale will also be included Sir John Franklin's autograph diary, written during 1831, while travelling in Malta and the Ionian Islands; several characteristic letters of Dickens; one of Sir W. Scott; a short note written by Nelson not long after he had lost his right arm; a portrait in water colours of an Oriental, drawn and signed by Thackeray; and, on an octavo sheet of note-paper in Lord Tennyson's autograph, the songs inserted in 'The Princess.' This manuscript varies in several verses from the printed edition. Included in the sale are two valuable illuminated English manuscripts from Bere Court, one the second portion of Wiclif's version of the Bible, and the other a Book of Hours.

THE electric light, which has recently been introduced in the Public Record Office, is now in working order. The public search rooms and corridors are lighted by one hundred and ten incandescent lamps, of which thirty are employed in the Literary Search Room. Different opinions will probably always prevail as to the advantage and safety of this light for purely manuscript researches; but in the present case, though the lamps are hung too low, it is at least the best of its kind obtainable.

A CHARMING instance of Mr. Browning's kindness of heart has recently come to our notice. A young girl was set as a school task to write an explanation of 'Prospice.' Not satisfied with her essay, she ventured to send it to Mr. Browning, to whom she was an entire stranger, and he took the trouble to make sundry corrections and additions, winding up with—"There, my dear young lady, I have done the little that was necessary, and hope it may suffice.—Affectionately yours, Robert Browning."

MRS. F. ST. JOHN THACKERAY, late one of the classical masters at Eton, is busy on a work having for its object to familiarize English readers with the writings of the early Christian poet Prudentius, about whom, if we remember rightly, he contributed an article lately to Macmillan's Magazine.

MR. LOWELL, who is now living at his old home in Cambridge, Massachusetts, is busy with his book on Hawthorne.

MRS. LONGMAN, the widow of the late Mr. Thomas Longman, died at her house, 19, Stanhope Gardens, on Monday last, in her seventy-fifth year. Mrs. Longman was the last surviving member of the famous generation of the house that published for Scott, Southey, Coleridge, Moore, Campbell, Sydney Smith, Mackintosh, and Macaulay. The deceased lady took a keen interest in all the great literary projects with which her husband was connected, and enjoyed the friendship of many eminent men of a bygone generation. Mrs. Longman's two sons, Mr. T. Norton Longman and Mr. George H. Longman, are partners in the firm.

MESSRS. WARD & DOWNY will publish shortly a new novel by Mrs. Macquoid, in two volumes, called 'Cosette,' which is appearing in East and West.

MR. LEADMAN, F.S.A., of Boroughbridge, Yorkshire, would be very glad if any reader who possesses any family tradition connected with the battle of Marston Moor would kindly send it to him. Mr. Leadman has all but finished his account of the battle. He has overhauled seventy-two authorities, and had transcripts made of every newspaper or broadside still extant which was printed in July, 1644.

THE Rev. Wm. Graham F. Pigott is printing the parish registers of Abington Pigotts, co. Cambridge. The work will be issued by Messrs. Goose, of Norwich, in small quarto. A volume containing a reprint of the 'Market Harborough Parish Records,' from the end of the twelfth century to the year 1530, is being edited by Rev. J. E. Stocks, and will be issued shortly, under the sanction of the trustees, by Mr. Elliot Stock.

WE are sorry to hear of the death of Dr. Littledale, the most learned theologian that the Ritualists could boast of. He had read widely, he possessed a singularly retentive memory, and his dialectical skill was considerable—so was his pugnacity, at least in his earlier days, and he was rarely vanquished in the controversies in which he delighted to engage. His publications were very numerous, perhaps too numerous, for he has not left behind him any one work quite worthy of his knowledge and ability.

THE lives of Giuseppe Martinengro, Nino Bixio, the Cairolis, and other makers of "New Italy," will be included in a work entitled 'Italian Characters in the Epoch of the Unification,' from the hands of the Countess Martinengro Cesaresco, which is to be published in England by Mr. Fisher Unwin, and at Milan by the Fratelli Tréves.

ARRANGEMENTS have been made with Mr. W. Clark Russell and Mr. W. Westall to write novels for Lippincott's Magazine for early dates.

MR. W. HEINEMANN is going to issue early in February four stories by Vernon Lee, under the title of 'Hauntings: Fantastic Stories'; a new novel by Mr. F. W. Robinson, 'A Very Strange Family'; and a story by Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, entitled 'Come Forth!' the scene of which is laid in Judea in the time of Christ.

THE 'Metropolitan Year-Book for 1890' is now nearly completed, and will be published in a few days by Messrs. Cassell & Co. This year's issue will be considerably enlarged. Special attention has been devoted to the municipal portion, which will be greatly extended, whilst the commercial and social sections have also been largely developed, and many new features added.

WE regret to hear of the death, in his sixty-sixth year, of Mr. Patrick Cumin, C.B., on Saturday last. Mr. Cumin's health had been failing for some time. He was called to the Bar in 1855, but had little practice, though he edited Gaius and translated the Twelve Tables. He was employed on innumerable Education Commissions, and acted as secretary to the Duke of Argyll's Commission on Scotch Education, which resulted in the Education (Scotland) Act of 1872. He was private secretary to Mr. W. E. Forster at the time of the framing of the Act of 1870. After serving as assistant secretary for thirteen years, he succeeded Sir F. Sandford as chief secretary in the Education Department. His experience and sagacity were of great value to his chiefs, who, with all who served under him, deeply lament his loss.

WE are asked to say that Mr. Josiah Gilbert (see Athen. No. 3246) is quite right in supposing that the poem called 'Rephan' in Mr. Browning's last volume was suggested by 'How it Strikes a Stranger,' a story by Jane Taylor of Ongar, for whom Mr. Browning entertained a warm admiration. The error of calling her, by a slip of the pen, Jane Taylor of Norwich will be corrected in future editions.

MR. H. H. MARKS, of the London County Council, will preside at the festival of the News-vendors' Benevolent and Provident Institution, to be held at the Hôtel Métropole on Monday, February 17th.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & Co. will publish shortly in their "Half-crown Social and Philosophical Series" 'Socialism in England,' by Mr. Sidney Webb. The account was originally prepared at the request of the President and Council of the American Economic Association, and published in their series of monographs. It has now been thoroughly revised and brought up to date for publication here.

THE Austrian Government having imposed, since the beginning of the present year, a stamp duty on the weekly papers published in Germany, several publishers have made arrangements for issuing special editions of their periodicals, edited and printed in Austria, in order to evade the additional burden. These Austro-German editions are expected to be adapted to the taste and the wants of the Germans in Austria.

THE first volume of the collection of documents relating to Prince Bismarck's economic policy will shortly be issued. The publication will thus serve as a supplement to the work 'Fürst Bismarck als Volkswirth.'

AT a meeting of the Goethe Gesellschaft recently held at Weimar, Dr. Bellermann, of Berlin, read some remarkable fragments of an unpublished political poem by Schiller, in which the poet first puts the question doubtfully whether the Germans have any reason to be proud of their nationality, whilst the English and the French struggle about the mastery of the world. Finally he answers the question in the affirmative, and prophesies that the German spirit will one day conquer the world, and that the Germans will gain the Welt-prozeß.

HERR ANDREAS PERTHES, chief of the well-known publishing firm at Gotla, died the other day at Eisenach, in his seventy-sixth year, after a short illness.

ONE of the few men remaining who could give personal recollections of Goethe, Ch. Schuchardt, the printer, died at Geneva on January 9th. He was a native of Weimar, where he served as printer's apprentice, and used as a boy to carry proofs to the poet. In the year 1848 Schuchardt was involved in the revolutionary turmoil, and fled to Switzerland, where he ultimately became head of the firm which printed the Journal de Genève and several of the publications of the many learned societies of French Switzerland. He worked also for not a few houses in Paris.

MR. WILLIAM GEORGE BLACK, author of 'The Law relating to County Councils in Scotland,' is preparing for publication a digest and review of the decisions in Scottish shipping cases. The book will contain a summary of illustrative decisions pronounced during the period treated of in the courts of England and Scotland. Messrs. W. Green & Sons, of Edinburgh, will be the publishers.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers this week are Trade and Navigation, Accounts for December (6d.); and Small Holdings Committee, Index to Report (8d.).

SCIENCE

Kloof and Karroo: Sport, Legend, and Natural History in Cape Colony. By H. A. Bryden. (Longmans & Co.)

THERE is not a dull page in this work, nor need the reader fear that, as is too often the case, "sport" is merely a synonym of

"slaughter." Cape Colony, as the author points out, is an easy-going and non-assertive country, long accustomed to hear of brilliant shooting among big game in the far interior, while its own merits in the matter of sport have been overlooked; for travellers who follow the beaten tracks on their way up country know little of its kloofs, or deep ravines, its wild mountains, and its extensive karroos, or deserts. Yet, thanks to British preservation, the elephant, buffalo, and koodoo still exist in the Knysna forest and the denser bush-veldt of Cape Colony, though extirpated in the Boer-governed Orange Free State and the Transvaal; while the fauna generally, in spite of woeful diminution since the days of Sparrman, Le Vaillant, Barrow, Burchell, and Cornwallis Harris, still presents great attractions for the sportsman and naturalist; and many quaint customs are to be observed and old legends heard among the primitive up-country Afrikaners.

The Karroo is generally spoken of as a desert because it is parched and seemingly barren during a great part of the year; though even then it produces a dry but nutritious and aromatic herbage, upon which enormous flocks of sheep and goats feed, while cattle and also horses do exceedingly well. When the rains come, "brush and scrub, apparently devoid of life, shoot out a fresh verdure; starry flowers spring in profusion, even before the green leaves appear; fragrant grasses and herbs emerge as if by magic from the soil, and the whole surface of the Karroo appears one immense ocean of dark green."

Remarkable amongst many curious plants is the fingerpoll (Euphorbia caput-meduse), "a low growth, not distantly resembling a squabby footstool with fingers standing forth from it." Though so hard as to require cutting up with an axe, yet when thus prepared sheep and goats feed greedily upon it and thrive amazingly; and oxen when used to it do even more credit to its recuperative powers. The air is wonderfully pure on these elevated table-lands, the nights are almost always cool; while for those who can enjoy the perfection of stalking, the neighbouring ranges afford the klipspringer (Oreotragus saltatrix), which may be called the chamois of South Africa. At Naroekas Poort Mr. Bryden learned that a troop of true zebras still lingered in the surrounding mountains, and the surprise which he felt at the news was largely shared in England when he subsequently showed in the columns of the Field that the news was true, the general impression being that this species was extinct. The photograph which forms the frontispiece to this work, taken from an adult male captured in the year 1887, shows that the true or mountain zebra is thickly barred with black to the hoofs, while its ears are much longer than in the commoner Burchell's zebra, which is an inhabitant of the plains, where it is widely distributed. Examples of both these species may now be seen and compared side by side in the Zoological Society's Gardens. It is, however, sad to learn that a third—the true quagga, with rufous-brown body sparingly striped, and then only to the centre of the barrel—is now absolutely extinct. We do not know of a living example in any menagerie in Europe, and although there is a stuffed specimen in our Natural History Museum, its condition unfits it for exhibition. The animal to which the name "quagga" is now applied in South Africa is Burchell's zebra. Another South African quadruped that will soon share the fate of the quagga is the white rhinoceros (R. sinus), not a single adult specimen of which, we believe, is to be found alive or dead in any collection whatever. That the lions, which in 1653 "appeared as if they would take the fort of Cape Town by storm," should have disappeared from the colony since 1850 is not to be regretted; and the farmers are undoubtedly justified in doing their best to keep down the leopards, which are still common in nearly all the mountainous districts. The baboons, always troublesome to the crops, have of late developed a new propensity:—

"Some years back some one baboon having come across the dead body of a milch goat, discovered and extracted the milk-bag, and like Eve, 'saw that it was good.' His discovery must have been quickly imparted to his fellows, for the Karroo farmers began to find their milch goats ripped up by these brutes solely for the sweet and luscious milk. The baboons, too, becoming accustomed to butchering, presently turned their attention to the flesh, and will now destroy kids—and if they can manage it, goats—for their flesh alone."

As the author remarks, this modern development of a carnivorous habit coincident with the increase of flocks is analogous to that observed in the sheep-killing parrot of New Zealand.

The Boer has shown us that he can fight, and the following, translated from the columns of a Cape paper, Di Afrikaanse Patriot, will show that he can also apologize with equal energy. The names are given, but we suppress them:—

"I, the undersigned, —, retract hereby everything I have said against the innocent Mr. —, calling myself an infamous liar, and striking my mouth with the exclamation, 'You mendacious mouth, why do you lie so?' I declare further that I know nothing against the character of Mr. —. I call myself, besides, a genuine liar of the first class. (Signed) —. Witnesses, —, —."

CHEMICAL NOTES.

It is well known that solutions of hydrogen peroxide are especially prone to decompose when alkaline. Tammann has found that this spontaneous decomposition is independent of the amount or nature of the alkali present, and, from this and other results, he considers it highly probable that it is really due to the presence of traces of metallic oxides, such as iron oxide, in the alkali. The decomposition is enormously accelerated by the addition of minute amounts of such oxides to the solution. If the figure deduced from the determination of the freezing-point of its aqueous solution can be depended on, hydrogen peroxide must have a molecular weight corresponding with the formula H_2O_4 .

What would seem to be solid nitrous anhydride has been obtained by first passing a mixture of oxygen with a large excess of nitric oxide into a vessel cooled to -54° by the rapid evaporation of methyl chloride, and then subjecting the blue liquid so obtained to a temperature of about -82° by the use of a mixture of methyl chloride and solid carbonic acid.

The action of fluorine as a mineralizing agent has been widely recognized, but high temperatures have hitherto been considered necessary for its action. Bruhns has now made the important observation that under appropriate conditions this method of synthesizing minerals can be employed at comparatively low temperatures. For instance, by placing ferric hydroxide and ammonium fluoride in a platinum crucible hermetically sealed in a steel case, and heating for ten hours at 250° , crystallized ferric oxide was obtained. Recently precipitated and ignited alumina, when heated with water and a trace of ammonium fluoride for ten hours at 300° , gave crystals of corundum, whilst by similar treatment amorphous silica was converted into quartz crystals.

The alleged decomposition of nickel and cobalt by Krüss and Schmidt (Athenæum, February 16th, 1889) still gives rise to considerable controversy. Several other investigators who have repeated the experiments have failed to obtain any evidence of such a decomposition, and consider that impure nickel and cobalt must have been employed, and that the alleged new substance was nothing more than a complex mixture of impurities. To this Krüss and Schmidt have replied, stating that they have repeated their results with different samples of carefully purified nickel, and that they find this purified metal can be resolved into two portions having different atomic weights, the one higher, the other lower, than what has hitherto been accepted as the atomic weight of nickel. They further consider that they have proved that no known element is present that could account for these altered atomic weights.

Rousseau has obtained barium cobaltite by heating to redness in a platinum crucible a mixture of hydrated barium chloride or bromide with finely powdered barium oxide. According to the temperature employed, there are obtained either brilliant, black, hexagonal lamellæ of the salt $BaO, 2CoO_2$, or large, iridescent, black prisms of the normal salt BaO, CoO_2 . Both salts dissolve in hydrochloric acid with evolution of chlorine. From these results it follows that cobalt can form a dioxide of acidic properties.

A new oxide of tin has been obtained by Spring by adding excess of hydrated barium dioxide to a solution of stannous chloride in hydrochloric acid, and dialyzing the turbid liquid so obtained as long as barium chloride passes through the membrane. The residue in the dialyzer yields on evaporation a white mass of the formula $H_2Sn_2O_7$, which must be regarded as a hydrate of perstannic anhydride, SnO_2 .

Keiser has redetermined the atomic weight of palladium, the method used being the estimation of the weight of palladium left on ignition of a known weight of palladiodiammonium chloride. As a mean of nineteen experiments the value 106.35 was obtained; this is practically identical with the results of Berzelius's determination.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

DR. HANS MEYER is reported to have succeeded in his ascent of the Kilimanjaro, and has already started for the second snow mountain which he intends to attack, namely, the Kenia.

Those among our readers who are interested in the interior parts of the Brazilian province of São Pedro do Rio Grande do Sul will find valuable information in "Ergänzungsheft" No. 96 of Petermann's Mittheilungen, the author of which, Herr Max Beschoren, first settled in this province in 1869, and died there in 1887. As a surveyor he gained a thorough knowledge of the whole of the north-western portion of the province. In this posthumous work he describes nine journeys through the province, enlarges on its climate and natural resources, and gives a history of the once flourishing Jesuit missions—the "sette missões"—of which hardly a trace exists at the present day. The map is on a large scale and valuable.

Dr. L. Wolf, the eminent German traveller, is reported to have died of fever on June 26th last, whilst travelling in the interior of Togo Land. Dr. Wolf was a member of Capt. Wissmann's Kasai expedition, and subsequently, in 1886, navigated the Sankuru. He was a careful observer, and his contributions to African anthropology are especially valuable.

Capt. A. Hovgaard, in a paper on the 'Kara Sea and the Route to the North Pole,' published in the Scottish Geographical Magazine, speaks hopefully of the prospects of opening up a sea route through Yugor Strait to the Obi and Yenisei. He says: "I am quite certain that sooner or later a regular trade will be established by this route with Siberia, and that its abundant products will be carried to Europe at a far lower cost than at present." The author also directs attention to the fact that the Kara Sea is the only route to the North Pole still left untried, and adduces cogent arguments in favour of its success.

The Story of Emin's Rescue as told in Stanley's Letters, edited by J. Scott Keltie (Sampson Low), is an acceptable little volume, published with Mr. Stanley's permission, and furnished with an instructive introductory chapter by the editor.

The Deutsche Geographische Blätter publishes articles on agricultural colonies in the island of Hokkaido, or Yezo, by Paul Grahner; on the history of recent explorations in New Guinea, by Dr. A. Oppel; and on the tin island Salanga, or Junk Ceylon, on the Malacca coast, by E. Hartert.

Mias Yule writes to us regarding our notice of Col. Yule:—

"It was not, as there stated, on account of his wife's health that Col. Yule quitted India. On the contrary, my mother's health was then fairly good, and it was against her strong advice and to her deep regret that he cut himself adrift from the Service. But he had difficulties (on which it is needless to enlarge) with some of his work and associates in India, and this circumstance, combined with general weariness of India and Lord Canning's offer to provide for him at home, caused his resignation. They came home together, but Lord Canning's sudden death a few weeks later closed Yule's prospects for the time. Indeed, as letters in my possession show, it was only with difficulty and by the private influence, then very considerable, of Sir Roderick Murchison, that the C.B. ship long promised him was, in 1863, conferred. It was at the close of 1864 that his wife's failing health took Yule to Sicily. Some years before this he had begun to annotate the works of certain early Italian travellers to India and China. The two large public libraries of Palermo happened to be rich in materials for this study, and this circumstance fortunately decided Yule to carry out a project he had cherished since his youth, of publishing a complete edition of Marco Polo. By visits to London and Paris, and more especially to Venice and Florence, he was enabled to complete the materials of which the Palermo collections supplied the nucleus. His work brought him many friends, and among these he especially valued Comm. (now Barone) Cristoforo Negri, founder and first president of the Geographical Society of Italy, and his disciple Comm. Guglielmo Berchet. There was no friend whom my father loved more than Guglielmo Berchet, and though it was very many years since he had seen either Negri or Berchet, their affectionate letters were among his last pleasures."

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Jan. 9.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'New Experiments on the Question of the Fixation of Free Nitrogen' (Preliminary Notice), by Sir J. B. Lawes and Prof. Gilbert; 'On Electric Discharge between Electrodes at Different Temperatures in Air and in High Vacuum,' by Prof. J. A. Fleming; and 'A Milk-dentition in Orycteropus,' by Mr. O. Thomas.

ASTRONOMICAL.—Jan. 10.—Mr. W. H. M. Christie, President, in the chair.—Dr. D. Eginitis, Rev. G. Burgess, and Messrs. A. F. Austin, A. S. Bicknell, G. R. Farncombe, V. E. Knoch, B. Noble, H. W. L. Tanner, R. L. Lapscott, and W. G. Thackeray were elected Fellows.—The Astronomer Royal announced that telegrams had been received by the Society stating that the Rev. S. J. Perry, after observing the solar eclipse of December 22nd in the Salut Islands, had died of dysentery on December 27th. According to a telegram received from his assistant, Mr. Rooney, the observations of the eclipse were successful. Good photographs of the corona had been obtained, and had been satisfactorily developed. Mr. Taylor, at the African station, had been prevented from taking photographs during totality, or making any observations, by clouds. The station occupied by Father Perry was on some islands off the coast of Cayenne, which were occupied by the French as a penal settlement. The governor of the islands had given every assistance, and the station was not considered an unhealthy one.—Mr. Knobel read a paper, by Mr. E. C. Barnard, of the Lick Observatory, on a series of observations of the brightness of Iapetus, one of the satellites of Saturn, while passing through the shadows of the crape ring and the bright ring. The observations were made on November 1st, 1889. On passing through the shadow of the ball of the planet the satellite was entirely lost to view. At the time when, according to Mr. Marth's ephemeris, it should have emerged from the shadow of the ball, it attained its full brightness in a few seconds, and remained bright until it entered the shadow of the inner edge of the crape ring. The decrease of the light of the satellite was then very gradual, until it entered the shadow of the inner edge of the bright ring, when it was again entirely lost sight of. The observation is quite unique, and is most interesting as proving that the increase in density of the crape ring from its inner to its outer edge is very gradual. The light of the satellite was reduced to about one-third of its original light when it was passing through the shadow of the densest part of the crape ring.—Mr. Knobel read a paper, by Prof. Holden, on the photographic apparatus of the great equatorial of the Lick Observatory. For photographic purposes an additional flint glass lens is placed in front of the objective, which reduces its focus by nearly 10 ft. This brings the image within the tube of the telescope several feet from the eyepiece end, and the sensitive plate when placed in the principal focus is introduced through an opening in the side of the tube. Means are provided for fixing lenses behind the principal focus which will throw an enlarged image beyond the eyepiece end. Prof. Holden hopes to take enlarged photographs of the moon in the secondary focus, which will greatly advance the study of selenography. He estimates that measures may be made on such photographs which will enable the position of lunar objects to be determined with a probable error of one-tenth of a second.—Mr. Stone thought that this estimate was much too high, as there is no means of eliminating the distortion produced by the object-glass by the method adopted in making heliometer measures.—The Astronomer Royal stated that at Greenwich they had found that large errors were introduced by the photographic plate not being absolutely at right angles to the axis of the telescope.—The following papers were also presented: 'Observations of Occultations of Stars by the Moon and Phenomena of Jupiter's Satellites in the Year 1889,' at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich; 'Ephemeris for Physical Observations of Mars, 1890,' 'Ephemeris of the Satellites of Uranus, 1890,' and 'Ephemeris of the Satellites of Mars, 1890,' by Mr. A. Marth; 'The Structure of the Sideral Universe,' by Mr. T. W. Backhouse; and 'Spectroscopic Results for the Motions of Stars in the Line of Sight obtained in the Year 1889,' No. XIII, at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich.

GEOLOGICAL.—Jan. 8.—Dr. W. T. Blanford, President, in the chair.—The Earl of Berkeley, Messrs. W. Andrews, J. W. Croston, W. Gibson, and A. O'Watkins were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On some British Jurassic Fish-remains referable to the Genera Eurycomus and Hypocormus,' by Mr. A. S. Woodward; and 'On the Peibidian Volcanic Series of St. Davids,' by Prof. C. L. Morgan.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Jan. 9.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—This being an evening appointed for the election of Fellows, no papers were read. The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Prof. Jebb, Prof. Ferguson, Revs. S. E. Bartlett and E. S. Dewick, Dr. Bensly, and Messrs. A. W. Tuer, C. Welch, E. L. Grange, J. D. Duncan, W. Rowley, B. W. Smith, and T. F. Ordish.—Mr. Perceval exhibited two seals recently found at Bristol: one, a small circular private seal, with flames of fire for device, and the legend, "† ARDAVNT ARDAVNT"; the other seal is that of St. John Baptist's Hospital, Shaftesbury, of thirteenth century date.—Mr. Tarver exhibited a drawing of a monument and effigy of a knight in St. Leonard's Church, Streatham.—Rev. W. Greenwell exhibited a number of antiquities recently discovered by him in some East Yorkshire barrows, of which he promised to give the Society a full account at an early date. The most remarkable are three objects of white chalk, carved with elaborate patterns, the like of which have never been found elsewhere.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Jan. 14.—Sir J. Cooke, President, in the chair.—It was announced that three Associate Members had been transferred to the class of Members, and that twenty-one Students had been admitted. The monthly ballot resulted in the election of two Members, of twenty-nine Associate Members, and one Associate.—The paper read was 'On Recent Dock Extensions at Liverpool, with a General Description of the Mersey Dock Estate, the Port of Liverpool, and the River Mersey,' by Mr. G. F. Lyster.

MATHEMATICAL.—Jan. 9.—Mr. J. J. Walker, President, in the chair.—Mr. J. E. Campbell was elected a Member.—The following communications were made: 'On the Deformation of an Elastic Shell,' by Prof. H. Lamb; 'On the Relation between the Logical Theory of Classes and the Geometrical Theory of Points,' by Mr. A. B. Kempe; 'On the Correlation of Two Spaces, each of Three Dimensions,' by Dr. Hirst; and 'On the Simultaneous Reduction of the Ternary Quadric and Cubic to the Forms $Ax^2+By^2+Cz^2+Dw^3$, $ax^3+by^3+cz^3+dw^3$,' by the President (Sir J. Cockle, V.P., in the chair).

SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL ARCHEOLOGY.—Jan. 14.—Anniversary Meeting.—Mr. P. Le Page Renouf, President, in the chair.—The Secretary's report was read.—The following were elected officers and Council for the current year: President, Mr. P. Le Page Renouf; Vice-Presidents, Lord Halsbury, Ven. J. A. Hessey, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Right Hon. Sir A. H. Layard, F. D. Mocatta, W. Morrison, Sir C. T. Newton, Sir C. Nicholson, Rev. G. Rawlinson, Sir H. C. Rawlinson, and Very Rev. R. P. Smith; Council, W. A. Tyssen Amherst, Rev. C. J. Ball, Rev. Canon Beechey, Prof. R. L. Bensly, E. A. W. Budge, A. Cates, T. Christy, C. Harrison, Rev. A. Löwy, Rev. J. Marshall, F. D. Mocatta, A. Peckover, J. Pollard, F. G. H. Price, E. T. Whyte, and Rev. W. Wright; Honorary Treasurer, Mr. B. T. Bosanquet; Secretary, Mr. W. H. Rylands; Honorary Secretary for Foreign Correspondence, Rev. R. Gwynne; Honorary Librarian, Mr. W. Simpson.

HUGUENOT.—Jan. 8.—Mr. R. Hovenden in the chair.—Messrs. J. E. Dickinson, L. C. Le Chat, Capt. W. Klingender, and Miss A. H. de Vignoles were elected Fellows.—A paper was read by Mr. G. H. Overend on the Walloon or French Church which existed at Dover from 1644 to 1661. This church, though always small in point of numbers, was by its geographical position one of considerable importance. A constant stream of refugees passed through the town, and the strain upon the resources of the little congregation in affording relief to those who needed it was so great that their pastor suffered in his stipend, and their landlord in his rent for the building in which their services were held. Amongst the "passants" appears the name of "Severin Durfy," probably a relative of the celebrated wit and song-writer Tom D'Urfey.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE WINTER EXHIBITION OF SKETCHES AND STUDIES IS NOW OPEN.—5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 5.—Admission 1s.; Catalogue 6d. ALFRED D. FRIPP, R.W.S., Secretary.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION. (Second Notice.—Low Countries.)

TECHNICALLY speaking, there is not a great gap between the Spanish pictures in Gallery III., which formed the subject of last article, and the noble examples of the art of the Low Countries in that room and the adjoining Gallery II. If we begin with No. 145, a splendid Rembrandt comes first, Lord Ashburton's Portrait of the Painter, produced when Rembrandt was about fifty-five years of age and his art was at its best, while his touch was astonishingly firm, his impasto at once solid and soft, and there was no lack of research in the subtle draughtsmanship. The meditative and observant eyes are the veritable eyes of Rembrandt, and the fleshy lips are suitable in every respect to his character. Rembrandt's biography may be read in his portraits of himself, of which there is an incomparable sequence, very precious as art and, to the reader of character, profoundly significant. Who will win the eternal gratitude of connoisseurs by collecting a number of these works and hanging them in chronological order? Portraits such as those in last year's Academy were painted when Rembrandt was older, when his perceptions were somewhat blunted, and infirmity of purpose declared itself in his lips, pendulous cheeks, and rather bloated face. The very touch of these later works, one of which is in the National Gallery, broad, emphatic, and rather heavy as it is, marked a mind sadly changed and quickly fading. No. 61, which we mention below, is an intermediate piece.

Lord Ashburton's picture, which is not mentioned by Vosmaer, is Smith's No. 210, and was formerly in the collection of the Duc de Valentinois, and engraved by Schmidt. In 1826 it was, with the collection of Lord Radstock, sold to the late Lord Ashburton for 285 guineas, a large price at that period for a portrait. It may be compared profitably with another Rembrandt, Lord Yarborough's wonderful Portrait of an Old Lady (147), a life-size, three-quarters-length figure, seated in an arm-chair and turned towards our left. The dark brown fur with which the lady's black dress is trimmed is most cunningly harmonized in texture, tone, and colour with the time-worn, shrunken, and deeply seamed face which age has made pale, while the prominent but dimmed eyes have a suspicious and distrustful look, which Rembrandt, who was never without a sense of humour, has emphasized by making the withered, tremulous hands timidly clasp each other, as if the old lady did not quite like sitting to the master. Of the very highest technical merit, this picture is a little earlier than No. 145, and charms artists by the manner in which, though there is not one positive shadow, the sitter's faded complexion is tenderly relieved against the white cap with huge ear-like wings at its sides, the white of which and of her great ruff is, with exquisite craft, reflected on the shaded side of the face. This picture was here in 1875; it is not mentioned by Smith or Vosmaer, but Waagen described it characteristically as of "a conception very animated, and carefully executed in a light and very transparent golden tone." It has much less impasto and definition than No. 145, and, apart from the admirable expressiveness of the face and attitude, is distinguished by unusual softness and breadth without contrasting lights, shadows, or colours.

Lord Ashburton's Portrait of a Man (151) was here in 1871, and indicates that the painter had set himself to rival Frank Hals in firmness of touch and in body of pigment, employing a massive style and solid modelling that are almost antithetical to the old lady's portrait. Neither Smith nor Waagen noticed it, although its being of the size of life and thoroughly carried out, to say nothing of the animated expression, is strong evidence of its being by Rembrandt. An undoubted Rembrandt is another Portrait of a Man (152), Smith's 297, said to represent C. Jansen, Bishop of Ypres and the founder of Jansenism. If this is so, it must have been done from an older portrait, for Jansen died in 1638, long before Rembrandt could have painted this very fine thing. The ivory-like and almost bloodless skin tends to confirm the notion that it is not from the life. The inscription, "Portrait de Jansenius, père d'une nombreuse famille, mort in 1638, âgé de 53 ans," is supposed to refer to the number of converts to his religious views, whose spiritual father he might be said to be. It is signed "Rembrandt, f. 1661." The pallid complexion is made to assert perfectly with the golden moustache and the black hat, that casts over the face a deep shadow, the clearness of which evinces all Rembrandt's peculiar and unmatched art in that respect. The fact that the sitter is represented as of an age to which Jansen had attained soon after Rembrandt was born is proof positive that this likeness, if it be Jansen's, was not painted from the life. The face seems to us to have been a little rubbed here and there. The drawing of the eyes is simple, vigorous, and masterly to a degree only draughtsmen can fully appreciate. The light is concentrated on the flesh, and, in Rembrandt's manner, artfully diffused by the collar and black coat. Jansen (?) appears to be about to walk—an attitude Rembrandt more than once selected for his portraits, imparting to them more spirit and spontaneity than Van Dyck exhibited when adopting, as he frequently did, similar attitudes. Smith, who evidently described this work from a print, stated that it was sold with the collection of M. Serreville in 1811 for 203*l*. Later it belonged to Talleyrand, from whom, in 1831, Smith bought it for a private collector for 500*l*.

Mr. Fitzwilliam's picture An Old Man (68) is a good picture, but a questionable Rembrandt. The handling is laboured, the flesh somewhat opaque and unusually red, and the expression unintelligent. The last is hardly ever a defect of a genuine Rembrandt. Technically this work approaches nearest to the 'Jewish Merchant,' seated, and holding a cane, which is in the National Gallery, but the likeness is not exact. Lord Ashburton's Portrait of a Man (69), in a quilted black silk dress, is a three-quarters-length, life-size figure, seated, looking at us through the deep shadow of the rim of his tall, steeple-shaped black hat, with animated and earnest eyes that distinguish an unusually handsome face, the vitality and refinement of which are beyond the average even among Rembrandts. Signed and dated "1641," it is an example of the painter's transitional style from the light-toned, golden-hued, and smooth-surfaced works, which exhibit finish of the highest kind and a very delicate touch, to those later pictures in which more impasto, richer tones, stronger shadows, and, by contrast, if not locally, brighter lights prevailed. Of the development of the latter manner the pictures we have already named are excellent examples. The mode of dealing with the carnations and their golden hues, the sharp definition of the shadow on the face, and a certain degree of impasto, more marked than in earlier works, are points of great interest in this fine specimen. It is Smith's No. 360, and, with its pendant here, which is said to represent the wife of the sitter, was formerly in the gallery at Cassel, from which, by a process well known at the time, they were "conveyed" to the private collection of the Empress Josephine at Malmaison. Buchanan bought the pair; from him they passed, in 1831, to the late Mr. A. Baring, afterwards Lord Ashburton, for 800*l*. It is in perfect condition, and seems to have been cleaned not long ago. The companion picture from the same collection is now called Portrait of a Lady (76), but originally bore the name of the highly intelligent and well-trained wife, whose agreeable manner and genial looks must have been pleasant to paint. She is seated, seen nearly in front view, with her face turned slightly to our left, and wears a richly toned, finely painted black dress fitting the body within a large white ruff, such as no one painted with more skill than Rembrandt, or harmonized better with the fresh complexion and the sable attire. Like its companion, it is in excellent condition, and signed "Rembrandt fecit 1641." The flesh shadows are unusually brown, while the hands, as with all Rembrandt's, are full of expression. Well might Charles Blanc—not, perhaps, a profound critic, but a man of taste—write of these works, "On les compte parmi les plus étonnantes peintures du maître." Waagen, who was a more competent witness, said, "They are two of the more rare, light, and careful works of the master, taken in full light, and have a magical effect." As to their quality, it will be enough to say that they approach the incomparable 'Lady with a Fan,' another work of 1641, which came to this exhibition from Buckingham Palace last year, and was No. 160 in Gallery III. Some people may be glad to learn that Mr. Obach will very shortly issue a large etching from the last-named masterpiece. The surfaces of the Rembrandts from Lord Ashburton's collection now before us are not quite so even as those of the 'Lady with a Fan,' which seems to have been varnished more freely, while, perhaps, its surface was originally smoother than theirs. 'Saakia,' which is at Dresden, and 'Anslo and his Wife,' belonging to Lord Ashburnham, and 'Anna Wymer,' lately in the Six Collection at Amsterdam, of which we recently criticized a fine etching, all belong to the same year. The Portrait of a Gentleman (97), a bust, also from Bath House, in an oval, is a capital work, remarkable for its soundness, frank and firm touch, and clearness. From the same collection comes a much more interesting instance, the famous small figure of Lieven Willemsz van Copenol (66), Smith's 307, and the portrait of which Rembrandt made an incomparable etching (Daulby's 263) which bears the inscription, "This is Copenol, the wonderful penman. By Rembrandt's hand," &c. He was a celebrated writing master and scribe of official and State documents, born 1598, and still living in 1667. On the strength of the date on the etching, Vosmaer assigned this picture to the year 1661. However, it was executed in 1650. Rembrandt was one of the calligraphist's particular friends, painted his portrait thrice (one version is at Cassel), and etched two of the pictures, one as above, the other c. 1632. A portly gentleman, of less than fifty-five years of age, but looking older, sits at a table with his body to our left, and holding in his hands a sheet of writing paper, of the whiteness of which the painter has made characteristic use. In his right hand is a long pen, and, his face being nearly full view, he looks at us with an eager air and searching eyes, while a genial smile bespeaks the kindly, playful, and popular man he was. He wears a cassock fastened with small buttons up the front, a cloak hangs loosely on his shoulders; on his already scanty hair is a close-fitting calotte of black silk; while the white collar round his neck is ably differentiated in colour and tone from the sheet of paper. This gem of art—one of the choicest of its kind, brilliant, solid, and clear, and fresh as on the day it was painted two centuries and a half ago—was sold in 1784 with the Julien Collection for 1,500 livres, a great price at that time; it belonged to Lucien Bonaparte, and was engraved with other paintings in his gallery, likewise by Surugue. With the Baring Collection it passed to the present owner. In The Portrait of the Painter (61), which Mr. Heywood-Lonsdale has lent, the head is covered with a black velvet cap round which we see gleaming links of a gold chain; while about his neck and in front of his coat hangs a second chain with a medal attached to it. The right hand is thrust into the breast of the coat. The face is that of a man of about fifty-five years of age. The expression is sedate, yet energetic; the carnations are rich in tone and deep in colour, so as to be aptly called "fruity," and this colour asserts admirably with the fine and solid morbidity and glowing tonality of the whole. The costume is doubtless a portion of that "quantity of portions of antique dresses of divers colours" which, in the sale catalogue of Rembrandt's effects, were described as to be found in "the small painting room" of his house, and sold, July 25th and 26th, 1656, for, as we say, what they would fetch. We learn from his pictures that Rembrandt dressed himself in these fripperies and then painted his own portrait. The picture appears to be Smith's 212, for which Samuel Rogers, in 1828, gave 66*l*., and which, as lot 719, was in 1856 sold with his collection for 310 guineas. Lord Carysfort sold it to Rogers, who, very rightly, set great store by it.

We may let Rubens follow Rembrandt, although Rubens is ill represented in these galleries, where the best phases of his art have been very frequently seen. Lord Carlisle's Daughter of Herodias with the Head of John the Baptist (148) has been considerably hung high. It is in good condition, a most florid example, yet probably as nearly a work of the painter as most Rubenses. The composition is distinguished by the true Rubensian "swing" and emphatic movement, and in these respects could hardly be overpraised. The faces, especially that of the waiting-maid, tell their tale with characteristic élan and dash, but there is not a touch of pathos, pity, dignity, or grief in the work. Smith, who numbered it 1010 in his catalogue of Rubens's works, and 230 in the supplement thereof, says it is "a brilliantly coloured and well-finished picture," and thus shows that he had not seen it, or that it has suffered since he wrote. It belonged to Sir Joshua Reynolds, and, later, was No. 127 at the British Institution in 1824. It is seen to advantage in a print which Bolswert engraved with all his bravura and somewhat heavy touch. See the "Private Collections of England," No. XXVIII., Athen. No. 2554.

In some respects few pictures here are more interesting to the student than Thomas de Keyser's Regents of the Guild of Silversmiths, Amsterdam (149). It is one of the very few works of that much esteemed master which have left Holland, and is far more truly representative of his mood and technique than the small portraits of 'A Merchant and his Clerk,' now No. 212 in the National Gallery. Sir F. Cook has a work similar to this at Richmond. Born eighteen years after Rubens, eleven years after Frank Hals, three years after Honthorst, only four years before Van Dyck, and eleven years before Rembrandt, Thomas de Keyser occupies technically a position classing him with all those masters, although he was unworthy to be ranked with any of them, unless, perhaps, it be Honthorst. He is, after all, not very inferior to Honthorst. The whole-length portrait of a magistrate, seated at a table, with his hand upon a book (it is at the Hague, No. 61, and dated 1631), is a much better, firmer, and more solidly executed picture than this group of Regents, which is one of that well-known class of portraits of trustees of various charitable institutions which nearly all the masters we have mentioned, and more especially Jan van Ravesteyn (1580-1665) and Van der Helst (1613-1670), used to paint. Although this large picture marks a sharp descent from Hals and Rembrandt, and the rather empty forms, the flat touch, somewhat deficient in research, and the bald manner, place it technically below the work of his contemporaries, it happily combines their more superficial qualities, and actually excels in the rare feat of giving interest and fineness of character to these commonplace worthies, although not merely Rembrandt, but Ravesteyn, Hals, and Van der Helst were able to make a better design than this somewhat confused assembly of three-quarters-length, life-size figures. Very much finer is De Keyser's masterpiece in this kind of art, 'Four Burgomasters of Amsterdam, 1638,' now at the Hague, which Snyderhof engraved incomparably, and which has repeatedly attracted etc.

The next master is Van Dyck, whose laurels never fade in the Academy. The Portrait of an Artist (146), which is generally called 'Portrait of a Gentleman,' was here under the former title in 1875. It is Smith's 825 (and Supp. 21), and was engraved by W. Vaillant. Smith says it was formerly in the Dresden Gallery, and sold in Paris by a dealer in 1836 for 600*l.* In 1837 the Duke of Sutherland gave 440*l.* for it. The man is half rising in an arm-chair, as if some sudden call had fixed his attention—an animated attitude, supported by a very apt expression in the face—the figure in three-quarters view; the face is turned over the right shoulder, and looks at us; one hand is on the arm of the chair, the other holds a pair of compasses; on the table are a bust of Socrates (?), a globe, and paper. The carnations are rather paler than in Van Dyck's in general, the drawing and modelling are highly accomplished and sound. Why so very fine a thing left the Dresden Gallery, if it really did so, would be hard to guess. Likewise from Stafford House comes the famous Portrait of Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel (150), about sixty years of age, which was here in 1876, and represents a half-length figure, seated bareheaded in a red arm-chair, the face nearly in full view and a little to our right, and looking at us. The complexion is a little pale, and time has greatly thinned the hair and beard of the great dilettante, who wears a black silk dress, a broad ruff, and round his neck a black ribbon, the medal suspended at the end of which he holds in a characteristic way between the fingers of his right hand; in the left hand is a roll of paper. This picture has been finely engraved by Tardieu, W. Sharp, and Tomkins severally. Nothing could be more delicate and refined than the treatment of the face and dress. This picture was in the Orleans Collection, from which it was missing, Buchanan tells us, when Mr. Slade, going to Paris with a cheque for 50,000*fr.* in his pocket, arrived June 8th, 1792, "the very day the king had fled," and bought the Flemish pictures of the great gallery en bloc. 10,000 fr. was allowed for this masterpiece, which did not turn up when the purchase was completed. The news of the sale roused the art-lovers of Paris, and they protested against the removal of so stupendous a collection. They threatened to stop the exportation, talked loudly of taking possession of the whole—with or without payment we are not told—and asked privately by what route the pictures would go towards England. Mr. Slade was not inclined to be robbed, therefore "I had told the people employed in the emballage that they would be sent off by land for Calais; so soon, however, as the packing was completed, I had them all privately put on board a barge which was in readiness, and sent by the Seine to Havre de Grace." The missing Van Dyck was, strange to say, afterwards found in the possession of that immaculate Citizen Robit whose numerous pictures, including this one, were sold in 1801 to Bryan, the dealer, at the price of 144*l.* The Duke of Bridgewater, from whom it passed to the Sutherland Gallery, gave Bryan 500*l.* for it, when it was exhibited for sale as No. 92 in the catalogue at the Old Royal Academy Rooms in Pall Mall, 1801-2. It must be one of the latest works of Van Dyck, for as he died in 1641, he could not have painted the earl after that year, in which the latter was forty-nine years of age. A very fine study for this picture, lent by Mr. A. J. Roberts, was No. 48 at the Academy in 1877, and is Smith's No. 630.

Painted in quite a different manner from the last, which betrays the influence of Titian, is the masculine and energetic John, Count of Nassau Dillenbourg (153), from Bath House. It shows itself to have been painted while Van Dyck was, for the second time, deeply impressed by Rubens, not, as Waagen said, by his Italian studies only, although, of course, there is not a little that is Italian in the brilliant treatment of the armour, the grave harmonious tones and colour in general. The demonstrative attitude and expression of the figure and face recall Rubens rather than Titian or P. Veronese, and so do the firm touch, massive treatment, and solid impasto, without too much glazing. As the count was born in 1583 (he died in 1638), and the picture, although Smith reasonably said the subject looked about sixty years of age, states that he was only "æ 48 A," it must belong to the year 1631, when the artist was sojourning at the Hague as the guest of the Prince of Orange after returning from Italy, and came for the second time within touch of Rubens's influence, so that there was a sort of recrudescence in his works of his master's superb motives, combined, of course, with a certain amount of Italian feeling. Van Dyck had not then settled in England. The portly and bald Count of Nassau (whom the artist was to paint again in 1634 with his wife and children: the picture is at Panshanger, and was here in 1881) was one of the Prince of Orange's commanders of horse at the time in question, and doubtless met Van Dyck at the Hague. At Munich is Smith's 77, a reduced version of this picture, made in brown for the use of Paul Pontius, who etched it for Martin van den Enden. Besides Pontius, Vostermann (in an oval), Soutmann, Snyderhof (in an oval), and P. de Jode severally engraved the work before us. A second version in brown is at Cologne. His likeness is true to the military adventurer, high-handed and irascible, courageous to rashness, and not always fortunate in war. The picture is in perfect condition. It is Smith's 374, and came, it is said, from the Balbi Palace at Genoa, whence it was purchased by Mr. A. Wilson, at whose sale, in 1807, it was bought by Lord Radstock for 315*l.* The latter lent it to the British Institution in 1822 as a portrait of Spinola, its then current title. In 1826, still so named, it was bought at the Radstock sale for 357*l.* by Mr. A. Baring, who, as Lord Ashburton, lent it to the British Institution in 1835. Between this date and 1854, when Waagen mentioned it ('Treasures,' ii. 103), it was recognized, by means of Paul Pontius's etching, as a portrait of the Count of Nassau. Lord Ashburton lent it to the Academy under the latter title in 1871 as No. 106.

Apart from Rembrandt and Van Dyck, few Low Country painters are better represented here than Jan Steen, whose small and highly finished Twelfth Night (60) is full of rollicking fun, and has none of his equally characteristic grossness, not to say licence. It depicts an interior of a farmhouse. The majority of the company are trying to make as much noise as possible. A girl seated on the floor blows in the spout of a tankard, using it as a trumpet; a fat nurse has a baby in her lap, to whom a lout addresses himself with a roter; a rough boy plays a fife; there is a bagpiper, and an old female singer screams a ballad. Overhead hangs the wooden garland so often seen in Steen's pictures with its inscription and wreathed about with leaves. The surface is smoother, and the whole is more laboured than usual. It is Smith's 51, described by him as 'The Hurdy-Gurdy Player,' and, according to Heer T. van Westreene—in whose list it figures as No. 71 and 'Une Compagnie Joyeuse'—it is mentioned by Descamps, and was probably sold for 100 Dutch florins, with the pictures of M. Swalmius, in 1747. May 19th, 1767, it was sold by M. A. Leers for 120 florins. At the sale of the Chevalier Francottay, 1816, it fetched 2,350 florins; with the collection of the Chevalier Erard, 2,380 florins; Smith bought it in 1828 for 235 guineas. Baron Verstolke purchased it for 3,800 florins. Lord Ashburton's capital example The Carrouse (93) comprises thirteen figures in a room, many of them near a fireplace. The man who holds up a glass and laughs at a woman in a blue apron is said by Waagen to be Steen himself. This admirable picture is full of materials for the study of incident, character, composition, and expression. All the figures are as deftly and happily designed as they are solidly executed, more especially the group including the wench with red stockings whose back is towards us. Her attitude is perfect. The details are executed in a fine and precise manner that only Teniers and Ostade could have approached. Some excess of varnish has altered the character of the work, darkened its shadows, and hardened its lights. It is Smith's 151 and Van Westreene's 68, and was at the British Institution in 1819.

Mr. Crews's Interior (105), a spirited design, is powerful and rich in colour. The actions and attitudes are of the most spontaneous character; the man who sits in the middle and leans towards the woman standing near him could not be better, while his companion is more graceful and handsomer than the artist generally painted. It is Smith's No. 44, and in 1785, when it belonged to M. van Slingelandt, of Dort, was sold for 24*l.* Heer van Westreene placed it, as No. 376, among the pictures the whereabouts of which he did not know. It was mentioned by Descamps, and whoever wishes to see Jan Steen at his best should study it thoroughly. Lord Ashburton's Skittle Players (118), Heer van Westreene's No. 63 and Smith's No. 33, is a renowned picture of very high quality and character, and, small as it is, quite a gem among Jan Steens. It is supposed to have been knocked down at the Hague in 1709 for 53 Dutch florins, and in 1713 for 53 florins; at the Heemskerk sale, 1765, it was sold for 160 florins; at the Randon de Boisset sale, 1777, for 770 florins; by M. de Poulain, 1780, for 1,250 florins; by the Comte de Vaudreuil, 1784, for 1,640 florins; by M. Destouches, 1794, for 1,200 florins; by M. de Saint Maurice, 1797, for 1,650 florins; by M. Lanjeac, 1802, for 1,400 florins; by M. de Preuil, 1811, for 2,400 florins; by the Prince de Talleyrand, 1877, for 3,500 florins, to Mr. E. Gray, of Harringay House. It was mentioned by Waagen, Nagler, Buchanan, and others, and was engraved by De Ghend, in the gallery of M. Le Brun, while in the possession of that amateur. Such a pedigree as this is a very rare thing for a picture. In Gallery II. is another gem, the work of Gonzales Coques, the charming Van Dyck in small; it is in his best manner, called Portrait of a Lady (65), lent by Mr. W. Harvey. The lady is a three-quarters-length figure seated facing us, with her back to an open window, holding a bouquet in her lap. The smooth, sound execution, admirably finished, if somewhat polished, of this miniaturist is seldom better shown than in this capital illustration of his perfect pencilling, tasteful colouring, and textural imitation almost equalling Metsu's. The silvery quality of the pale blue dress and its silver lace, the modelling and thorough veracity of the face, are most enjoyable. Neefs often painted architecture for Gonzales, while other men did animals for him. Less known by works which bear his name is Dirk Hals, the author of No. 70, called A Luncheon Party, nine small three-quarters-length figures seated at a table and displaying vivacity in their movements, character and energy in their faces. The workmanship is firm, solid, and complete, if somewhat hard throughout, and the work displays a very true sense of light. Dirk Hals's sense of humour was not particularly strong; his chiaroscuro is by no means subtle or scientific, and the effect of his pictures is spotty; the same may be said of the flesh in this picture, which, however caused we cannot say, is harder, smoother, and more opaque and polished than usual in works by a clever painter of small figures and genre subjects.

NEW PRINTS.

THE Arundel Society has approached the faithful reproduction of a fresco much nearer than it has ever done before in the chromolithograph by Herr Greve, of Berlin, after Signor Fatorini's drawing of Lorenzo di Viterbo's 'Betrothal of the Virgin.' In the circular accompanying the print we, with hardly less surprise than pleasure, read the Committee's apologies for the sophistication of the transcript by the draughtsman (Signor Fatorini), who "without authority" "restored in the drawing [his copy] two or three figures which had virtually disappeared." The magnanimity of this apology is notable, coming as it does from a society which has seldom or never ventured to represent the actual states of the ancient paintings it is its mission to record—

Wherever a fresco peels and drops,
Wherever an outline weakens and wanes
Till the latest life in the painting stops,

Watching each fresco flaked and rasped,
Blocked up, knocked out, or whitewashed o'er.

It is beyond question—and our readers know we have protested for thirty years and more against it—that the Arundel Society never flinched from trifles, to say nothing of "the lower left-hand corner of the painting [which] is now effaced," but appears as good as new in the print before us. Only in one instance, to our knowledge, has the Society ventured even to hint at the fading and stains time and accidents have brought about on the ancient works. The apology it has now issued leads us to hope that never more will copyists supply defaced heads, legs, hands, or even noses to their drawings of old masterpieces. The chromolithograph justifies the opinion of the Society that it "fairly represents one of the frescoes remaining in a side chapel of the church of S. Maria della Verità, a little outside Viterbo." Of course, a chromolithograph, not to be coarse and opaque, must needs be a little dry and hard. Otherwise, we have here much of the silvery clearness, purity of tones and colour, daylight, and broad and simple coloration and chiaroscuro of an early fresco of the Umbrian type. It is dated 1469, and transitional, accomplished, and careful, with only a little of the influence of the primitives distinguishable in its draughtsmanship and modelling, which are sincere and sound, while the timid painter remained uncorrupted by ambition to do more than his craft and palette allowed, quite incapable, withal, of dramatizing the subject he believed in with force sufficient to make him try to realize it with figures of his contemporaries at whole length upon the chapel wall. These figures are before us, including, probably, one Niccolò della Tuccia, who, boasting that he stood to Lorenzo his townsman as a model for one of the persons in the companion fresco of the 'Presentation of the Virgin,' did likewise, let us hope, stand for one of the worthies in Italian attire who are "gossips" of the scene before us, some fifty men and women. These groups evince not a little animation, varied expressions, and much character.

From L'Art we have an artist's proof, the remarque a steam launch, of a plate etched by M. Noel Masson who died a few weeks ago of a striking landscape, comprising the river, houses, boats, and foliage near the very dignified and picturesque railway-bridge at Nogent-sur-Marne. Although the boats are not drawn as they ought to be, and some portions of the foreground are heavy in tone and touch, the charming view is translated with so much grace, taste, spirit, brightness, and softness, that it is truly welcome. M. Masson was one of the victims of the Commune in Paris, 1870, when he lost both his hands and arms by the explosion of a shell. He learned to etch with artificial hands, and survived his terrible sufferings nearly twenty years.

An artist's proof of a photogravure comes to us from the Berlin Photographic Company after one of Mr. M. Stone's prettiest pictures, entitled 'The Return of the Lover.' Although a little dark and heavy in some parts of the foliage behind the chief figure, as well as in the drapery near her, the print is a capital reproduction of a very agreeable piece of genre. The same company has favoured us with a similar print reproducing with exceptional felicity the brilliant, vigorous, and sympathetic 'Zingarella' of Mr. L. Fildes, a beautiful Spanish gipsy maiden standing with hands gently clasping each other in front of her. In its way, which is a fine one, it is a striking and charming design, admirably apt and expressive of the artist's motive. The photogravure is all that could be desired. When a "process" is so well employed, and while it gives us things so acceptable which could not otherwise be produced and pay, it is as absurd as ungrateful to condemn such examples, as many who have not seen them have done.

FINE-ART GOSSIP.

MR. POYNTER's large picture, representing the reception of the Queen of Sheba by Solomon, descending from the Throne of the Lions, has been considerably advanced, and will be exhibited during the spring at Mr. M'Lean's in the Haymarket. It is full of sumptuously clad figures, and distinguished by its golden architecture. The painter will probably send to the Academy a charming half-length figure of a damsel in a white dress, looking at us over her shoulder with a very sweet and candid expression on her beautiful features, which are of a noble type, instinct with the culture of generations. Behind the figure is a wall covered with foliage.

THE death, on the 5th inst., is announced of Mr. T. M. Richardson, a landscape painter and member of the Society of Painters in Water Colours. He was seventy-seven years of age.

A PAINTED window, of which the subject is Christ blessing little children, designed by Mr. J. R. Seddon, will be on view until the 25th inst. at Mr. Belham's works, 155, Buckingham Palace Road.

THE forthcoming part of the Journal of the British Archaeological Association will contain, among others, the following papers: 'The Classification and Geographical Distribution of Early Christian Inscribed Monuments in Scotland,' by J. Romilly Allen; 'The Church of St. Valentine at Rome,' by J. R. Forbes; 'Celtic Ornament on the Crosses of Cornwall,' by A. G. Langdon; 'Discoveries in the Neighbourhood of Crowland,' by J. T. Irvine; and 'Rothsay and Bute,' by Rev. J. K. Hewison.

MR. T. M. FALLOW, F.S.A. (joint editor with Mr. Leadman of 'Church Plate of Yorkshire'), has become the editor of the Reliquary.

THE February number of the Antiquary will contain numerous notes on the Tudor Exhibition by the secretary, Hon. Harold Dillon, as well as an article on the armour there shown, by Baron de Cosson, F.S.A., who has himself contributed some of the best of the armour.

THE twelfth volume of the Journal of the Derbyshire Archaeological and Natural History Society will be issued early in February. The most attractive article will probably be one by Sir George Sitwell, F.S.A., on a series of old seventeenth century diary pocket-books found at Renishaw, and abounding in quaint illustrations of the times.

THE cast of the cantoria, or singing gallery, by Donatello, for the church of Santa Maria delle Fiori, Florence, has been erected at the South Kensington Museum.

WE have to record the death at Paris, on the 28th ult., of M. Jacques Edmond Leman, an able French painter of historic genre and portraits. He was born at Laigle (Orne), September 15th, 1829, became a pupil of Picot, and figured with distinction in the Salons from 1852 onwards, when he made his début with 'Les Loirs de Virgile.' He painted successively 'Le Duel de Guise et Coligny,' 'Une Matinée chez la Marquise de Rambouillet,' 'Molière posant chez Mignard,' 'Le Médecin malgré Lui,' and many other excellent pictures, some of which we have noticed with praise in reviews of the Salons since 1869. M. Leman produced illustrations of great merit to fine editions of Molière, V. Hugo, and the superb 'Deuxième Centenaire de Corneille,' published by M. Cagniard of Rouen. So says the Chronique des Arts. At Paris has likewise died the landscape painter M. Max Mayeur, who since 1868 has nearly always contributed to the Salons. M. E. Humbert, who produced a remarkable notice of Liotard, lately published in Paris, is dead.

THE death, on the 31st ult., of the Belgian painter P. O. Joseph Coomans occurred at Boulogne-sur-Seine, where, and in Paris, this well-known artist had lived during many years. He was a frequent contributor to the Salons, and produced 'Orgie des Philistins dans le Temple de Dagon,' 'Le Massacre des Teutètes et des Usipètes par les Romains,' 'La Fable et la Vérité,' &c., and a number of portraits. So says the Journal des Arts.

ALL who are interested in the state and prospects of current design ought to thank Mr. M. B. Huish for his article 'Ten Years of British Art,' published in this month's Nineteenth Century, which discusses, with abundance of well-arranged and curious data, what has taken place of late in the world of design. During the period in question nearly 6,500,000. have been spent by taxpayers; 500,000. of this sum has gone to buildings, and mainly, of course, on labour skilled and unskilled; an equal sum went on purchases, the remainder under administration, repairs, rents, &c. Of the larger sum the Department of Science and Art is credited with by far the greater portion, e.g., nearly 463,000. in a single year. But as we are not told how much science took—and the "art" of the department is intended for the benefit of artisans and manufacturers rather than the higher orders of design—the benefit to art proper is not quite so great as the figures suggest. Nearly 139,000. has been spent on pictures for the National Gallery, where the attendance of visitors has decreased from 871,500 in 1880 to 550,817 in 1888. It is not only in respect to statistics, but in deductions and comparisons derived from them, that this paper is important. We find, amongst other things, a copious analysis of great picture sales, showing that fifty-four paintings realized 252,373. an average of 4,673. each. The highest price, 10,395. was given for Boucher's portrait of Madame de Pompadour. This stupendous outlay cannot be due to reverence for high art. The next sum, 9,975., was for a group of two ladies by Gainsborough, and probably nearly as much as Gainsborough earned during his whole lifetime. A miniature by Oliver fetched more than 2,000*l.* Mr. Huish says that nearly two millions has gone to Germany, France, and elsewhere for pictures, engravings, and chromolithographs between 1880 and 1890.

A WELL-INFORMED Correspondent writes:—

"There has hitherto been no catalogue of prints engraved after the work of the miniaturist Cosway. Such a catalogue is about to be published by Mr. Daniel, of Coventry Street, who draws his chief materials from the collections of Sir P. Currie, Permanent Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office; M. de Falbe, the Danish Minister; and the British Museum. A beautiful drawing of three ladies of the Lumley family, belonging to Sir P. Currie, has been engraved by Stodart for the frontispiece."

MR. MERCER writes from Florence:—

"An exhibition is to be held at the Theatre Politeama during the months of May and June for the double and rather incongruous purpose of commemorating the sixth centenary of the death of Dante's Beatrice, and displaying the present capacity of Italian women in useful and ornamental arts and industries. Special fêtes will probably lend additional attraction to the principal objects of the exhibition, and the programme, if successfully carried out, is sufficiently varied to suit all tastes. There will be a revival of old May Day songs, processions, and dances—picturesque, no doubt, with flowers in beauty and abundance, quite reward enough for any visitor to the City of Flowers par excellence. Tableaux illustrating the 'Vita Nuova' of Dante will certainly be faithful representations of the costumes of the thirteenth century, as the libraries and public and private collections here contain many books and pictures, sure to be rifled for the correct forms and material of dress their work. Lectures are to be given on women's work in painting, sculpture, poetry, and romance; also as singers, actresses, schoolmistresses, heroines, and patriots. Objects of all kinds of needlework and productions of literature, painting, and sculpture will be shown in competition for prizes and medals. Committees are now being chosen in the other Italian cities for promoting the success of this exhibition, and communications on all matters appertaining thereto may be addressed to Count Angelo de Gubernatis, who is the chief director of the executive in Florence."

MR. HENRY BLACKBURN writes:—

"The following passage in Mr. Pennell's book calls for the most unqualified and emphatic denial: 'The fashion of illustrating catalogues commenced, I believe, in France and grew and developed there under the care of L'Art, and the publishers of the Salon Catalogues, until its influence has made itself felt, even in England.' Mr. Pennell knows, or (writing as an authority) should have known, that the system of illustrated catalogues, with facsimile reproductions of the artists' sketches, was commenced in England in 1875, and that nothing of the kind appeared in foreign countries until 1879, the year after the Paris Universal Exhibition. 'Pen Drawing and Pen Draughtsmen' is a valuable book for its plates, if not for its opinions; but the ungenerous references to the work of English artists throughout its pages will not enhance its value in any country."

At a meeting last week of the Glasgow Town Council the Lord Provost made a special appeal for subscriptions to raise 200,000*l.* for the establishment of a museum and art gallery in Glasgow.

MUSIC

THE NATIONAL SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS.

THE annual conference of this growing organization, which took place at Bristol last week, was successful, the attendance being the largest since its foundation, though chiefly confined to provincial musicians. On the formation of the London—or, to be exact, the South-Eastern—section, three years ago, we expressed agreement with the objects of the society, and are, therefore, pleased to learn that it is in a flourishing condition. The annual report presented by the general secretary, Mr. E. Chadfield, stated that there are now 550 members, and that the number is steadily increasing. The week's proceedings comprised performances of compositions by members, concerts by the old-established madrigal and glee societies in Bristol, and meetings for the discussion of subjects bearing upon the art of music and the welfare of those who adopt it as a profession. At the first of these meetings, on Wednesday morning, the 8th, Mr. E. Prout read a paper on the study of counterpoint, in which he strongly advocated the retention of most of the old rules of strict counterpoint for students in the elementary stage—in other words, that pupils should learn how to preserve tonality and melodic interest, using only triads and first inversions, before passing to the modern or free style. His chief argument was that highly beneficial results would be certain to accrue from mental discipline of this kind, and instanced the fact that all the great masters were well grounded in strict counterpoint with the exception of Schubert, who felt his deficiencies so greatly that he applied to Sechter for lessons only a few weeks before his death. Mr. Prout's views were combated, but we think not very successfully, by Dr. Hunt, of Birkenhead, and Dr. Hiles, of Manchester. On the same afternoon Mr. C. S. Curwen read a paper on the elementary musical education of the people.

Following up the statement of his views respecting counterpoint, Mr. Prout brought forward a resolution on the following morning to the effect that exercises in strict counterpoint should be added to the examination questions' book of the society. There was a long and animated debate, but the balance of opinion was evidently in favour of Mr. Prout, and his resolution was eventually carried unanimously, with the amendment, by Mr. Cummings, that candidates for the society's diploma should work the contrapuntal exercises at their own option. It would have been more to the society's interest had Mr. Prout's proposal been adopted in its original form, but at any rate something has been done to remove a reproach. The only other meeting to which reference need be made was that of Friday morning, when Mr. Cummings read a paper 'On Fingering, Past, Present, and Future,' in which he proved, by reference to old treatises and instruction books, that the figures 1 to 5 were used for marking the fingering of clavier music in this country for nearly two hundred years. Further, that in Germany during this period the method was 0, 1, 2, 3, 4. It was a German named Falkener who introduced the latter system into this country in 1757, substituting, however, a x for an 0. Obviously, therefore, the method which we are accustomed to speak of as foreign is really old English. The value of Mr. Cummings's researches is by no means inconsiderable, and the opinion of the musicians present seemed to be unanimous that our present insular method should be abandoned in the interests of students.

The first of the performances in connexion with the conference took place on Tuesday evening, the 7th inst., when a Pianoforte Trio in e flat by Dr. Bunnett, a Sonata in c minor for piano and violin by Dr. Walter Stokes—both melodious, well-written works—and a remarkably spirited and effective Duo Concertante for two pianofortes by Mr. C. E. Stephens were the most important features of the programme. In the evening the visitors attended a rehearsal of the Bristol Madrigal Society, under the direction of Mr. D. W. Rootham. This old-established body retains its supremacy in this style of music, the singing being remarkable for purity of tone and unfailing attention to all the marks of expression, the only fault being a somewhat uneven balance, the sweet thin tone of the trebles being sometimes overwhelmed by the powerful, sonorous basses. The programme included some of the finest examples of Weelkes, Edwardes, Morley, Marenzio, and Pearsall, and with these were associated a remarkably well-written madrigal, "Bring the bright garlands hither," by Miss Rosalind Ellicott, and an effective six-voice part song, "Music when soft voices die," by Dr. Alfred King. On the following evening the Orpheus Glee Society gave a special performance under Mr. Riseley's direction. We drew attention to the excellence of this society's work on the occasion of its performance in London last year, and need only repeat that a better trained male-voice choir certainly does not exist. Here we may mention the great activity in the cultivation of choral music in Bristol. Beside the two old-established bodies just noticed, there are the Festival Choir of 400 voices in constant rehearsal; a new choral society of 500 under Mr. Riseley; four new choral societies in the various quarters of the city, with an aggregate of 700 voices; a new male-voice choir, entitled the Gleemen, with 90 members; and Mr. John Barrett's choir of 70. The recently established Society of Instrumentalists has rapidly developed, and now numbers 200, of whom 160 are efficient performing members. The next conference will be held at Liverpool, in the first week of January, 1891.

Musical Society.

THE Popular Concerts were resumed last Saturday, the principal works in the programme being Schubert's Quartet in a minor, Op. 29; Beethoven's Sonata in e flat, Op. 7, played by Sir Charles Halle, and the same composer's Septet. The executants in the last-named work were Madame Néruda, and Messrs. Straus, Piatti, Reynolds, Lazarus, Paersch, and Wotton. Miss Liza Lehmann was unable to sing owing to an attack of influenza, and her place was taken by Mr. Hirwen Jones, who was acceptable in songs by Sterndale Bennett, Rubinstein, and Schumann.

ON Monday Schubert's Octet was given, the executants being the same as in the Septet with the addition of Herr Ries. The pianist was Madame Geisler-Schubert, who made her first appearance at these concerts. Her share in the programme was not calculated to display her abilities to the greatest advantage, Mendelssohn's Piano and Violoncello Sonata in b flat, Op. 45, affording little opportunity for effect, while Chopin's Ballade in c minor is obviously unsuited to her. Her rendering was unaffected, but wanting in passion, and in the left-hand part not even note-perfect. The vocalist was Mr. Plunket Greene, who gave much effect to Lieder by Schubert and Schumann, and Felix Semon's vigorous 'Magyar's Song.'

DEATH has been busy of late in the ranks of distinguished operatic artists. To the list of those who have passed away must now be added Giorgio Ronconi, who expired at Madrid on Wednesday last week. To the present generation of amateurs Ronconi was but a name, but in his time he was pre-eminent in his particular line. That line was the presentation of strong character parts, whether emotional or humorous. Thus he was equally striking as Rigoletto and as Figaro in 'Il Barbiere,' while in parts requiring chiefly vocal excellence he was not successful. In Lumley's 'Reminiscences of the Opera' we read that he made little impression on his début in 1842 as Enrico in 'Lucia.' His voice was harsh, and not under perfect control, but his histrionic gifts kept him to the front, and down to 1866 he was one of the most valued members of the Royal Italian Opera Company.

THE instrumental movements in Berlioz's 'Roméo et Juliette' formed the principal feature of Sir Charles Halle's Manchester concert on Thursday this week, and they are also in the St. James's Hall programme of Friday next.

Dramatic Gossip.

In some respects, at least, Mr. Burnand's burlesque of 'La Tosca' is in his happiest vein. It is written with genuine humour, and its puns and verbal distortions are as a rule successful. How far Mr. Burnand has succeeded in travestying the grim story by subjecting his hero to the tortures of being photographed is a matter on which different opinions may and will be held. It may at least be conceded that the third act of the original is as untractable a subject as the parodist can often have chosen. As a whole, 'Tra la la Tosca' is light and effervescent. In these things, as the result proved, lay its principal danger. With a careful interpretation it would have had a fair chance of drawing the public for some weeks to come. Mr. Arthur Roberts, to whom was assigned the principal character—for such in the burlesque is Scarpia—elected to give his own words in preference to those of his author. In so doing he is not without ample precedent. For once, however, the public has shown courage and judgment, and the offender has had a severe rap on the knuckles. Our low comedians are recruited from the music-hall, and have a lofty contempt for style. They seek, like the famous proprietor of Astley's, to get rid of such imbecility and "come to the osses." Where, as in Mr. Burnand's travesty, neatness of style and versification is everything, and the burlesque idea not much, proceedings such as those in which, after the wont of his class, Mr. Roberts indulged, are irritating. Mr. Roberts has great natural drolery. He has received a good lesson, and in future will probably, unless he writes his own burlesques, pay more heed to the lines of his author. Miss Margaret Ayrton's imitation of Mrs. Bernard Beere was surprisingly clever.

A REVIVAL for a temporary purpose, at the Vaudeville, of 'The School for Scandal' is unsatisfactory. The representatives of Joseph Surface and Charles Surface failed to grasp the full significance of those parts; the dialogue was given, in many cases, in uncultivated style; accents were forced upon adjectives with most damaging effect, and eighteenth century polish was absent. One actress must be exempted from the censure. The Lady Teazle of Miss Winifred Emery was bright, natural, and convincing. It seems as though this actress had a future before her in high comedy. What is indispensable to the Vaudeville company is a stage management that will repress ignorances of speech, even if it allows, as it very properly may, experiments in the rendering of character.

MR. IRVING will, it is stated, before the close of the season revive one of the most popular of his past pieces. The choice seems to lie between 'Louis XI,' 'Charles I,' and 'Hamlet.'

MR. CHARLES WYNDHAM's return to the Criterion will probably take place in March.

AN address by Mr. Irving is promised for Ash Wednesday before the Wolverhampton Literary and Scientific Society, of which he is president.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW BOOKS.

The MARRIAGES of the BOUR-

BONS. By Captain the Hon. D. A. BINGHAM. With Illustrations. 2 vols. demy 8vo. 32s.

From the TIMES.

"Captain Bingham has missed nothing that is picturesque or romantic in the history of France from the accession of Henri Quatre on the extinction of the House of Valois..... We should do Captain Bingham injustice if we said that his pages are full of lively gossip, for he has not only studied and compared the chroniclers and historians, but examined masses of manuscripts hidden away in archives. Treating his subjects in the picturesque style of Michelet, he has aimed at making a thoroughly readable book."

From the DAILY NEWS.

"Captain Bingham is an anecdotal master in history and biography, and has made a special study of the dynastic annals of France and of those memoirs which fill so large a space in French literature, and throw so vivid but so dubious a light on the world of ante-chambers and boudoirs. To his favourite task he brings the curiosity of a courtier and the skill of a journalist."

ACROBATS and MOUNTE-

BANKS. By H. LE ROUX and J. GARNIER. Translated from the French by A. P. MORTON. With 233 Illustrations. Crown 4to. 16s.

From the PALL GAZETTE.

"This book will prove of remarkable interest..... Every page of it is interesting, and many of them thrilling..... The illustrations are remarkably good..... This handsome volume."

From the SCOTSMAN.

"The work is certainly one of the most attractive illustrated books that have appeared this season. Its subject is here treated in a delightfully bright and, in many ways, truly informative manner..... It is difficult to speak too highly in praise of the illustrations..... The work as a whole is pleasant to read and pleasant to look at; and will be prized by every one who possesses it."

JOHN DARKE'S SOJOURN in the COTTESWOLDS and ELSEWHERE: a Series of Sketches by S. S. BUCKMAN, F.G.S. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

From LAND and WATER.

"It is a very long time since we have met with any literature so distinctly racy of the soil as Mr. Buckman's sketches of the folk of the Cotteswolds. Admirably rendered in the delightful Doric droll of Berkeley Vale, these sketches most faithfully depict the inner and outer life of the people of a country side still retaining many of the primitive customs and many of the quaint and archaic turns of speech, of a purely pastoral age."

NEW NOVELS.

The WORLD and the CLOISTER.

LOUIS DRAYCOTT: the Story of his Life. By Mrs. R. S. DE COURCY LAFFAN (Mrs. LEITH ADAMS). Crown 8vo. 2 vols.

From the SCOTSMAN.

"'Louis Draycott' is a story that profoundly touches and interests the reader. It moves both his heart and his imagination, and should raise Mrs. Laffan's reputation as a writer of fiction."

The TRIUMPH of MANHOOD.

By MARIE CONNOR. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

From the COURT JOURNAL.

"It is rare indeed to meet with so powerful a work of fiction. A truly remarkable work. The book teems with deep and bold thoughts, and will prove to many a welcome change from the insipidity and conventionalism of the average novel."

INNOCENCIA: a Story of the

The Early Diary of Frances Burney, 1768-1778.

With a Selection from her Correspondence and from the Journals of her Sisters, Susan and Charlotte Burney. Edited by Annie Raine Ellis. 2 vols. (Bell & Sons.)

A CENTURY ago Fanny Burney was the most popular of living novelists, but her 'Diary,' published in 1842, has proved of yet more service to her fame. The extraordinary enthusiasm excited by 'Evelina,' a novel which kept Reynolds up all night and which Dr. Johnson pronounced to be charming, has long ago died away. How Sir Joshua said he would give fifty pounds to know the author, how the famous Mrs. Cholmondeley cried out she would go all over the town to discover him, how the "great Cham of letters" took Boswell to task for not knowing what a Brangton was, and how the sayings and doings of Madame Duval, Sir Clement Willoughby, and Mr. Smith became the talk of the town—all this is now more a matter of surprise to us than of sympathy. Frances Burney, who met Prior's Duchess of Queensberry in her youth and lived long enough to read and to praise Disraeli's 'Contarini Fleming,' has been superseded by novelists of a higher order; and although her novels even now are far from being dead books, and have frequently been reprinted, they are familiar chiefly to students of literature, and are not much in demand at the circulating libraries.

Mrs. Ellis, who has produced the best recent editions of 'Evelina' and 'Cecilia,' has expended no small amount of labour on the production of Fanny Burney's 'Early Diary,' which is now printed for the first time. That it should have been so long retained in manuscript is surprising, for it almost vies in interest with the well-known diary that begins with the date at which these earlier pages end. It is a work deserving all the care Mrs. Ellis has bestowed upon it, and, as she truly says, shows the character of the writer on every leaf, "even as the story of her first youth tells itself as we turn them."

There is no pleasanter figure among the men and women who belonged to Dr. Johnson's circle than that of Fanny Burney, and there is no literary lady of the period who can boast of the personal characteristics which make Mr. Crisp's "Fannikin" attractive to readers who care little for 'Evelina' and cannot tolerate 'Camilla.' The ladies who in those days belonged to the "Bas bleus" were in a state of semi-antagonism to society, and sometimes acted like women who after escaping from its trammels find themselves in a false position. When Johnson taught his "dear little Burney" Latin, she was pleased and flattered, but regretted the time spent in the acquisition of what she should "always dread to have known." The humble, unaffected girl, whose chief fear was of publicity, was no rival to Mrs. Montagu, Mrs. Carter, and Mrs. Cholmondeley. No young woman ever received more praise or more of the pleasure that praise yields than Fanny Burney gained from 'Evelina,' and no woman of any age ever bore the burden of popularity more graciously. Like her father, she was eminently modest and sweet-tempered; like all the members of her family with whom we are acquainted, she was blessed with good sense, a warm heart, and a keen faculty of enjoyment. Nature had been singularly kind to the Burneys, who were as gifted as they were affectionate. The 'Early Diary' gives the reader a wider acquaintance with the cheerful circle than he had before. Fanny has warm words of praise and affection for every member of it: for James, the future admiral, who is "quite happy and quite good, and full of humour, mirth, and jollity"; for Charles, afterwards famous as a Greek scholar, who is also "full of spirits and good humour"; for Hetty, the beauty of the family, who had the sweetness of disposition common to the race, and whose exquisite skill as a musician her sister could admire, but did not share; and for "Susette, the most engaging creature living," of whom Owen Cambridge said, "She cannot even move, she cannot get up or sit down, but there is something in her manner that is sure to give pleasure." But Fanny Burney's love of her brothers and sisters—and we have named but a few of the large double family, for Dr. Burney married twice—was as nothing when compared with her devotion to her father, who possessed in her eyes every virtue under the sun. It was surely with no growling condescension, as Macaulay intimates, that Johnson expressed his high estimate of a brilliant and versatile man, who possessed the Doctor's own unquenchable thirst for knowledge. "My heart," he said, "goes forth to meet Burney. I question if there be in the world such a man altogether for mind, intelligence, and manners." Next to her father came Samuel Crisp, Fanny's friend and counsellor from her earliest years. Macaulay draws a vivid picture of Crisp as a disappointed man, who in revenge for his failure as a dramatist shut himself up in a lonely country house. But Crisp, although disappointed, was so far from being a gloomy misanthrope that some of the happiest, merriest days of the Burney family were spent in the rambling old house at Chesington, to which, by the way, he did not retire until ten years after the representation of his 'Virginia.' No man had a warmer heart, no man a cheerier laugh, and Fanny's "ever charming beloved daddy Crisp" added not a little to the joyousness of her life at its most brilliant period. Garrick, too, when the girl was just escaping from childhood—she is sixteen when the 'Early Diary' begins—loved to look in upon his friend and his delightful family at all seasons, and sometimes before they were up in the morning. "He seems, indeed," writes the diarist, "to love all that belong to my father, of whom he is really very fond. As he went out he said, with a very comical face, 'I like you, I like you all. I like your looks, I like your manner.' And then, opening his arms with an air of heroics, he cried, 'I am tempted to run away with you all, one after another.' We all longed to say 'Pray do!'"

Of Garrick's early morning visits and the mirth they caused we hear more than once; and Charlotte Burney, a younger sister of Fanny, records in the slang of the period her disappointment when the great actor was expected and did not appear:—

"I entirely depended upon it, and for four mornings was up at 7 o'clock and at the trouble and fatigue of washing face and hands quite clean, putting on clean linnen, a tidy gown and smug cap, and after all we were choused, for he nicked us entirely and never came at all."

This rather fast young lady, upon being greeted by Garrick at the theatre, borrows a phrase from Sheridan, and exclaims, "Split me if I'd not a hundred times rather be spoken to by Garrick in public than His Majesty: G—d bless him!"

Fanny was self-educated. Some of her sisters were sent to Paris, but she was left at home much to her own devices. She taught herself French and Italian, read Roman history and Middleton's 'Life of Cicero,' admired Pope's letters, and appreciated Spenser; but it was not chiefly through books that her genius was developed. The instinct that made her, to quote Johnson's phrase, a "character-monger" was stimulated in the society, as varied as it was brilliant, to which she was accustomed under her father's roof. Everybody of note came to Dr. Burney's family concerts, and Fanny, shy, silent, and in a measure unheeded, was probably the shrewdest observer in the room. Men and women—or rather their external peculiarities—were her books; and so amusing are her comments in this 'Early Diary,' that although we have little in it of Johnson and Mrs. Thrale, and nothing of George III., Queen Charlotte, and Madame de Schwellenberg, the volumes are very nearly as entertaining as the journal begun ten years later. The diary is written crudely at first and in a very girlish style; but by degrees the entries gain in liveliness and force, and the future novelist stands confessed. Moreover, Fanny Burney's observation was not limited to what she saw at home. Like her own Evelina she went to Ranelagh, to the Pantheon, to dances and the opera, and to a masquerade ball; and like her, too, she was brought into contact, both at home and abroad, with people almost boisterous and vulgar enough to remind us of Madame Duval and Capt. Mirvan. It was a coarse age. With two or three notable exceptions, even the celebrated ladies with whom Fanny became acquainted were not particularly ladylike. Mrs. Thrale used naughty words, Mrs. Montagu was ostentatious and affected, and Mrs. Cholmondeley upon discovering the author of 'Evelina' treated her at Sir Joshua Reynolds's with a want of delicacy that would be regarded in our days as intolerable. "Come, come, Mrs. Cholmondeley," said Sir Joshua, "I won't have her overpowered here"; upon which the lady, turning to him with quickness and vehemence, exclaimed, "Why, I ain't going to kill her! don't be afraid"; and, despite the gentle host's remonstrance, the persecution continued.

Some of Fanny Burney's experiences with men might well have suggested the coarser or more foolish scenes in which Sir Clement Willoughby and the once famous Mr. Smith bore a part. A certain Mr. Twiss talks to the girl in her father's presence in a way that would have justified Dr. Burney in turning him out of the house. At Teignmouth an elderly gentleman, remarkable, according to Fanny's half-sister Maria, "for agreeability, pleasantry, and good breeding," acts the part of her lover with such "particularity" as to put her out of countenance. "He has lived so long abroad," is the young lady's comment, "that I suppose he thinks it necessary to talk nonsense to the fair sex." Then she visits the house of a Dr. Wall, who "romped most furiously and forcibly, and made so many attempts to be rather too facetious that I was fain to struggle most furiously to free myself from him." In this instance she managed to keep off caresses, but was not always so successful. A young man who is pronounced "very well bred, good-tempered, and sensible," met her one evening at a tea party, fell in love on the spot, and suddenly gave her "a most ardent salute." "I wonder," she writes, "so modest a man could dare be so bold." The man's modesty did not hinder him from plaguing Fanny with his addresses after she had refused his offer in the plainest language; and that he was well bred and sensible will not be apparent to the reader of the love letters written by the forlorn swain. One of them, "by no means so high-flown as the first" in the lady's judgment, begins as follows:—

"Madam, I have somewhere seen that powerful Deity, Cupid, and the invincible Mars habited in a similar manner, and each have in their train several of the same dispositioned Attendants; the propriety of which Thought I own pleased me, for when drawn from the allegory, it is acknowledged, both Love and War are comparative in several particulars; they each require Constancy, and the hope of success stimulates each to Perseverance, and as the one is warmed and encouraged by the desire of Glory, so the other is much more powerfully fired and transported by the Charms of the Fair Sex."

The letter, which might have been transferred to 'Evelina,' continues in the same strain, and there is no indication that Fanny Burney, despite her quick sense of humour, was struck by its absurdity. Her rejected lover's constancy leads her to exclaim, "Ah! will any one I can love ever thus love me?"

Some highly amusing passages in these volumes are from the pen of Susan Burney, who seems to have possessed much of her sister's faculty as a chronicler. So delighted is she with the success of 'Evelina' that she writes the most elaborate account for Fanny's benefit of everything which she heard upon the subject before the authorship was known. One lady is sure it must have been written by a person used to high life; another conjectures it is a woman's writing, as there is such a remarkable delicacy in all the conversations, and exclaims, "It is the sweetest thing, I do declare, that ever I read in my life." Dr. Burney declares, "I wish I may die if I do not believe it to be the best novel in the language, Fielding's excepted"; and there is an elaborate account of his reading the story to his wife in bed, while Susan, hearing loud laughter, creeps to the door and listens to their comments. The "dear father's energy of delight" makes him swear, while Susan and her younger sister Charlotte stand till they are "cramped to death, not daring to move and almost stifled with laughing." Then we read that Mrs. Thrall is "mortal fond" of the book; and when she writes saying that Dr. Johnson protested there were passages in it that might do honour to Richardson, Susan can make no comments upon the letter but by jumping, laughing, and almost crying. "I had thought before," she writes, "that you had reached the summit of grandeur in Mrs. Thrall's, Mrs. Cholmondeley's, and my father's warm approbation;—but Johnson's raises you so many degrees higher, that you may now certainly rest secure on your literary throne, for no one can ever shake it."

Mrs. Thrall's letter produced the same delirious effect on Fanny, who told Sir Walter Scott, nearly fifty years afterwards, that on receiving it she danced with delight round the mulberry tree in the garden at Chesington—"to the no small amazement and diversion of Mr. Crisp," she wrote in her 'Diary' at the time.

Then Susan has to tell Fanny of a visit to Streatham, when Mrs. Thrall rose to meet her "very sweetly":—

"Dr. Johnson, too, rose. 'How do, dear lady?' My father told him it was not his Miss—but another of his own bantlings. Dr. Johnson, however, looked at me with great kindness and not at all in a discouraging manner.....'Come, come here, my little dear,' said he, and took my hand as I sat down, I took then courage to deliver your respects. 'Aye—why don't she come among us?' said he. I said you were confined by a sick sister, but that you were very sorry to be away. 'A rogue,' said he, laughing. 'She don't mind me!' And then I up and spoke vast fine about you, for Dr. Johnson looked so kind and so good-humoured I was not afraid of the sound of my voice."

During the same visit the Doctor put his arm around her, saying:—

"Now you don't expect that I shall ever love you so well as I do your sister?" "Oh, no, sir," said I, "I have no such hopes, I am not so presumptuous." "I am glad you are so modest," said he, laughing,—and so encouraged by his good humour (and he kept see-sawing me backwards and forwards in his arms, as if he had taken me for you) that I told him I must make an interest with him through you. He again said he was glad I was so modest, and added, 'But I believe you're a good little creature. I think one should love you too, if one did but know you.'"

We close these interesting volumes with regret, for Fanny Burney's companionship is always pleasant, and the men and women to whom we are introduced exhibit a state of society that has passed away for ever. Miss Burney has, perhaps, supplied the most lifelike picture of it we possess, and Mrs. Ellis's copious illustrations of the text will not only afford amusement to the general reader, but may be of service to the student of the period.

Ireland and the Anglo-Norman Church: a History of Ireland and Irish Christianity from the Anglo-Norman Conquest to the Dawn of the Reformation. By the Rev. G. T. Stokes, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

THE title of Dr. Stokes's brilliant lectures on Ireland during the first three centuries of Norman rule is the least satisfactory part of the volume, for it gives the impression of a work of more limited scope than the vivid account of Ireland, Celtic and Norman, lay and cleric, which the learned author has painted for the benefit, first of his classes in Trinity College, Dublin, and afterwards for students at large, who, unfortunately, seldom find their subject treated so brilliantly as it is by the Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Dublin.

The manner, as Dr. Stokes admits in his preface, is open to criticism—no doubt the book would have done greater justice to the research expended on it had it been recast; but it would inevitably have lost the freshness and brightness that hold the attention of the reader and compel him to admit, at all events in the present instance, that "when a man writes with a young audience vividly before his mind, the salient points of a story are seized, the mere subsidiary details are avoided, and the historical picture is made clear because the canvas is not too much crowded with figures."

In these words Dr. Stokes explains the object of his book, and it is difficult to see how that could have been attained more successfully, for from the first page to the last his lectures are not only learned and instructive, but interesting, and, stimulating the thirst for knowledge, send the reader back with a new zest to the dreary pages of the 'Annals of the Four Masters.'

Irish history during the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries has usually been deemed most dully dull, and the few dramatic incidents of the unceasing quarrel did not save from monotony the dreary fights and feuds between Celt and Celt, Celt and Anglo-Irish, Anglo-Irish and Anglo-Irish, Anglo-Irish and English, bishop and abbot, king's man and Pope's man, layman and cleric, priest and monk, varied too frequently by devastating pestilence and famine. Yet Dr. Stokes has the gift of dramatic insight; he creates a living, though by no means an agreeable picture of the past, and, unlike so many Irish historians, he does not tell us that the evils of his country began with the Conquest, as his first lecture deals with 'The Last Years of Irish Independence,' and for the sorry state of things then discovered he blames not the half-civilized condition of the natives, nor the convenient and well-abused Dane, but the Eastern influence which had penetrated the country centuries before, and had so great an influence on the development of Celtic art and literature:—

"With Byzantine accomplishments, however, there came Byzantine vices as well. Truth and mercy disappeared from Byzantine morals. Faithlessness and cruelty marked each successive dynasty which held the throne of the Eastern Empire, and defiled the sacred precincts of the Holy Eastern Church itself. So it was, and even worse in Ireland. Cruelty and falsehood were peculiar to no race of princes, but displayed themselves equally in the O'Loughlins, the O'Conors, and the O'Brians, as well as in the inferior chiefs.....Blinding, quite after the Byzantine fashion, was the ordinary fate reserved for dangerous captives, yea, and even for members of the princely families who became obnoxious to the reigning sovereign.....King Turlough O'Connor in 1136 blinded his own son Hugh when he was becoming dangerous. Five years later we read that Dermot MacMurrough..... blinded Murtogh MacGillamacholmog.....together with twenty of his chief men.....Scarcely a princely house throughout Ireland was there where some blind warrior lived not, occupying the corner of the hearth, and helping by the tale of his own wrongs and the speaking evidence of his sightless and mangled eyeballs to deepen the tribal hatred which was fast ruining Ireland."

Winter was the only season of peace; during summer and harvest time there were unceasing raids and plundering forays, and the unfortunate peasantry lived in daily terror of their lives.

"It was a sad time, when every man's hand was against his neighbour, and when for the poor peaceable, industrious man there was neither light nor hope nor security."

It was, therefore, no very prosperous country that the Normans invaded; and it is probable that had they subjugated it thoroughly as they subjugated England, Ireland would have been spared the greater number of her ills. But, as Dr. Stokes shows us, feudalism in Ireland had all the disadvantages inherent in the system without any of the causes which made it succeed in our own land. There

"the great nobles had it all their own way. The De Courcys, the De Burghs, the Geraldines, the Butlers, the De Lacys quarrelled, fought, oppressed the people, defied the viceroys, despised the Crown, and were never crushed as the iron hand of Henry crushed the Anglo-Norman feudatories in England. To the neglect of the Crown, to the weakness of the viceroys, to the selfish, foolish internecine struggles of the great feudatories in Ireland, its slow development and its subsequent sad history must historically be traced."

Throughout these years of struggle the animosity between the Celtic and the Anglo-Norman clergy increased. Under the Norman rule the episcopate was thoroughly secularized, and the Anglo-Norman Archbishops of Dublin were statesmen, judges, lawyers, anything but clerics. In extenuation it must, however, be remembered that during the many quarrels between king and Pope, and especially during the years of John's reign in which England was placed under an interdict, the prelates needed no little diplomatic skill to steer their course between a Pope forbidding the exercise of all priestly and episcopal functions, and a king threatening to imprison, exile, or hang those who refused to officiate in the usual way.

The Celtic clergy were, of course, free of this difficulty, and the two parties had no dealings with one another. Early in the thirteenth century the Anglo-Norman Church prohibited the admission of Irish clerics into monasteries, benefices, or cathedral dignities under English control, and later in the century the Celts retaliated by a similar prohibition. In both cases the Pope intervened; but it is probable that mutual dislike took the place of legal exclusion, and by the Statute of Kilkenny Irishmen were again debarred from ecclesiastical preferment wherever English law prevailed.

And now no veto came from the Vatican; the Popes threw their influence on the English side, and remained staunch in their support of the stronger party up to the time of the Reformation. Indeed, a bull dealing with the internal economy of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, and issued by Leo X. in 1515, sanctions "that ancient custom, concerning Irishmen by nature, manners, and blood, who should not be admitted in the said Cathedral Church of St. Patrick, any royal dispensation notwithstanding; it is agreed that it shall flourish, grow strong, and prevail with a vigorous and perpetual care."

It is at this point, when by Papal decree Catholic Irishmen were excluded from their own cathedral, dedicated to their national saint, that Dr. Stokes brings to a close his extremely interesting and instructive lectures; but we hope that before long he will raise the curtain on a new act in the tragedy of Ireland, and discourse as brilliantly and instructively of the more dramatic era of the Reformation.

Thirty Years of Colonial Government: a Selection from the Despatches and Letters of the Right Hon. Sir George Bowen, G.C.M.G. Edited by Stanley Lane-Poole. 2 vols. (Longmans & Co.)

MR. J. A. FROUDE has declared in 'Oceana,' and Sir George Bowen reiterates the assertion in these volumes, that the wish to sever the connexion between England and her colonies was formerly entertained not only by some of our leading statesmen, but even in the Colonial Office itself. Chapter and verse are given in proof of this charge, and such readers as can recollect the tone of a certain school thirty or forty years ago may be inclined to believe it. Such feelings have now died away, and if there be one subject upon which all our political parties are agreed, it is on the paramount importance not only of maintaining our existing colonial empire, but of strengthening the bonds which connect it. This task may not be so easy nor the fulfilment of it so near as Sir George Bowen imagines; the practical difficulties to be surmounted are enormous, but the attempt is heroic, and one in which, as Lord Rosebery has assured us, "a man might well die." The subject is ably discussed by Sir George Bowen in a short appendix to this work; and it is encouraging that a man with his "unmatched experience" should deem it practicable. The success which has attended what Bacon terms "the heroic work for colonization" is no doubt to be attributed to some of the characteristic qualities of the British race, but in recent years it has been accelerated by a happy selection of governors, who have developed a branch of modern statesmanship which bids fair to dwarf the work of diplomatists in the old world. New nations and mighty forces are being developed; the growth of the Dominion of Canada and of Australia is of more importance than diplomatic debates as to whether a rock in the Mediterranean or a valley in Thessaly is to be governed by Turkey or by Greece.

Among these governors few have been more remarkable than Sir George Bowen, who has had, according to the late Mr. W. E. Forster, "an unmatched experience" during nearly thirty years of employment in some of the chief colonies. His career is described in these pages. They are, for the most part, composed of his speeches and of addresses presented to him, from which his work can be appreciated. We may remark that but little of these volumes is to be attributed to the editor. Even the prefatory memoir and the few passages which serve to connect the State Papers bear traces of the general tone of Sir George Bowen's writing. His earliest experience in ruling men was in Queensland, of which he was the first governor. Not much difficulty presented itself; his task was to inaugurate free institutions, in which he was ably assisted by Sir Robert Herbert, who accompanied him as Colonial Secretary, and who, as all acquainted with Queensland know, was quite conspicuous amongst the inexperienced colonists. Probably that pre-eminence would have been maintained until the present day had not private affairs necessitated a return to this country, where his colonial knowledge has contributed to his subsequent advancement. We are inclined to award more praise to Sir George Bowen's administration in New Zealand than to any other portion of his life. More real difficulty existed, and higher statesmanship was here required. His success was marked. The far-sighted measures then adopted laid the foundations of a permanent settlement of native questions which had caused a ruinous war for ten preceding years.

From New Zealand he was promoted to the "blue ribbon" of the colonial service, the government of Victoria, where he arrived just in time to encounter a political "typhoon" which had been brewing for years under his predecessor Lord Canterbury. Those who were intimately acquainted with the complications in which the colony was involved know that his policy was severely criticized by the "classes," while it was supported by the "masses." That there was some ground for this diversity of opinion is apparent from his own statement that in reality, in his own mind, he disapproved of some of the acts of his constitutional advisers, whose policy he nevertheless felt bound to support, and thus to appear to an ill-informed public as the abettor of measures which he felt to be blameworthy. In the protracted conflict between the Upper and Lower Houses of the Legislature he was, in truth, powerless, and, as far as we can judge, he had no alternative but to follow implicitly the advice of the only ministry possible in the existing state of public feeling. Those who are inclined to follow up the subject will find the case for the Upper House fully stated in Mr. Rusden's 'History.' Mr. Rusden was an official of that body and a partisan of their pretensions—a fact which should be kept in mind by his readers. The Governor's conduct was, on the whole, supported in Downing Street. The mild observations of Sir M. Hicks-Beach do not appear to us to justify the soreness manifested in these pages. In the Mauritius, to which Sir George passed from Victoria, little scope existed for the display of much talent; and at Hong Kong—of which place, as well as of China and Japan, interesting accounts are given—his chief merit consisted in keeping England out of any quarrel during the imbroglio which occurred between France and China relative to Tong King.

While the State Papers are composed with the dignity suited to their character, and the addresses are couched in the usual fulsome terms, the prefatory memoir is written in a light, agreeable, and sometimes playful style. It is replete with anecdotes and wit derived from Popes, Premiers, bishops, judges—from Americans, Mormons, Chinese, and other sources. Mots of Lord Palmerston's are mingled with words of wisdom from Li Hung-chang. We have only space for two anecdotes as specimens of dozens of others:—

"On crossing the Potomac, a question was raised about the story related in some of the popular biographies of Washington, viz., that he was so strong that he could throw a dollar across the Potomac, which is there far wider than the Thames at Westminster; for legends had already grown up about him as if he had been an early Christian saint. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, on his tour in America some years later, was escorted to Mt. Vernon by the Attorney-General of the United States, who, when asked if this legend was true, replied: 'Well, my Lord, if you have read that story, I suppose it must have some foundation. At all events, it is not for me to belittle the father of my country; but your Lordship will please to recollect that a hundred years ago the dollar went much further than it goes now!'"

Being a good linguist, Sir G. Bowen charmed the French at Mauritius by addressing them in their own tongue. He relates an

"amusing contretemps which took place here in consequence of a former Governor being quite ignorant of French. At the farewell dinner given to him, a French colonist made a long speech against Downing Street, i. e., the Colonial Office and Sir Hitch Bitch, as French tongues pronounce the very Anglo-Saxon name of Sir M. Hicks-Beach, when the Governor, seeing all around him cheering and thumping the table, lustily cheered and thumped too, little imagining that he was applauding invective against his own political chef."

Alike to those who read for amusement and to those who look for information this book may be recommended. It deals with matters upon which Englishmen, as a rule, are still ignorant, although less so than were their fathers.

The Manx Witch, and other Poems. By T. E. Brown. (Macmillan & Co.)

We know not if among the establishment of the Crown in the kingdom of Man there is a place for a Laureate; but if there be, Mr. Brown ought surely to fill it. Whether he is by birth a Manxman or not—a point on which we are also ignorant—he certainly appears to have entered thoroughly into the minds of that curious half-Celtic, half-Scandinavian race, who seem, but for a thin veneer of Christianity, to be in point of morals and civilization very much where their forefathers were a thousand years ago. Our old acquaintance Tom Baynes, who is again the usual narrator, has been somewhat polished by his seafaring life—he has learnt something of the customs of the nineteenth century world; but when the demon of jealousy seizes on his friends Jack and Harry the miners, they fight it out in "holmgang," just like any Baresarks of old. The field of battle is the mountain side, close to a disused working, and Tom, returning from a wedding feast, comes upon them:—

The sun was set
And the moon was rose, but hiding yet
Aback of Slieu Lhean that was throwin a shaddhar
Terble black below me. The Laddhar
They're callin that slope. And I had to steer Middlin careful, you know, to clear
The Dragon's den. So—no humbuggin!
I thought I heard a desperd tuggin,
No thrashin, no smashin, no click o' the clogs,
No trampin like bulls, no raggin like dogs,
But ugh-ugh-ugh, like the chaps is going When they're working a blast-hole—it's lekly you're knowin.

I crep a bit nearer, and seen
There was two of them arrit; and nearer I crep—
Harry! Jack!

Aw, at them I lep,
At them! on them! "Divils! divils!
What's this? What's this?" But they turned like swivels,
And the bank was givin way, and the muck
Rattlin down, the way it's shook
On a coffin at a funeral—
And the two of them twisted like a ball—
Couldn get them out of grips,
Couldn—and Jack to stagger, and slips,
The mouth of the pit.

However, Tom intervenes at this point, and gets the combatants to hear reason:—

"And now be quick And on with your clothes!" For the chaps was bare

To the very buff—aw deed they were!
And the moonlight shining on their skin—
These naked divils—astonishin!
"On with your boots and your clothes!" Aw,
the one of them
Wouldn resist! aw, I took the command of them
Fuss-rate, I tell ye, uncommon though!
They were both that wake and 'austed, ye know;
And had to give in.

'The Manx Witch,' in which this pleasing episode, of which we have only quoted a very small portion, occurs, is the longest piece in the book. Tom Baynes gives another passage from his own reminiscences; then we have two more Manx pieces in irregular metre, a kind of rhyming prose indeed; and, finally, "the Curate" and "the Pazon" have their say, the former in rhymed couplets, the latter in blank verse more or less Tennysonian. Both their stories turn on the old theme of a woman's misplaced confidence and a man's selfish passion. Mr. Brown is not, perhaps, a great poet, but he is "a scholar and a gentleman," with a shrewd eye for certain quaint aspects of human nature, and his writing is according.

A History of Modern Europe. By C. A. Fyffe, M.A.—Vol. III. From 1848 to 1878. (Cassell & Co.)

WHEN we reviewed the second volume of Mr. Fyffe's 'History' we were able to congratulate him upon an improvement in his work so far as concerned those chapters with which he seemed to have taken the most trouble, and the third volume comes up to the level of the best parts of the second. Mr. Fyffe now deals with the Revolution of 1848, the establishment of the Second Empire in France, the Crimean War, the creation of the Italian kingdom, the rise of Prussia to ascendancy in Germany, the war between France and Germany, the war between Russia and Turkey, and the Treaty of Berlin. The most interesting portion of the present volume is, in our opinion, that which relates to the origin, and the circumstances which surrounded the outbreak, of the war of 1870. While Mr. Fyffe departs widely from what has hitherto been in this country the accepted view of the facts, we feel confident that the opinion which he has formed is that which, when many years have passed, will be found to be the true one. Mr. Fyffe is a little reticent in this portion of his work, and rather suggests than states his conclusions. He does not explicitly declare that the Hohenzollern candidature was intended, by at least some Prussians who had a hand in it, to bring about a war for which they thought France ill prepared; but his paragraph upon the subject leads, if not to this conclusion, at least to the choice of this hypothesis as the most probable. Again, Mr. Fyffe is not quite clear as to what in his marginal note he calls "the telegram from Ems, July 13," which in his text he significantly styles "the alleged telegram from Ems." While he has written of the "insane ardour" with which some of those about the Emperor of the French pressed for war against the opinion of the Prime Minister, M. Émile Ollivier, our author shows, on the other hand, how completely in so doing they played into the hands of the war party which existed in North Germany:—

"Count Bismarck was determined not to let the French escape lightly from the quarrel. He had to do with an enemy who by his own folly had come to the brink of an aggressive war, and, far from facilitating his retreat, it was Bismarck's policy to lure him over the precipice. Not many hours after the last message had passed between King William and Benedetti, a telegram was officially published at Berlin, stating, in terms so brief as to convey the impression of an actual insult, that the King had refused to see the French Ambassador, and had informed him by an aide-de-camp that he had nothing more to communicate to him. This telegram was sent to the representatives of Prussia at most of the European Courts, and to its agents in every German capital. Narratives instantly gained currency, and were not contradicted by the Prussian Government, that Benedetti had forced himself upon the King on the promenade at Ems, and that in the presence of a large company the King had turned his back upon the Ambassador."

As this "alleged telegram" undoubtedly made war certain, and as the result of that war—the annexation of Alsace by Germany—is the direct cause of the present armaments of Europe, it may be said that the history of the old world since 1870, and on, probably, far into the next century, turns upon this momentous document. We believe that when the memoirs of those in North Germany concerned in the transactions of the time see the light, it will be found that a small internal council of Prussians, of whom Count von Moltke was one, cut down the telegram of the King of Prussia in such a way as to completely change its sense. That which had been a long telegram meaning peace became a short telegram breathing war; and it is to this fact that Mr. Fyffe no doubt points by his use of the words "alleged telegram." The interview which the King of Prussia related had been a peaceful and a courteous interview, intended upon both sides to lead to appeasement of the dispute. The document which was published described to Germans an insult by France to their revered old king, and to the French an insult by the king to their ambassador. In the condition of patriotic fervour in which the German army then found itself, and in the state of wild excitement which prevailed in Paris, it was impossible to expect that explanations sufficient to prevent war could after this be given. There weighed, doubtless, with the German generals who took upon themselves to alter the king's telegram the considerations that the war could not be permanently prevented; that if made at once it would be made under conditions which gave Germany great chances of success; that if it were postponed, the French reserves would be converted into serviceable troops, and the success of Germany become problematical. Of the intention of Bavaria and all the German states to stand by Prussia they had no doubt; but the King of Italy was known to be personally friendly to the Emperor of the French, and anxious to take the field upon his side if Rome could be obtained; while Austria was bound to France by promises which as it was she broke, but which a few months later, after France had made sufficient sacrifices to be able to place in line her second army, she would have kept. It will be difficult for history to blame the German military authorities for having at this moment made war certain; but the fact remains that save for their interposition during the king's absence from Berlin war would, for a time at least, have been avoided. Mr. Fyffe appears to us to be inclined to somewhat minimize the promises of Austria, and, as the most important of these promises were verbal, it is difficult to convict Count Beust of positive untruth; but on former occasions in these columns we have pointed out that those Austrian despatches published by M. de Gramont, which cannot be disavowed, themselves admit that the promises were clear; and Frenchmen of perfect truthfulness, whose later political position renders them fairly impartial upon the point, and who have related the arrangements made in Paris by the Archduke Albert for military co-operation between France and Austria, confirm our opinion as to the duplicity of Austria, provoked by the military hesitations of France during the last days of July, 1870.

Mr. Fyffe's work bears to some extent the impress of his Liberal opinions, and may here and there be found distasteful by strong Conservatives; but on the whole it is an excellent book, and whatever may have been the weak points of his first volume and of portions of his second, such defects are little observable in the third. We notice a few peculiarities of style and in the treatment of names, and Marshal MacMahon is hardly to be recognized as "McMahon." Mr. Fyffe, who is, we believe, a good German scholar, has, no doubt, authority for speaking of the Bavarian general as "Tann"; but we imagine that modern German usage allows him to be called by that more familiar name of von der Tann by which he is known in England, and, what is more important, by which he was always called in the German army during the war itself. If a shorter form is to be defended upon the ground that we say Turenne, Talleyrand, and Bismarck, more commonly than de Turenne, de Talleyrand, and von Bismarck, we can only plead in reply that the cases are not the same.

INVERTING the Roman marriage formula "Ubi tu Caius, ego Caia," and putting for a motto on his title-page "Si tu Caia, ego Caius," Mr. Blackmore well indicates the nature of his romance of 'Kit and Kitty' and its suitability to the modern demands in a love story. Women are the readers of novels, and they like best to read of the enslavement of man. But for all that 'Kit and Kitty' is a manly book, with a sort of fine, open delicacy of sentiment, thoroughly wholesome and pleasing. The book is rather long for the taste of the moment; but it is well supplied with varied and exciting incidents, and few recent novels have maintained so high a standard of excellence throughout. Mr. Blackmore's style is his own; its simplicity has undoubtedly the charm of contrast with that of the American school which has influenced English novelists; there is no philosophical analysis in Mr. Blackmore's work, and no attempt at cunning phrases to convey the complexity of character. His diction has an air of being out of date; the time of the story is about 1860, and yet one is constantly fancying that it is really meant for an earlier century. As is usual in Mr. Blackmore's novels, there is a good deal about market-gardening in 'Kit and Kitty,' but the author has set a watch over himself, and has not allowed his favourite subject to run away with him. Kept within bounds it makes a very picturesque setting for a charming story.

Full of stir, adventure, human shocks and shocking crimes, 'The Bull i' th' Thorn' is sure to satisfy the craving of many novel-readers for strong meat of that description. There is no necessity to hint at the plot of the story, which is intricate and somewhat ingenious. Mr. Cushing dedicates it to his son, and this may be taken as a recommendation to young people generally. No harm will be done by recommending those of them who have acquired a taste for adventure stories to read 'The Bull i' th' Thorn,' though it must be confessed that Mr. Cushing's descriptions are sometimes uncomfortably true to the darker sides of human nature.

Mrs. Worthey's introduction is written in as exalted a vein as her story, and does not introduce anything in particular. No introduction, however, is needed, for one sees at once that the author is bent on telling the story of her life, up to her marriage, from an educational point of view. For the most part, and from that point of view, she tells it well. The cramped childhood of the heroine, the generous impulses and unsatisfied cravings of girlhood, the wholesome stimulus of Prof. Maurice and "the Dean" at Queen's College, the train of expanding thought which leads her inquiring mind to the level of intellectual womanhood, are recorded with the simple, however crude, earnestness of a straightforward mind. It need hardly be added that the narrative is stilted, especially in the parts which deal with books and mental evolutions. Rendered hardy by religious doubt, and very didactic by limited reading, the heroine plants a firm foot, as she fondly imagines, on the platform of the Church of Humanity. If this brings peace to her soul, it makes her ten times more didactic than ever, and the story ends with an extraordinary gush of prophetic benedictions. "Laura Bell" is fortunately still young, and may live to make a stepping-stone even of her present giddy eminence. Meanwhile 'The New Continent' is an honest effort at autobiography, and, as such, cannot fail to have an interest for many readers.

'Cast Out' is a cloudy sort of business, best described negatively, perhaps, as having not "come off." One does not, of course, divine what effect the author wished to produce, but one feels he had a notion of doing something more than appears. There are occasional forecasts, not exactly of better things, but of excitement of some kind—lunacy, crime, &c. Nothing comes of it, however, save a general vagueness and a few distinct instances of bad grammar.

Those who are not completely weary of fictitious travel, and of the devices of the arm-chair traveller to give an air of integrity to his account of adventures of the Munchausen type, will possibly be interested in the narrative of Hans Christian Feldje, mate, a Swedish sailor who deserts his ship to join an inland expedition to the eastern parts of Ecuador in search of a valley of gold. The description of South American scenery is good, though some phrases like "the animal world" come in with rather tedious repetition. There is a comic Irishman who is dreary, but who has the good fortune to marry the heroine (strangely called Nausiscea), and a Scotchman who goes mad and nearly exterminates the party of explorers at the moment of success. The book is probably written for boys, and in that aspect may deserve reading.

If ushers at private schools have to deal with such "principals" as are described in Mr. Jones's melancholy biography, their lot is not a happy one; and if principals often get hold of so slippery an adventurer as Mr. Richard Jones, they are much to be pitied. There is no merit in the book—indeed, it is extremely dull, except the naïve exposure of Mr. R. Jones himself as a liar, a mutineer, a humbug, and almost a thief. If the classic ditty sung to Mr. Jones by the pupils on the last day of the term was ever justified in its rather crude generalizations, this Welshman does his best to justify it. We are sorry for the little shepherdess from Radnorshire who is about to marry him, but probably she makes allowance for a margin of dishonesty, and thinks his conduct no more strange than apparently does the author who describes it.

Mr. Henry Murray is founding himself upon his brother's model. In 'A Game of Bluff' he essays an independent flight after the trial course of 'A Dangerous Catpaw,' and the result is a story of plot and incident, of human contrasts, subtle motives, and ingeniously contrived effects, such as might have been expected in the circumstances. The narrative turns on the doings of a weak-minded spendthrift, who robs his benefactor and makes love to two women, until he has piled up an enormous heap of trouble for half a dozen of his fellow creatures. The whole story is not much more than a sketch, but it is a sketch with plenty of promise in it.

It is rare to find a collection of really good short stories; but Miss Mabel Wotton's volume entitled 'A Pretty Radical' is very well worth reading. The tales vary in kind—some are amusing, some are pathetic; all are well told. Miss Wotton has a grace of style and a lightness of touch which are altogether pleasant.

It was hardly necessary for Mr. Macdonald to state that 'A Life's Retribution' was his first printed attempt at novel-writing. That fact, without his candid declaration, would speedily have impressed itself on the mind of the least observant critic. 'A Life's Retribution' is a book in ten thousand for childish crudity of conception and angularity of workmanship. It is more like a scenario than anything else—outlines of a plot, fragments of conversation, and hints at incident. Some of Mr. Macdonald's touches are graphic in the extreme, as, for example, when he tells us that his hero's "dark blue eyes were often so bloodshot from over-use that it was impossible to tell what colour they really were." The ineptitude of the text is equalled by that displayed in the choice of names, of which Tosh and De Ulloa may serve as specimens. It would be gross and fulsome flattery to Mr. Macdonald to tell him that he has a single one of the qualities which go to the making of a readable story, to judge by his maiden effort.

The author of 'Love and Disbelief,' to cite the opening words of his preface, "has for some years been viewing from a somewhat advantageous standpoint the mustering of the forces for and against the truth of Christianity." Thus equipped, Mr. Cleland had "meditated giving to the world some dissertations," in order to reconcile "budding scientists" and "fossil religionists"; but he thought better or worse of it, and determined to "launch a religious novel." At any rate, this is fair and candid warning; and, after all, the story is more appetizing than the preface. It passes mainly in South London, and vaunts the glories of the School Board. Stiff, and somewhat too didactic, it is fairly free from prejudice, and by no means devoid of interest for the average novel-reader.

'A Loyal Mind' will surely strike readers of Mrs. Price's former novels as unlike them in tone, crude and unformed, and wanting in lightness of touch. 'Mexico,' 'Alexia,' and 'Red Towers' we remember with a certain pleasure which 'A Loyal Mind' does not awaken. It seems to us without form and void, overcrowded, too, and wearisome. Though there are touches of nature in some of the people, especially the disagreeable ones, neither sympathy nor admiration is evoked by the principal situation, which hangs on the heroine's misdirected notions of loyalty and honour. One feels at once that, without sacrificing the girl whose foolish conduct she wishes to screen, she might easily have saved herself and other people (notably the reader) a vast amount of bother. Just a grain or two of common sense would have done it; but that is just the quality heroines lack, and its absence in the present story so provokes one that "a right judgment" on the rest of it is not very easily given.

'Dorothy Arden' is a story of the Huguenot persecutions in France and of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion in England. Without any striking excellences it is a pretty tale prettily told.

PHILOLOGICAL BOOKS.

MR. JAMES MOIR'S edition of "Blind Harry's" Wallace, the third and concluding part of which has just been issued by the Scottish Text Society, is on the whole a meritorious, though a somewhat amateurish piece of work. The editor claims to have corrected Jamieson's text from the MS. in some hundreds of places, and he has added in foot-notes all the important variant readings of the early printed editions. The introduction contains a good account of the bibliography of the poem, and a discussion of its value as an historical authority. Apparently Mr. Moir on undertaking his task had a strong prepossession in favour of the veracity of "Blind Harry's" narrative; but he has had the good sense to yield to the overwhelming weight of evidence. The glossary is copious, and has been carefully prepared; unfortunately, however, the editor has ventured freely, without adequate knowledge, on the dangerous ground of etymological speculation. The following are only a few of the glaring errors by which the work is disfigured. Bane, explained as "ready," is said to be "for boun, with the usual Sc. change of ou into ā"; no such change ever occurs. The word is from the Old Norse beinn. Crag, neck, is referred to "O.E. hrāca [sic], the throat" (with which it is wholly unconnected), and it is added that "the connection between crag, neck, and crag, a rock, is similar to that between L. collum and collis." So it is, in one sense: the "connection" in each case consists merely in an accidental resemblance in sound. Donk, dank, is "compared" with Icel. dōgg, dew; forstame, prow, with Icel. for-stióri, fore-steerer; and egart, pride, with German hoffart. The well-known les, falsehood, is supposed to be a plural substantive="lies." For the etymon of revellingis, a sort of shoes, Mr. Moir suggests the Icel. rifa, to sew loosely together. The Old Norse form kriflingr shows that the word has lost an initial h; some modern philologists have rather adventurously regarded it as the Teutonic equivalent of κρυπίς. Sa, say, a bucket, is imagined to be from the French seau; really it is the O.N. sár. The suffix in terandry, Mr. Moir thinks, is the Old English -ric. Wannestor, really the same word as garniture, is treated as a compound of "O.E. werian, to protect, and store as in Eng." Prof. Skeat has somewhere spoken of a current notion that any man who knows Latin and Greek is "a scholar," and as such entitled to pronounce judgment on questions of English etymology.

Mr. Moir seems to be a victim of this delusion. The identification of the proper names appears generally to be correct; but Ramsraith in Richmondshire is probably Kirby Ravensworth—certainly not, as Mr. Moir suggests, Ravenstone-dale, which is in Westmoreland.

Early Scottish Metrical Tales. Edited, with Introductions, by David Laing. New Edition. (Hamilton, Adams & Co.)—The original edition of this interesting collection was published in 1826, and consisted of only 175 copies. It contained 'The History of Sir Gray-steel,' a version of the well-known romance of 'Eger and Gryme'; the 'Tales of the Three Priests of Peebles'; and a number of shorter pieces, amongst which is the pretty poem of 'The Mourning Maiden,' from the Maitland MS. The book has long been extremely scarce, and this new edition, though not professing to be anything more than a faithful reprint of the original, will be cordially welcomed by students of early Scottish poetry.

The Heimskringla; or, the Sagas of the Norse Kings. From the Icelandic of Snorre Sturlason by Samuel Laing, Esq. Second Edition. Revised, with Notes, by Rasmus B. Anderson. 4 vols. (Nimmo).—Mr. Laing's translation of the 'Heimskringla,' published in 1844, was a work of remarkable merit. Although the translator's knowledge of Icelandic was confessedly not profound, his native sagacity enabled him, with the aid of the Swedish and Danish versions, to give a rendering of the original which, if the poetical quotations be left out of account, may be regarded as substantially correct; and his introduction and notes, though, of course, embodying many speculations which are now obsolete, are still to a great extent worth reading. If a new translation were now to be made by a competent scholar it would no doubt be more accurate in points of detail, but it is by no means a matter of course that it would better represent the manner of the original. If such a work should be undertaken it is to be hoped that the translator will not follow the method adopted (with brilliant literary skill, we confess) by Sir George Dasent, of rendering the Icelandic words largely by their etymological equivalents. This mode of translation may not be unsuitable in the case of some of the saga-writers, but would be extremely inappropriate in the case of Snorre, who is decidedly the reverse of "quaint." The new edition of Mr. Laing's work contained in these handsome volumes differs from the edition of 1844 in the following respects: a few passages have been cancelled and others added, so as to bring the translation into agreement with the text of Unger's edition; many of Mr. Laing's notes have been omitted as irrelevant or misleading, and additional notes have been inserted; the spelling of proper names has been revised throughout; the list of the sagas, given in the introduction, has been corrected and completed; and two maps and a copious index have been added. On the whole, Mr. Anderson seems to have performed his editorial work with sound judgment, though many of Mr. Laing's notes that have been allowed to remain contain statements that need correction, and in some instances the editor's own remarks appear to be inaccurate. The reid in Reidgotaland cannot mean "waggon or chariot"; and although it may be true that "some authorities" identify the country so named with the island Gotland, the assumption is even more improbable than the older view that Jutland is meant. The saga-writers evidently knew the name only by tradition, and their conflicting indications of locality cannot be reconciled; but there seems to be reason for believing that the country originally designated was the Gothic territory on the Vistula. The index, we are glad to observe, gives the correct Icelandic forms of the proper names, as well as the Anglicized forms that appear in the text. There are one or two unfortunate omissions: the interesting reference to Whitby, for example, ought surely to have been indexed; the Ouse appears only as Uta. A few rather glaring misprints—such as “Hemiskringla Biography” for Heimskringla Bibliography, in the table of contents—show some want of due care in the proof-reading. On the whole, however, this reissue is decidedly preferable to the original edition, which is now only to be procured at an extravagant price.

Hue de Rotelande's Ipomedon: ein Französischer Abenteuerroman des 12. Jahrhunderts. Zum ersten Male herausgegeben von E. Kölbing und E. Koschwitz. (Breslau, Koebner.)—This edition of the French original of ‘Ipomedon’ has been prepared as an appendix to Prof. Kölbing's excellent edition of the English versions (already noticed in the Athenæum), and the editors seem to have been anxious that it should not exceed the moderate dimensions suitable to an appendix. Those to whom the French poem is the object of study for its own sake will, consequently, find the editing rather inadequate. The introduction occupies only ten pages, and the notes less than five. Mr. Ward's admirable discussion of the indications relating to the personality of the author is referred to, but its results are very imperfectly summarized. This is to be regretted, as the British Museum ‘Catalogue of Romances’ is not a book which can be supposed to be in the hands of every student. With regard to the name Roteland, Prof. Kölbing considers the identification with Rutland to be out of the question, quoting Mr. Ward's remark that it was not usual for private persons to name themselves after counties. We do not see that this absolutely decides the question; the designation “Hugh of Rutland” (which is not, strictly speaking, a name) does not seem more unlikely than “Hugh of Hungary” or “Thomas of London.” On the other hand, we doubt whether sufficient importance has been attached to the fact that the Egerton MS. in two places calls the author “Hue de Clivelande.” The present editors do not refer to this point at all; Mr. Ward considers that the scribe John of Dorking inadvertently substituted one name for the other. This does not appear very probable, and it may, perhaps, be worth while to point out that there is a Rudland in or on the borders of the present district of Cleveland. If Hugh came from this Rudland, he may very well have been known by both designations. Dr. Koschwitz points out in his notes that the rhymes show that Hugh's French had certain phonetic peculiarities which, according to Behrens, are distinctive of writers belonging to the north of England. He gives this as an argument in favour of Hugh being a native of Rhuddlan in Flintshire; but, of course, it would tell much more strongly in favour of our suggestion. The editors have very properly abstained from attempting to construct a critical text, as the materials are really insufficient for the purpose. The text of the Cotton MS. is printed in full, obvious errors only being corrected; the variant readings of the two other MSS. are given in foot-notes. There is an exhaustive index of proper names, but no glossary. The poem itself has considerable merit, and is marked by a sprightly humour which is only imperfectly represented in the English versions.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

In his Idylls of a Lost Village (Macmillan & Co.) Mr. John A. Bridges has filled upwards of 250 closely printed pages with short essays about nothing at all—a formidable dish to set before even that omnivorous devourer the general public. The art of writing charmingly about nothing is unfortunately a rare one in this country; as a rule, our modern efforts in that direction too often resemble in consistency the fossilized object which many a British cook is pleased to call a soufflé. Mr. Bridges's literary soufflé, to pursue the culinary metaphor, is not exactly a failure, nor can it be called a success; it is undeniably heavy, the papers are too much alike, and there are too many of them. The subject-matter could scarcely be made amusing or imaginatively suggestive for more than a few pages if manipulated with the lightest touch and by the most delicate and subtle fancy. The slow disappearance of a rustic village and its setting before the encroachments of a metropolitan suburb, with its villas, unlovely rows of formal houses, and their enterprising inhabitants, is not a subject upon which the imagination would choose to linger long. The portraits of the village worthies who drag on existence amidst such inharmonious new surroundings are more suggestive; yet even these are somewhat lacking in that light but firm brilliancy of touch which distinguishes the achievements of many French writers in this most elusive and fascinating branch of literary effort. “Topsy,” “Old Barton,” the aged couple in ‘A Rustic Throne,’ and all their fellows are pleasing enough; yet they strike the reader as too laborious and literal transcripts from life—they require more atmosphere, a more playful fancy, a lighter vehicle, to become general favourites. The purely landscape studies are fresh and breezy, and show that unflinching delight in minutest observation of nature to which we, in this generation of city-dwellers, are turning again for refreshment to our souls. The value of Mr. Bridges's conscientious workmanship is fully felt in his English, which is always pure, never slipshod, and never tainted by the corroding hurry of journalism, although most of these papers made their first appearance in a daily newspaper. Interspersed singly as a relief from the clash of news and of party politics in the St. James's Gazette their full value was felt and appreciated. They have suffered from accumulation; they are not adapted to their present form of a book. Nevertheless, there is much merit to be found in them, and all that remains is to wish Mr. Bridges a speedy reappearance with a more promising subject.

An Arcadian Summer: the Impressions of an Impressionist, transcribed by “Shirley” (Edinburgh, privately printed), is admirable fooling. How far Mr. Pennell's journey may have suggested this effusion we know not, but our author hits “pretty generally all round” in a good-natured way. It is happy to make the chief (of course there is a chief), when he has crushed the professor with a thump on the back, say, “You will take a glass of Talisker—it is not bad, though Long Shon is petter”; and to add in a note, “I never heard a Highland gentleman speak his tongue as Mr. What's-his-name writes it: but he knows best, no doubt: so I bow to his authority.” Happy, too, is Dobbs on Stubbs and the Pathetic Fallacy, and on the “Muck of Stubbs”—the island of the inspired painter's poetic vision! Happy, again, are the parson's stories. “What did God make people for?” the smallest of two theologians inquired. “God made people to be good,” his six-year-old brother replied authoritatively; “but he knewed they wouldn't be.” Altogether, Dobbs is much improved by all he hears and sees, though he finds “there is no opening for any really urbane criticism in a society which has been demoralized by the cruel frankness of Prof. Huxley, and the indelicate incisiveness of Mr. Arthur Balfour.” The episode of Polly gives the necessary feminine element to the humour of this little book, which is an enjoyable trifle.

FROM Mr. Elliot Stock there comes to us a book which, under the title of India, contains some sketches of native life by the Rev. J. Ewen, apparently a clergyman at Benares. Mr. Ewen is fair in his view of the Government on the one hand, and the position of the natives on the other; and his volume contains some of the best specimens of doubtful English composition that have ever been printed, such as this from the manager of an ice company, “This ice is only our first trial trip, so it is not to perfection”; or this, as a signboard giving the name of a trade, “Bkx Mkr.” This, addressed to the charitable, is not bad: “He is in a strange country, with his four brothers and five sisters, without money. His sisters have no tongues nor feet; the brothers have no eyes nor hands; and the poor petitioner, who has no tongue and cannot speak, is starving.” An enterprising showman at present in London would probably have kept this remarkable family from starving had he known of its existence. Mr. Ewen, like most of his cloth, is a little unfair to the Mohammedans, and were Mohammedanism only that which he represents it to be in the early pages of his book it would be impossible to account for its daily increasing numbers and power in the world. The conquest, virtually, of all Africa, and the conversion of all the Archipelago and of half China, would indeed be singular successes for a creed so utterly decayed.

ANOTHER work on India is A Short History of British India, by Mr. Carlos, of Trinity College, Cambridge, published by Messrs. Clay & Sons in the “Pitt Press Series.” The little history is excellent so far as it goes, but presents no picture of India of our own day, for there is hardly a word in it to show that it is a recent book, published since 1878, except the bare mention of the names of the last three viceroys.

A BOOK of travel of nearly six hundred large and closely-printed pages is an unusual production of the press, and A Race with the Sun, by Mr. Carter Harrison, published by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, is one of the biggest works of the kind that it has been our lot to come across. It describes a sixteen months' tour from Chicago through Manitoba and British Columbia, Oregon and Washington States, Japan, the China coast, Siam, the coast of Burma, India, Ceylon, Egypt, Greece, Turkey, Roumania, the Caucasus, and other parts of Europe, and back to the United States, and is of very various degrees of merit. On the one hand the book is too confused and written in too loose a style, as well as too long and too closely printed, for many persons, who are not forced to do so by duty, to read it through. But, on the other hand, it contains a good deal of observation of an interesting, and some of an amusing kind, and will be found a pleasant volume to dip into. The author, who is known from having been a power in the State of Illinois when the Chicago anarchists were hanged, is thoroughly and characteristically American. In fact, he may be called a representative American, and his observations on the strong points and the weak points of British rule in India and Ceylon are well worthy of attention in this country. Mr. Harrison differs from many Americans in being a sympathizer rather with Great Britain than with Russia, and his book gives us the impression that he is a shrewd as well as a kindly critic. There is a little of what may be called “fine writing” here and there; but, on the whole, the pictures presented of the countries traversed are highly creditable to the author, and the mistakes of fact do not seem so numerous as might be expected in an account of so rapid a grand tour.

THE Law Quarterly Review begins the new year with an unusually attractive number. It contains, besides ‘Reviews and Notices,’ ‘Notes,’ &c., and several short articles, a very able paper by Mr. Albert V. Dicey on ‘International Law as a Branch of the Law of England’; a paper by Mr. F. W. Maitland on ‘Remainders after Conditional Fees,’ a subject of interest doubtless to persons versed in feudal law; a paper by Mr. W. F. Craies on ‘The Right of Aliens to enter British Territory,’ showing much learning and research; and a paper of considerable practical utility on the Trustee Act, 1888. Among the shorter articles there is a very short, but highly interesting one on ‘A Modern Hindu Code,’ by Sir A. C. Lyall. The ‘Code’ is the Indore Penal Code, passed by the Maharajah Holkar for his state in Central

India, and it is, we are informed, the work of a native minister of justice. It is "an adjustment of the Indian Penal Code to the conditions and prejudices of native government and society." Like that code, it contains rules, definitions, and explanations, accompanied by hypothetical cases as "illustrations." Some of the latter strike one as being curious as well as somewhat vague. As illustrations of "abatement" we have the following: (1) "A wished to starve B. C, B's cook, omitted to cook B's breakfast. C has abetted the starving of B." (2) "A wished to have a glass of brandy. B gave him a rupee to purchase brandy. B has abetted A to have a glass of brandy." As an illustration of the crime of murder we have the following: "a peon (A) stationed at the crossing of roads to warn people against taking one road which is infested by a man-eating tiger. The peon omits to warn B, knowing that he may be killed, though not intending to cause his death. B is devoured by the tiger. A is guilty of murder." (It is to be hoped that this is not the law in British India.) The code appears to have been in force for some years in the state of Indore, and one cannot help regretting that the paper in question gives no information as to its working, or as to its popularity, or the reverse, with the people of that country.

A NUMBER of books of reference are on our table, the titles of which pretty closely indicate their objects. The Dairy Annual of Mr. Long, and The Poultry and Pigeon Annual of the same compiler, both published by Messrs. Allen & Co., seem to be well arranged, and contain much useful information.—The Dog Owners' Annual (Dean & Son) is also a new venture. It includes articles by Mr. Millais and other dog fanciers.—The Insurance Year-Book (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.), on the other hand, has reached its fifth year. It has been improved in some respects.—One of the best-known of books of reference, Who's Who, has passed into the hands of Messrs. Simpkin, and appears for the forty-second time.

WE have the catalogues of several booksellers on our table, to wit, Mrs. Bennett, Messrs. Dulau (chemistry and physics), Messrs. Garratt & Co, Mr. Gray (topography), Mr. Irvine, Messrs. Jarvis & Son (two catalogues, one of them rather interesting), Messrs. Rimell (good), and Mr. Stibbs. Mr. Downing, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Thistlewood, and Mr. Wilson of Birmingham, Mr. Jefferies of Bristol (rather good), Mr. Murray of Derby, Mr. Johnston of Edinburgh (rather good), Messrs. Young & Sons of Liverpool (fairly good), Mr. Sutton of Manchester, and Mr. Ward of Richmond, Surrey (engravings), have also forwarded their catalogues.

OUR readers may remember Mr. Madan's letters in this journal discussing the bibliography of Bradshaw's Railway Guide. They excited much interest, and Messrs. Bradshaw have had the happy thought to produce facsimiles of the tiny guides for "10th Mo." 1839 and "1st Mo." 1840. They are great curiosities, all the more so from the contrast they present to the Bradshaw of the present day.

WE have on our table John Bright, by the Rev. Charles Bullock ('Home Words' Office),—The Age of Marie Antoinette, by C. N. Scott (Field & Tuer),—Egypt as a Winter Resort, by F. M. Sandwith (Kegan Paul),—Essays on Government, by A. L. Lowell (Boston, U.S., Houghton),—The Town Dweller, his Needs and Wants, by J. M. Fothergill (Lewis),—Index of the Genera and Species of Mollusca in the Indian Museum, by W. Theobald, Parts I. and II. (Calcutta, Indian Museum),—Weather Wisdom from January to December, compiled by W. Allan (Field & Tuer),—Notes from Mendelssohn, by L. K. Harlow (Boston, U.S., Prang),—The Story of Music, by W. J. Henderson (Longmans),—The Boy's Book of British Battles, by R. Simpkin (Routledge),—The Baby's Museum, by Uncle Charlie (Griffith & Farran),—The Young Castaways, by Lady Florence Dixie (Shaw & Co.),— Smitten and Slain, by A. V. V. (Nelson & Sons),—Miss Brown's Basket, by Mrs. H. Charles (Nisbet),—Dead! by the Hand of May Ostlere (Trischler),—A Silent Combat, by M. Farrant (Sonnenschein),—Home Words for Heart and Hearth, Vol. for 1889 ('Home Words' Office),—Auld Scots Ballads, edited by R. Ford (Gardner),—An Introduction to the Study of Shakespeare, by H. Corson, LL.D. (Boston, U.S., Heath),—A Doubter's Doubts about Science and Religion, by a Criminal Lawyer (Kegan Paul),—and The Works and Days of Moses, by Sir Philip Perring, Bart. (Longmans). Among New Editions we have German Conversation Grammar, by E. Otto, revised by F. Lange (Nutt),—Advice to Singers, by F. J. Crowest (Warne),—Popular Tales of the West Highlands, by J. F. Campbell, Part I. (Gardner),—A Year with the Birds, by W. W. Fowler (Macmillan),—On the Animal Alkaloids, by Sir William Aitken, LL.D. (Lewis),—and Nero, by E. Eckstein, translated by C. Bell and M. J. Safford, 2 vols. (Triebner).

AT 29, DE VERE GARDENS.

28TH DECEMBER, 1889.

TWILIGHT and peace in the chamber;
Twilight of death and peace
For him who the strife, the long battle of life,
Had fought out to the last release:

Dead in a dying City,
Through her silent water-ways sped
Toward the misty West, and the place of rest
And gray home of the mighty dead.

Now bathed in silence and twilight
Where with wisdom's roseate glow,
Quick lightnings of wit, the chamber was lit
So lately,—yet so long ago:

Where eyes that from youth ne'er look'd on me
But the heart's bright message they bore,—
The welcoming lip, the hand's honest grip,
Were mine—mine now never more:—

There with amaranth cross and bay-wreath,
Inane munnus, I strove,
Knelt there and pray'd where they said he was laid,
To do the last office of love;

Love reverent, grateful, deep,
For the treasure that only they,
The poets of Love, the wise from Above,
To the world in its deadness convey:

For he, Star-crested, Hope-armour'd,
Struck straight at a swelling tide;
In the valley of doubt, with clarion shout,
Chased coward and doubter aside.

Then the vanish'd Presence in brightness
Was felt once more in the room,
While the worn-out shred the great spirit had shed
Lay garnish'd and still for the tomb.

Not there was the soul I had loved,
Where the mortal raiment was laid,— Death's fast vanishing spoil, the lamp without oil,
The blank sheath of the God-wrought blade,—

Bare walls of man's house, where no fire
On the central hearth-stone glows!—
Till silently round me a vapour of sound,
The music of memory, rose:—

And Blest are the dead in the Lord;
For they rest from their labours, I heard;
With a Love is best!—and the life now at rest
Was summ'd in that one brief word.

'DOMESDAY STUDIES,' VOL. II.

Park Street, Bristol, Jan. 20, 1890.

YOU inserted some inquiries about this at one time. Would you kindly insert another next week? We are informed by Mr. Dove that a meeting a fortnight hence will "definitely decide about vol. ii."—a most unsatisfactory answer. We paid for a dozen of these volumes years ago.

W. GEORGE'S SONS.

'RECOLLECTIONS OF EDGAR ALLAN POE.'

In the first number of Lambert's Monthly, a new publication, is inserted an article purporting to be 'Recollections of Edgar Allen [sic] Poe.' Being over the signature of a veteran writer and an American, these so-called 'Recollections,' although full of impossible events and improbable statements, may mislead many. As evidence of the faulty memory of their author, Mr. Howard Paul, I may refer to the very circumstantial account given of the composition of Poe's well-known poem of 'Israfel.' According to Mr. Paul's 'Recollections,' his uncle, Mr. T. C. Clarke, pointed out a passage in the Koran about Israfel to Poe, and suggested it as a good theme for a poem. Poe, being in the proper mood, agreed to compose fifty lines on the subject in less than sixty minutes, and then and there accomplished the feat. As a matter of fact the 'Israfel' quoted from as the result of this performance in 1842 or 1843 had been published by its author in 1831. It would puzzle Mr. Paul or any one else to produce a copy of the 'Mohammedan Bible' containing the passage said to have been pointed out by Mr. Clarke.

Other "recollections" in this remarkable article are quite as great feats of memory, but scarcely need analysis after what has already been stated; but it would be interesting to know where is the letter to John Howard Payne, which "has never before appeared in print," and whence Mr. Paul cites a very well-known paragraph by Poe on criticism. The letter is, perchance, kindred to one sold at public auction a few weeks ago, which, although purporting to be by Poe to his wife, was dated a year after her death, and was on a subject not thought of until some time after her burial.

JOHN H. INGRAM.

MR. BROWNING.

January 18, 1890.

MAY I call your attention to what seems to me a grave mistake in the article on Mr. Browning published in to-day's Athenæum? The writer speaks of him as having died in the arms of his sister and his son. There is no allusion to even the existence of that son's wife, who, in her double character of daughter and hostess, could not but have been present at Mr. Browning's bedside, and who, as a matter of fact, had herself risen from a bed of sickness that he might miss nothing in his hour of need which a daughter's tenderness combined with a woman's skill could give to him. So promptly, indeed, and efficiently did she combat the first violence of the bronchial attack, that it subsided before trained nurses had had time to arrive, and the patient's life would have been saved but for the deeper symptoms which from the first made recovery hopeless. It should be needless to add that Mr. Barrett Browning was throughout the illness all that a son could be—a son turned father for the time being; and that your critic's kindly mention of the poet's sister will find its echo in the heart of all her friends. We do not narrow the place of either in this record of closing days by claiming in it due recognition for one name more. Mrs. Browning still suffers from the great and sudden strain which her health received.

A. ORR.

* * In a "record" of the poet's "closing days" one of the most beautiful out of many beautiful episodes will assuredly be that which records the devotion of the lady referred to by Mrs. Orr. To have touched upon it in a review of a new book of poems would, however, have been a somewhat unwarrantable departure from the usual course. Our brief allusion to Miss and Mr. Browning was intended to illustrate and support the thesis that the poet's death was the crowning happiness of a happy life, and in making it we never dreamed of depriving any other friend of due recognition.

THE TUDOR EXHIBITION AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

IN accordance with a practice usefully adopted last year of supplementing popular exhibitions in other places by a simultaneous display of their own kindred treasures, the British Museum authorities have just arranged, at the lower end of the King's Library, a variety of engravings, seals, MSS., printed books, and broadsides which relate to the varying fortunes of the Tudor dynasty. The portraits are numerous, and being, for the most part, contemporary, or very nearly so, may be taken as the best representations we are likely to obtain of the lineaments of the different members of the royal house. They include Margaret Beaufort, the great-great-granddaughter of Edward III., who married Edmund Tudor, and became the mother of Henry VII.; Henry VII. and Henry VIII.; Henry VIII. giving the charter of incorporation to the Barber Surgeons' Company in 1541; Katherine of Aragon and Anne Boleyn; Queen "Johanna" Seymour, and "Anna Clivensis" etched by Hollar; Mary Tudor, sister of Henry VIII., Queen of France, and her second husband Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk; and many others. An original drawing by Holbein of a chimneypiece for Henry VIII., possibly for his Palace of Bridewell, will attract attention; so also will the portrait of Cardinal John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, who opposed the king's divorce from Katherine and the dissolution of monasteries, and terminated his career at the block in 1535. Then follow an original drawing of an astronomical clock by Holbein made for Sir Anthony Denny in 1544, who presented it to Henry VIII.; an undescribed anonymous engraved portrait of Edward VI.; Hollar's etching of the young king; three representations of Edward VI. granting his charter to Bridewell; Lady Jane Grey; Frances Brandon, her mother; Philip II. and Mary I., by Hoogenberg; Mary, by J. Vazquez; J. Brown's engraving of Philip and Mary, from the picture at Woburn Abbey; an original drawing of Queen Elizabeth, by F. Zuccaro; and a contemporary line engraving, published by Lieftrink, of the portrait of François, Duc d'Alençon, who twice visited England as a suitor for the hand of Elizabeth, and died unmarried in 1584. Among the portraits of the notables of the period are those of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, K.G., Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, K.G., Sir Francis Drake, Sir Walter Raleigh, Charles Howard, Lord Howard of Effingham, and Sir Philip Sidney. The fine series of seals of the Tudors include the great seals of the sovereigns, several signets and privy seals; the seal of Mary Tudor of France; of Jasper Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, who in his second seal introduced an unexplained variation in his quartering of Modern France by placing one fleur-de-lis over two, instead of two over one as was the invariable practice; of Queen Katherine of Aragon; and a beautiful, unique impression of the seal of the short-lived Jane Seymour, appended to her appointment of Edward Kympton to be steward of her manor of Weston, near Baldock, Herts, in 1537.

Among the many manuscripts exhibited, the most interesting are a minute of the Privy Council, relating to "Owen Tudor," in 1437; the will of Queen Katherine, mother of Henry VI.; a large number of original letters from various members of the Tudor dynasty; the will of Queen Katherine of Aragon; orders for the reception of Anne of Cleves in 1539; Henry, Duke of Richmond, natural son of Henry VIII., to his godfather Cardinal Wolsey; leaves selected from the diary of Edward VI. relating to Queen Mary, the fall and execution of the Duke of Somerset, &c.; a letter from Lady Brian (gouvernante to the Princess Elizabeth) to Thomas, Lord Cromwell, describing the forlorn and destitute condition of the princess, who "hath neither gown nor kettel nor petecot nor no manner of linen," &c.; and a letter from Prince Arthur, 1499. The series of illuminated MSS. relating to the endowment of chantry services in Westminster Abbey and St. Alban's Abbey; music and songs of Henry VIII.'s composition; and the little manual of prayers believed to have been used by Lady Jane Grey on the scaffold on February 12th, 1554, conclude this section. The Department of Printed Books contributes broadsides; specimens of leather and needlework binding of a fine character; the Grafton Bible of 1540; Bishop Parker 'De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ,' the first book privately printed in England, 1572, presented to Queen Elizabeth; Coverdale's New Testament, 1538; a Book of Hours containing a signature of Prince Arthur; and a large display of black-letter tracts, pamphlets, sermons, and political literature.

THE HOSPITALERS IN ENGLAND.

THE writer in the magazine underestimates my knowledge of his Society. To write a history of Rhodes, I had to investigate the history of the Hospitalers; and incidentally I found out all about this spurious imitation.

He speaks of the charitable work of his Society. The Hospitalers were so called because they exercised hospitality towards pilgrims. But his Society jumped to the conclusion that they were so called because they kept hospitals for the sick; and accordingly it plunged into hospital work; and, amongst other things, it established an ophthalmic hospital at Jerusalem, where the Hospitalers originally had their hospice for the pilgrims. I have often wondered how far a disinterested desire to benefit the afflicted was here tempered by a less avowable desire to mislead the public.

He goes out of his way to say that some Roman Catholics sneer at his Society because it is Catholic, i. e. cosmopolitan, in its charities, and not Roman Catholic. Now, I am not in any way concerned about the Roman Catholics or their alleged sneers. But I may point out that the Hospitalers were bound by their statutes to defend the Catholic faith; and that in such documents Catholic does not mean cosmopolitan or anything of the sort, but is simply the technical term for things appertaining to the Roman Church. The English Hospitalers took it in this sense in the days of the Reformation.

He justly observes that his Society can exist without my countenance or patronage. But then I did not offer it my countenance or patronage. I merely pointed out that some of his statements about it were untrue.

All these irrelevant remarks of his are obviously calculated to obscure the issue. He hardly attempts a defence of the particular assumption which I attacked, namely, that his Society is part and parcel of the real Order of the Hospitalers. His only argument is that the Queen and the Prince of Wales would not have joined his Society unless they were convinced that its members were "the representatives of those who, five or six centuries ago, in various ways assisted the cause of Christendom." On a simple question of fact, where the evidence is accessible to every one, it was unnecessary to talk about any one's supposed convictions; and quite unnecessary to drag in the names of these illustrious persons. But I presume that they joined his Society simply from charitable motives, for it would be impertinent to suppose that they know so little about the real Order as to dream of any connexion between the two. In support of this view I may point out that the charter by which they became members of his Society treats it simply as a charitable society of fifty years' standing, and makes no allusion whatever to the real Order or to former times.

I would recommend these two points to his attention: 1. Under the charter of incorporation the position of his Society is legally sound, though morally it may be otherwise. 2. Were his Society part of the real Order, as he alleged in the magazine, it would be dissolved and void under the Act 32 Henry VIII., cap. 24, which is still in force.

Perhaps he will shift his ground now, and base his claim to be considered a Knight Hospitaller upon his chivalrous courtesy to opponents and his zealous quest of truth. CECIL TORR.

SIR CHARLES DILKE's new book, 'Problems of Greater Britain'—which our readers are aware is not a record of travel, but a treatise on the present position of Greater Britain from the point of view of political and social observation and comparison—will be published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. on January 31st.

THE same publishers will issue within the next few weeks, under the title 'Leaves of a Life,' Mr. Montagu Williams's reminiscences, which we mentioned some months ago. Particulars will be given of the many important cases in which Mr. Williams took part, among which it is enough to mention the Fenian trials of 1867, the trial of Madame Rachel, of the Tichborne Claimant, the great Turf Frauds, the trials of Peace, Lefroy, and Lamson, and the action of Belt v. Lawes.

THE February number of the New Review will contain a study of Stanley's character, written by an intimate friend; and an article on the life and poems of Venantius Fortunatus, by Miss Preston. Among the other contributors to the number will be Mr. Henry James, Mr. Saintsbury, Mr. George Wyndham, M.P., and Sir Richard Temple.

AMONG the contents of the English Illustrated Magazine for February will be a poem, 'The Hall and the Wood,' by Mr. William Morris; articles on 'A Whitechapel Street,' by Mr. E. Dixon, with illustrations by Mr. Hugh Thomson; on 'Winchelsea,' by Mrs. Comyns Carr, with illustrations by Mr. David Carr; on 'Bells and Belfries,' by the Rev. H. R. Haweis, with illustrations;

MR. EGERTON PHILLIMORE has been appointed editor of Y Cymmrodor, the journal of the Honourable Society of Cymmrodorion, in place of Dr. Isambard Owen, who has resigned.

A FORTNIGHTLY illustrated journal, devoted to sport in all its phases, is about to be attempted on a considerable scale. The Prince of Wales has given a sitting for his portrait for the first number, which will appear early in the spring.

MR. MARION CRAWFORD has recently been awarded a prize of 1,000 francs by the French Academy, as an acknowledgment of the merit of his novels, and especially of two of them, 'Zoroaster' and 'Marzio's Crucifix,' which were written in French as well as in English.

A PAPER by Mr. Charles Woodbury will appear in the February Century, describing some conversations on the art of writing, reading, and criticism which took place between Emerson and the author in the latter's undergraduate days at Williams College, U.S.A. The Century will also contain a "poem" by Mr. Walt Whitman, in the shape of eight lines of rhythmic prose on 'Old Age's Ship, and Crafty Death's.'

SOME of those who listened to the interesting lecture recently delivered by Mr. F. C. Danvers at the Society of Arts on the India Office Records must have been rather astonished to hear no reference made to the Calendar of Colonial State Papers. This official work has already dealt with all the East India papers from the establishment of the East India Company down to 1629, and is still in active progress under Mr. Noel Sainsbury's competent editorship.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL will shortly publish a work entitled 'Two Summers in Greenland: an Artist's Adventures among Ice and Islands, in Fjords and Mountains,' by A. Riis Carstensen. The book will contain numerous illustrations by the author.

THE news of Mr. Robertson's resignation of the head-mastership of Haileybury will be received with general regret in scholastic circles. Mr. Robertson undertook a difficult task, and he has had to struggle against a singular concurrence of adverse circumstances: still he seemed to have conquered his difficulties, and he has withdrawn just at the time when a turn of the tide might fairly be expected.

MRS. DOD, the widow of C. P. Dod, the founder of the 'Parliamentary Companion,' died a few days ago at Addlestone, at the age of ninety-three.

THE Rev. H. P. Wright, Rector of Great-ham, Hants, has issued an appeal on behalf of Mr. R. R. Postans, who he says is "the only survivor of the founders of Punch." Mr. Postans is eighty-five years of age, totally blind, and quite penniless.

DR. A. W. VERRALL has undertaken to edit for Messrs. Sonnenschein & Co. a translation of the section in Dr. Munk's 'Geschichte der Griechischen Literatur' devoted to the Greek tragedians. The same publishers will issue shortly a translation of Roger de Guimps's 'Histoire de Pestalozzi,' by Mr. J. Russell. Mr. R. H. Quick will write a preface.

THE series of articles on modern and mediæval Greece, which have been done into English in the Scottish Review from Demetrios Bikelas, will shortly be issued in a separate volume, with the name of the Marquis of Bute as translator.

THE February number of Igdrasil will contain a transcript from an unpublished MS. of Carlyle's on 'The Tree of Igdrasil,' said to be "from the Norse," but evidently Carlyle's original work.

MR. C. LEWIS HIND will contribute to the February number of the Art Journal a paper on some 'Portraits of Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning.'

MRS. LYNN LINTON's pamphlet explaining why, from being an advocate of Home Rule for Ireland, she has become a supporter of the Union will be published in a day or two.

THE reading-rooms at the Free Library at Norwich are, as an experiment, to be opened on Sundays from 3 to 9 P.M.

AMONG recent deaths are those of M. Ténot, editor of the Gironde, and of M. Jardot, the author of several works on military subjects.

DR. KARL GEROK, a Swabian poet and hymn-writer, died at Stuttgart on January 14th in his seventy-fifth year. He studied theology at Tübingen under C. F. Baur, the founder of the critical school, and had Strauss and Theodor Vischer as his tutors. In 1868 he was appointed Oberhofprediger and Oberkonsistorialrath, with the title and rank of a Prälät. A forty-first edition of his 'Palmblätter,' the most popular volume of contemporary German religious poetry, was published a few years ago.

THE only Parliamentary Papers this week are Irish Land Commission Report for 1888-9 (7d.); and Emigration to Argentine Republic, Correspondence (10d.).

SCIENCE

Life of Charles Blacker Vignoles, F.R.S., Soldier and Civil Engineer: a Reminiscence of Early Railway History. By his Son Olinthus J. Vignoles, M.A. (Longmans & Co.)

MR. VIGNOLES, whose life is here narrated, was of Huguenot descent, and his ancestors for several generations were officers in the British army. A few months after his birth in 1793 both his parents died of yellow fever in Guadeloupe, and by way of recompense he was made an ensign in the 43rd Regiment before he was two years of age. His name appears among the officers on half-pay from 1794 to 1813. Hutton, the Woolwich professor, was his maternal grandfather, and took charge of him after the death of his parents. The lad exhibited a remarkable talent for arithmetic, and used to speak with pride in after years of the share which he took as a youth in the computation of 'Hutton's Tables.' There was, nevertheless, some incongruity of temper between them, and at the age of eighteen he left his grandfather, whom he had in some way offended, and who never altogether forgave him. He was educated at Sandhurst, and in 1814 was on active service as an ensign. A long letter is given, written by him from Bergen-op-Zoom, containing a vivid account of the unsuccessful attack on that place, in which, after undergoing the perils of a terrible fire, he was taken prisoner with nearly 2,000 others, while 1,600 of the attacking party were killed or wounded. Soon afterwards we find him with his regiment in Canada, and next he is stationed at Valenciennes as an extra aide-de-camp to Sir Thomas Brisbane. In 1817, after being secretly married, he started for South Carolina, and obtained employment there as Assistant State Surveyor. In 1825, being no longer connected with the army, he returned to England just in time to take part in the commencement of railway making. He had a large share, under an engagement made with Rennie, in laying out the Liverpool and Manchester line; but when George Stephenson was placed at the head of affairs a disagreement occurred, and he left the company's service. Stephenson appears, in fact, to have been boycotted by the leading engineers of the day. Vignoles says, in a letter written at the time:—

"In June Mr. Rennie, who had been previously engineer to the company, having absolutely refused either to consult with or to participate in the slightest degree with Mr. Stephenson, vacated his appointment, in consequence of the directors making this co-operation a sine qua non."

In the famous competition of locomotives Vignoles took part as the coadjutor of Ericsson and Braithwaite, their engine, the "Novelty," taking the second place. In 1829 he made overtures to the Thames Tunnel Company, whose enterprise was then at a standstill, and so came into conflict with Brunel. The directors listened favourably to his proposals, but nothing was done, and the tunnel was left uncompleted. In this and the succeeding year he was appointed to construct two railways, one from St. Helen's to Runcorn Gap and the other from Parkside to Wigan and Preston; and a few years later he designed and executed the first railway in Ireland—that from Dublin to Kingstown. After taking part in the making of several other lines in England and Ireland, he was made, in 1837, engineer-in-chief for constructing the Manchester and Sheffield Railway, which included the longest and deepest tunnel up to that time attempted. As the shares of the company were not taken up so quickly as could be wished, and there appeared to be danger of a collapse, he threw himself, with his usual impetuosity, into the gap and undertook responsibility for shares to the amount of 140,000*l*. This brought him a few years later into difficulties, which resulted in his resigning his position as engineer to the company and surrendering all his property to trustees. He found a haven of refuge in the Chair of Engineering in University College, for which he appears to have been well qualified not only by practical knowledge, but also by literary ability. When the great increase of railway development occurred in 1845, he vacated his chair and again devoted himself to the active duties of his profession. In addition to English work, he constructed railways in Russia, Germany, Switzerland, and Brazil, some particulars of which are given, especially with regard to a great bridge over the Dnieper at Kieff, which gave much difficulty on account of the sandy foundations and the violence of the floods. He was elected Fellow of the Royal Society in 1855, and in 1869 was made President of the Institution of Civil Engineers. He died in 1875. Two of his sons are following their father's profession, but this biography has been written by another son, who is a London clergyman. His work contains no very striking features, but it is judiciously executed, and affords every facility for reference.

Some amusing particulars are given respecting early railway travelling. The lines were so roughly laid that the jolting was very trying even in the first-class "coaches" (which were constructed on the model of stage-coaches, and had a guard riding on the top). The third-class carriages had no seats, and were open at the top like cattle trucks. Nobody was in a hurry, so there were frequent stoppages for rest and refreshment. Starting the engine was often a difficult matter, and the guard would call on the men in the third-class carriages to get out and push the train off. Passengers who arrived late would be told by the station master, "Now hurry yourselves—she's not long started, and if you look sharp you'll catch her up."

ANTHROPOLOGICAL NOTES.

THE concluding number of the Archæological Review (which will henceforward appear quarterly under another title, and comprise the official record of the Folk-lore Society) contains some valuable anthropological papers. Mr. David MacRitchie contributes an article on 'Earth-houses and their Inhabitants,' in which he discusses the chambered mounds, such as Maeshow, in Orkney, the underground galleries called fairy halls, and the brochs, such as that of Mousa, in Shetland. By drawings and plans to scale he seeks to demonstrate that these dwellings must have been occupied by persons of small stature, many of whose exploits are credited by tradition to the fairies. He therefore adopts the realistic theory of fairy tales, and suggests the exploration of mounds yet unopened with a view to confirm it.

Mr. Gomme, the editor, discusses the conditions for the survival of archaic custom, and the evidences of a continuance of savagery in the United Kingdom up to almost recent times, comparing them with the customs of existing savage races. In Ireland, in the borderland between Scotland and England, in Cambridgeshire, in Cornwall, and in Wales, instances are on record of wild and uncivilized communities far within historical times. The discovery by General Pitt-Rivers in Cranbourne Chase of the skeletons of a small race of people existing at the Roman period indicates the survival of neolithic folk in that district. The continuance of a traditional practice in Britain may, therefore, be as reasonably attributed to a savage origin as to a tribal or Aryan origin. Civilization of any advanced type is only the product of three or four centuries, and the solid stratum of traditional barbarism even now underlies it.

In its new form the Review will cease to devote attention to what is termed monumental archaeology, and will confine itself to institutional archaeology or folk-lore, including under that term archaic and savage institutions, prehistoric anthropology, and archaic history.

It is understood that arrangements may shortly be made for giving to English anthropologists the opportunity of hearing Dr. Bertillon, the son and successor of the eminent Paris statistician, on the subject of the system of criminal identification on anthropometric principles, which has been adopted with so much success in France.

The remarkably fortunate circumstances in which Dr. John Evans superintended the opening of a barrow in Hertfordshire, as described by him at the first meeting of the Society of Antiquaries for the present session, and the proposal which he has since made of a permanent fund for assisting such explorations, will no doubt tend greatly to encourage similar undertakings during the present year. In this connexion it may be worth while to remind those interested in them that the Anthropological Institute has appointed an aid committee of great experience and authority to advise and assist explorers.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

THE most recent information respecting Capt. Gromchevsky is dated October 22nd, 1889, and contained in a communication to M. Venyukoff, sent on by the latter to the Paris Geographical Society. The captain had left Kila Khumb in Darwaz and travelled by way of the Panj valley to its junction with the Wanj. The greater part of Shignan was then held by the Afghans, and Said Akbarcha was strenuously defending himself in Kila Wamar. The fighting was barely two days' march from Gromchevsky's halting-place. The latter wrote a letter to the Afghan general, and requested a safe conduct across the Afghan territory up to the borders of Kafiristan. The Russian explorer selected as bearer of the letter an Afghan soldier who had formerly been imprisoned by Akbarcha, and released by the latter at Gromchevsky's request, and who could personally bear witness to the pacific character of the Russian expedition. In the mean time Gromchevsky explored some of the least-known parts of the Pamir, comprising the valley of the Wanj and the Sir-archi Pass, leading to the source of the Khinj-ab, in Wakhan. The pass was extremely difficult to cross, and for more than eleven kilometres the way led over glaciers. The autumn frosts were setting in with severity, so Gromchevsky made for the sources of the Aksu and the Tagh-dumbash Pamir, where he succeeded in purchasing fifty sheep and some horses, and in hiring thirty yaks for conveying his baggage across the Ili-su Pass into the valley of the Raskem Daria, whence the explorer's letter was written. His intention was to explore the source of the Raskem Daria, which rises in the Karakorum Mountains, and thence to cross into the basin of the Khotan river. He claims to have discovered two new passes across the Hindu Kush range, viz., the Kudarpur, leading to Chitral, and the Kilinj, leading to Kanjut; but the latter pass has been known for years, Col. Woodthorpe, among others, having reported thereon. Capt. Gromchevsky says he received a letter from the Governor of Badakhshan stating that under the orders of the Amir an expedition into Kafiristan was inadmissible, for "the country had been invaded by the Afghans, and a sanguinary conflict was going on." The Russian traveller had met two Englishmen, Messrs. Cumberland and Bower, and was in hopes of meeting also Capt. Younghusband, R.E.

Col. Pievtssoff's last advices are dated from Nia, on the southern fringe of the Eastern Turkistan desert, where he proposed to winter. According to a telegram from Tashkend his companion Roborovsky has explored a route leading into Tibet, and the whole expedition purposed proceeding thither at the beginning of April, and passing the summer on the plateau, descending to the Lob Nor lake about September. Previously to that, during the month of January, the expedition proposed to travel as far as Cherchend and ascend the Cherchend river, which flows from the Tibetan plateau. This piece of work will establish an interesting connexion with General Prejevalsky's exploration of the same region.

Treatises on the "use of the globes" were plentiful in a time not very remote. One of the most famous among them is the Tractatus de Globis et eorum Usu, which was written in 1592 by Robert Hues, a celebrated London mathematician, for the special purpose of being used in connexion with a set of globes by Emery Molyneux, now in the library of the Middle Temple. The Hakluyt Society deserves the thanks of geographical students for rendering so interesting a book generally accessible. Mr. Clements R. Markham, the editor, has chosen J. Chilmead's English version of 1638 for publication; he has furnished it with an introduction, numerous annotations, and capital indices. His share of the work, as usual with him, has been done well, and our only regret is that it should have been beyond his power to publish, at the same time, a facsimile at least of the terrestrial globe. The same volume contains 'Sailing Directions for the Circumnavigation of England and for a Voyage to the Straits of Gibraltar,' from a fifteenth century MS. now in the British Museum, which is edited by Mr. James Gairdner, and furnished with a glossary by Mr. E. Delmar Morgan, the secretary of the Society.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Jan. 16.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'On the Chief Line in the Spectrum of the Nebulae,' by Prof. J. N. Lockyer; 'Observations on the Excretion and Uses of Bile,' by Mr. A. W. M. Robson; and 'On the Theory of Free Stream Lines,' by Mr. J. H. Michell.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—Jan. 20.—Right Hon. Sir Mountstuart M. E. Grant Duff, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Count S. Ostorog, Right Hon. Sir H. James, Lieut.-General Sir A. Alison, Capt. J. R. Parkington, Rev. W. A. B. Coolidge, Messrs. P. Alleyne, G. P. Balfour, J. B. Cameron, W. Clutterbuck, E. Crawshaw, G. Cumies, H. Eschwege, H. Gurney, C. Hoare, C. W. Martin, J. B. Miller, P. A. Myburgh, W. Newall, H. D. Pilcher, A. Riekmann, J. Ruston, E. L. Sheldon, D. E. Thebaud, O. Thomas, E. Tipson, and A. B. Wall.—The papers read were 'Mr. J. R. W. Pigott's Journey to the Upper Tana in 1889,' by Mr. E. G. Ravenstein; and 'The Mouths of the Zambezi,' by Mr. D. J. Rankin.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Jan. 16.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Rev. J. T. Fowler read a paper on the graveslates of the bishops and priors who lie buried in the cathedral church of Durham. Mr. Fowler exhibited in illustration rubbings of the casements of three episcopal brasses, viz., of Bishops Kellaw (1316), Beaumont (1333), and Nevill (1457). The brass of Bishop Beaumont must have been the finest in Europe. It is fully described in 'Rites of Durham,' and although not a fragment of the metal work is left, the slab is so perfect as to enable the various parts to be made out from the description. The brass was laid in two great slabs, the whole measuring 15 ft. 10 in. in length by 9 ft. 7 in. in width. This huge memorial was laid down by Beaumont in his lifetime, and was certainly of English workmanship. It closely resembled in design, and was clearly the work of the same hand as, the fine brass of Laurence Seymour at Higham Ferrers.—Mr. W. H. St. John Hope read a paper on the sculptured alabaster tablets called in the mediæval inventories "St. John's Heads." A number of these tablets have from time to time come to light, all of the same general design, and clearly from one common centre. The principal feature is the head of St. John the Baptist on a charger accompanied by a figure below symbolical of our Lord's Passion, either a Holy Lamb or a figure of Christ in the tomb. A single example has instead the Blessed Virgin and Child. This subject is usually flanked by figures of St. Peter and an archbishop, and sometimes other figures are added, as well as various accessories at the top. The meaning of the sculptures seems to be explained by a passage in the fourth lesson in the York porthos for the feast of the Beheading of St. John the Baptist, which reads: "Caput Johannis in disco: signat corpus Christi: quo pascimur in sancto altari: et quod ecclesie gentium tribuitur in salutem ac remedium animarum." But it is not easy to see what mystical meaning there can be between St. John's head and the Sacrament of the altar. Mr. Hope has found that large numbers of these tablets were being made at Nottingham at the end of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth centuries, a date which agrees well with the style of the known example. As Nottingham was then in York diocese, it was suggested that the designer drew his inspiration from the passage in the York service book. The choice of the figures of saints is not easy to explain. Mr. Hope hinted that he was inclined to look upon the tablets as the device of a guild, and possibly of the famous Corpus Christi Guild at York; the figure of St. Peter would then come in as the saint in whose honour the great church at York is dedicated, and the archbishop may be either St. William of York or St. Thomas of Canterbury. As the Hospital of St. Thomas at York was incorporated in the Corpus Christi Guild shortly after the foundation of the latter, the choice of St. Thomas on the tablets is easily explained. Unfortunately there is no absolute proof to connect the tablets with the guild at York or any other; but now that attention has been called to the fact, it is possible that evidence may be forthcoming. In illustration of Mr. Hope's paper a fine series of examples of the tablets, with photographs and drawings of others, were exhibited.

BRITISH ARCHEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—Jan. 15.—Mr. C. H. Compton in the chair.—A communication was read from the owner of Eggeston Abbey, near Barnard Castle, denying that any of the ancient ruins had been purposely removed. A portion had been blown down, but the remainder would be carefully preserved.—Mr. Loftus Brock exhibited an old German book of sermons printed in 1516, a fine specimen of monastic binding in stamped leather with brass bosses, of contemporary date.—Mr. A. G. Langdon exhibited designs of a series of bench ends which have been destroyed with the church of Lewenneck, Cornwall, recently burnt. The oak work of the church was of great beauty, and the antiquarian loss is a serious one.—Mr. Earle Way exhibited a series of examples of fictile ware found on the site of the old Marshalsea Prison, Southwark. These remains are of Roman date, one being a curious imitation of a thin Samian ware bowl, in black Upchurch pottery.—The Chairman announced his recent correspondence with the Historical MSS. Commission relative to the records of Creak Abbey preserved at Cambridge.—A paper was read by the Rev. D. Gedde on the brass of Sir Adam de Clifton (who died 1367) formerly existing in the church of Methwold. It was sold by the sexton in 1680 to a travelling tinker, who broke it to pieces and melted a portion. The remainder was recovered and preserved in the parish chest in a fragmentary condition, but in more recent years the fragments again left the church. The pieces have now been put together and the brass fixed to the wall of the chancel. The brass is one of very considerable beauty, and the face appears to be a portrait.—The second paper was 'On the Ancient Charters and the Boundaries of Crowland Abbey,' by Mr. A. S. Canham. The documents are remarkable for being so full of inaccuracies that, as is well known, doubt has been thrown upon their value. The author contended that these were occasioned by the error of transcription either from memory or from poor copies, after the burning of the originals in Norman times. The matter was correct, although names and dates were often misleading. The boundaries were then discussed, and all the names recorded in the old documents identified by the modern designations and the six boundary crosses which still remain. A seventh was ploughed up in 1848.

NUMISMATIC.—Jan. 16.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Messrs. C. T. Deichmann, J. D. Lucas, S. Page, C. M. Neale, and E. J. Rapson were elected Members.—Mr. W. R. Davies exhibited a selection of British, Roman, and English coins discovered chiefly in the neighbourhood of Wallingford, among which the most important was an aureus of Epiphili, obv. Victory within a wreath; rev. horseman holding a cornu over his shoulder; inscr. EPPI. F. COM.—Dr. Evans exhibited a badge of the Guild of Silk, Wool, and Cloth Workers and Mercers of the city of Middelburg, in Holland, circa A.D. 1580.—Mr. R. A. Hoblyn exhibited three varieties of the pattern halfpenny of Charles I. mentioned in Evelyn's 'Discourse of Medals,' 1697, two of them bearing the date 1643 and the third 1660. Mr. Hoblyn thought that on the restoration of Charles II. the old die was utilized, the date being altered and the inscription slightly modified. Mr. Hoblyn also exhibited rare gilt proofs of the stiver and half-stiver pieces of "Essequibo and Demerary," 1813, and the rare pattern penny for Ireland, 1813, from the die of which the obverse of the stiver piece was evidently struck. Another pattern penny by Thos. Wyon, 1813, furnished the obverse for the Ceylon two-stiver piece of 1815.—Mr. L. A. Lawrence read a paper on a broken coin of the Eustace type, obv. [EYST] JACIL. FIL. IOAN. IS+ (Eustaci filii Joannis), lion rampant; rev. inscription unintelligible, cross floriated, having in each angle a sceptre ending in a small cross. The new and remarkable obverse legend led the writer to attribute this coin to Eustace Fitz-John, first cousin of King Stephen, and progenitor of the great Baron Eustace of John's time. Fitz-John is mentioned by Speed as having in 1140 fortified his castle of Miltone (Old Malton, Yorks) against Stephen. He also, in alliance with David of Scotland, captured Alnwick Castle, and fought at Northallerton against the English king. He was slain in battle with the Welsh early in the reign of Henry II. As Eustace Fitz-John, like the Empress Matilda and Robert of Gloucester, &c., regarded Stephen as a usurper, the existence of coins of all these personages is not to be wondered at. Mr. Lawrence was also of opinion that all the other coins bearing the name of Eustace are in reality money of Eustace Fitz-John, and not, as has hitherto been thought, of Eustace the king's son, a youth who died at the age of eighteen, who was never at feud with his father, and who, therefore, seems to have been a most unlikely person to have struck money in his own name.

ZOOLOGICAL.—Jan. 14.—Prof. A. Newton, V.P., in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions made to the Society's menagerie during December.—Mr. Slater exhibited and made remarks on a specimen of a duck from North-East Asia, apparently referable to the genus Tadorna, sent to him for determination by Dr. Lütken, of Copenhagen. Mr. Slater was inclined to think that it was probably a hybrid between Tadorna casarca and Querquedula falcata. He also exhibited and made remarks on a set of small birds' bones obtained from beneath deposits of nitrate in Southern Peru, transmitted to the Society by Prof. W. Nation.—Mr. D. W. Barker exhibited and made remarks on specimens of teredos taken from submarine telegraphic cables off the Brazilian coast.—Prof. F. Jeffrey Bell exhibited and made remarks on some living specimens of Bipalium, transmitted to the Society by the Rev. G. H. R. Fisk, of Capetown.—Letters and communications were read: from Mr. R. Lydekker, containing an account of a species of extinct otter from the lower pliocene of Eppelsheim; the author described part of the lower jaw, which he had previously referred to Lutra dubia, from the deposits indicated; having, however, now seen a cast of the type of the latter, he found that the present specimen indicated a distinct species, for which the name L. hesica was proposed.—from Prof. B. C. A. Windle and Mr. J. Humphreys, on some cranial and dental characters of the domestic dog, based on the results of the measurements of a large number of dogs' skulls of various breeds, the object being to ascertain whether cranial and dental characteristics afforded sufficient information to permit of a scientific classification of the breeds, or would throw any light upon their origin; the conclusion so far arrived at was that interbreeding had been so extensive and complicated as to make it impossible to distinguish the various forms scientifically from the characters examined, several points with regard to the shape of head and palate and the occasional occurrence of an extra molar being also touched upon.—by Mr. G. A. Boulenger, the fourth of his series of contributions to the herpetology of the Solomon Islands, the present memoir giving an account of the last collection brought home by Mr. C. M. Woodford; besides known species, this collection contained examples of a new snake, proposed to be called Hoplocephalus elapoides; and a second paper on the reptiles, batrachians, and freshwater fishes collected by Prof. Moesch and Mr. Iversen in the districts of Delhi and Langkat, in North-Eastern Sumatra,—and by Dr. Günther, on our knowledge of British Pleuronectidae. The author described the true Arnoglossus grohmanni, a Mediterranean scald-fish recently discovered by the Rev. W. S. Green on the Irish coast, and quite distinct from Arnoglossus lophotes. Dr. Günther also stated that the Mediterranean lemon-sole (Solea lascaris) was specifically identical with the British species (Solea aurantiaca), but was distinct from that of the Canary Islands and Madeira (Solea scriba), and gave it as his opinion that the Mediterranean Solea lutea and British Solea minuta cannot be separated by any constant character.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—Jan. 15.—Annual Meeting.—Right Hon. Lord Walsingham, President, in the chair.—An abstract of the Treasurer's accounts, showing that the finances of the Society were in a thoroughly satisfactory condition, was read by Dr. Sharp, one of the auditors, and the Report of the Council was read by Mr. H. Goss. It appeared therefrom that the Society had lost during the year several Fellows by death and had elected twenty-four new Fellows; that the volume of Transactions for the year extended to nearly six hundred pages, and comprised twenty-three memoirs, contributed by twenty authors, and illustrated by seventeen plates; and that the sale of the Society's Transactions and other publications is largely on the increase.—It was announced that the following gentlemen had been elected as officers and Council for 1890: President, Right Hon. Lord Walsingham; Treasurer, Mr. E. Saunders; Secretaries, Mr. H. Goss and Canon Fowler; Librarian, Mr. F. Grut; Other Members of the Council, Mr. J. W. Dunning, Capt. H. J. Elwes, Mr. F. DuCane Godman, Dr. P. B. Mason, Prof. R. Meldola, Mr. R. South, Mr. H. T. Stainton, and Mr. R. Trimen.—Lord Walsingham nominated Mr. J. W. Dunning, Capt. Elwes, and Mr. F. DuCane Godman Vice-presidents for the session 1890-1, and he then delivered an address. After remarking on the attractive beauty of some of the larger diurnal Lepidoptera, and the brilliant metallic colouring of certain species of Coleoptera, the influence that such magnificent examples of the wealth of design in nature might have upon artistic taste, and the consequent refinement and increased enjoyment of life, Lord Walsingham referred, in illustration of the practical usefulness of entomological studies, to the successful importation into California of the Australian parasites infesting the scale insect (Icerya purchasi), which had proved so noxious to the orange plantations. Through the efforts of Prof. Riley upwards of ten thousand parasites had been distributed and had since spread very widely, so that in many localities the orange and other trees hitherto thickly infested with this noxious insect had been practically cleared of it by their aid. He also referred to the successful fertilization of red clover in New Zealand by the importation of impregnated queens of the common humble-bee, and to the uses to which the silk produced by various exotic species of Bombycidae had now been successfully applied. Reference was then made to the investigation instituted by Mr. F. Galton, and to the experiments of Mr. F. Merrifield with the view of determining the percentage of hereditary transmission to successive offspring by different generations of successors, and to the valuable auxiliary such experiments, and the researches of Prof. Weismann, Mr. Poulton, and others, might prove to the study of the laws of heredity, protective resemblance, and natural selection. It was then observed that even if the study of entomology could claim to have conferred no greater benefits upon the human race than to have afforded to many members of our urban population an inducement to improve their minds and recreate their bodies, it would have contributed in no small degree to the sum of human health, happiness, and morality. Attention was then drawn to the enormous number of species of Insecta as compared with the number of species of other orders of the animal kingdom, and an approximate estimate was made of the extent of the field of entomology and of its relation to other branches of biological study. In connexion with the subject of the principal works in entomology continued or completed during the year, special mention was made of the 'Biologia Centrali-Americana,' by Messrs. Godman and Salvin, and the 'Revisio Insectorum Familiae Mantidarum,' by Prof. Westwood. In conclusion, Lord Walsingham referred to the loss by death during the past year of several Fellows of the Society and other entomologists, mention being made of Mr. F. Bond, Dr. Signoret, M. Puls, Col. C. J. Cox, Pastor Holmgren, Dr. F. Löw, Dr. K. Venus, and the Rev. J. G. Wood.

CHEMICAL.—Jan. 16.—Dr. W. J. Russell, President, in the chair.—Messrs. Wallace C. Nickels and J. A. Nettleton were formally admitted Fellows of the Society.—The following papers were read: 'A New Method of Estimating the Oxygen dissolved in Water,' by Mr. J. C. Thresh.—'Note on a Milk of Abnormal Quality,' by Mr. F. J. Lloyd.—and 'On the Sulphates of Antimony,' by Mr. R. H. Adie.

METEOROLOGICAL.—Jan. 15.—Annual Meeting.—Dr. W. Marceet, President, in the chair.—The Council in their report congratulated the Fellows on the generally prosperous state of the Society, the past year's work, though not in any respect exceptional, having been thoroughly successful.—Mr. B. Latham was elected President for the ensuing year.—The retiring President, Dr. Marceet, then delivered an address 'On Atmospheric Dust,' which he divided into organic or combustible, and mineral or incombustible. The dust scattered everywhere in the atmosphere, and which is lighted up in a sunbeam or a ray from an electric lamp, is of an organic nature. It is seen to consist of countless motes, rising, falling, or gyrating, although it is impossible to follow any of them with the eye for longer than the fraction of a second. It is difficult to say how much of the dust present in the air may become a source of disease and how much is innocuous. Many of the motes belong to the class of micro-organisms which are frequently the means of spreading infectious diseases. Many trades, owing to their dusty nature, are most unhealthy. Dust when mixed with air is inflammable and liable to explode. After giving several instances of explosions due to fine dust in flour mills and coal mines, Dr. Marceet referred to inorganic or mineral dust, and gave an account of dust storms and dust pillars in India. He then proceeded to describe volcanic dust, which consists mainly of powdered vitrified substances produced by the action of intense heat. The so-called ashes or scoriae shot out in a volcanic eruption are mostly pounded pumice, but they also originate from stones and fragments of rocks which, striking against each other, are reduced into powder or dust. Volcanic dust has a whitish-grey colour. Dr. Marceet concluded with an account of the great eruption of Krakatoa in August, 1883.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Jan. 17.—Lord Harris in the chair.—A paper 'On the India Office Records' was read before the Indian Section by Mr. F. C. Danvers, Registrar and Superintendent of Records. The paper gave a brief account of the results of an examination during the last six years of the records relating to India and the East India Company now in the possession of the Secretary of State for India.—A discussion followed, in which Sir W. Hunter, Sir G. Birdwood, Lord Harris, and others took part.

Jan. 20.—Lord Sudeley in the chair.—Dr. S. P. Thompson commenced a course of Cantor Lectures 'On the Electro-Magnet.'

Jan. 21.—Sir P. Cunliffe-Owen in the chair.—A paper 'On the Tea, Coffee, and Cocoa Industries of Ceylon' was read before the Foreign and Colonial Section by Mr. J. L. Shand.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

Jan. 22.—Sir D. Galton in the chair.—A paper 'On Vision Testing for Practical Purposes' was read by Mr. R. B. Carter. The paper dealt specially with the question of colour blindness and the means adopted for detecting the same.—A discussion followed.

HISTORICAL.—Jan. 16.—Mr. C. A. Fyfe in the chair.—The following paper was read: 'Papers relating to the Officiating Priest at the Easter Celebration in Rome, 1849: a Page in the History of Italian Unity,' by Mr. J. F. Palmer.—A discussion followed, in which Rev. J. M. Guilding, Messrs. Bertin, Browning, Lloyd, and Williamson took part.

PHYSICAL.—Jan. 17.—Prof. W. G. Adams, V.P., in the chair.—Owing to the unavoidable absence of Mr. F. B. Hawes, his paper 'On a Carbon Deposit in a Blake Telephone Transmitter' was postponed.—Dr. S. P. Thompson made a communication 'On Electric Splashes,' and illustrated his subject by beautiful experiments on the production of Lichtenberg's figures.—A paper 'On Galvanometers,' by Prof. W. E. Ayrton, Mr. T. Mather, and Mr. W. E. Sumpner, was read by Prof. Ayrton.—On account of the lateness of the hour, the discussion was adjourned till February 6th.

ARISTOTELIAN.—Jan. 20.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Miss M. P. Lowndes was elected a Member.—The President read a paper 'On Universals in Logic.' The scholastic theory was first stated, and passages quoted from the 'Logic' in the Stonyhurst series of manuals. The theory appeared open to the objection of confusing laws of thinking with methods of acquiring knowledge, a distinction established at the time of the Renaissance, when positive methods of knowledge were placed upon an independent basis chiefly by being set free from the assumption that the perception of immaterial entities was necessary to constitute the act of thinking. Secondly, the origin of concepts or universals was traced to acts of attending to perceptual data for the purpose of harmonizing them with their perceptual context, without, however, involving the necessity that this purpose should be recognized as a purpose at the time of entertaining it. Thirdly, the psychology of the subject was more fully entered on. Conception was held to belong to voluntary as opposed to spontaneous redintegration, or association of ideas, both divisions depending upon physiological processes as their proximate condition. In conclusion, a brief statement was given of Mr. Romanes's doctrine of receipts, as set forth in his 'Mental Evolution in Man,' and the doctrine welcomed as a valuable contribution to psychological knowledge in its historical or evolutionary department.—A discussion followed.

Science Gossip.

THE death on Saturday last of Mr. Alexander Shaw, F.R.C.S., consulting surgeon to the Middlesex Hospital, removes the last link which intimately connected the physiologist of to-day with Sir Charles Bell. Mr. Shaw was one of his brother-in-law's assistants in the classical experiments on the functions of the fifth cranial nerve; and he was by a few weeks predeceased by his younger brother, Mr. James Shaw, sometime Inspector-General of Hospitals in Madras. To the surgeon Mr. Shaw, who was the sole surviving member of the original staff of the Middlesex Hospital Medical School, was known by his various contributions to Holmes's 'System of Surgery'; the general reader knew him best as the editor of the later editions of 'Bell on the Hand.' An attack of paralysis some fifteen years ago caused him to retire from all active work or social engagements. He died in his eighty-sixth year.

PROF. P. MANTEGAZZA'S 'Physiognomy and Expression' will form the March volume of the 'Contemporary Science Series,' published by Mr. Walter Scott. Prof. Mantegazza has specially written a chapter for this English edition of his work.

THE papers read at the meeting last week of the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching will be printed in the Sixteenth General Report (now in the press) of the Association.

DR. RAOUL GAUTIER has been appointed Professor of Astronomy at Geneva, undertaking at the same time the duties of Director of the Observatory there, although Col. E. Gautier retains the title of honorary director. It will be remembered that the present observatory owes its foundation, in 1830, to the exertions of the late Dr. Alfred Gautier, who was obliged a few years afterwards, through an infirmity of the sight (though he continued to carry on other scientific works and lived until he had completed his eighty-eighth year in 1881), to commit the direction of the astronomical works to his pupil, M. E. Plantamour, who survived him by not quite a year.

THE TUDOR EXHIBITION, NEW GALLERY.

(Second Notice.—The Holbeins.)

THE half-length Portrait of Thomas Howard, Third Duke of Norfolk (No. 41), though lent by his living descendant and called a Holbein, is an indifferent version or school copy (there are a dozen more in existence) of the portrait from Windsor, No. 91, which is really a Holbein, and was at the never-to-be-forgotten exhibition of 1866. Although the surface of the Queen's picture has cracked from injudicious varnishing till it looks like an old map, the picture proper is complete, and in its reddish carnations, which were produced by delicate glazes over solid, but lightly and deftly touched modelling in the under painting, as well as in its clear shadows of an even, monotonous, and somewhat conventional character, illustrates the true Holbein manner—see John Reske-meer (72), Sir H. Guldeford (90), Christina, Duchess of Milan (92), and Sir T. More (94), all unquestionable works of his—as distinct from the very fine and solid Portrait of a Man (67), lent by Sir J. E. Millais, which, as it differs from the indubitable Holbeins in these and other points, we hesitate to call a Holbein, although in every respect it is worthy of him.

The little eyes in the Queen's picture No. 91 are characteristic of Holbein, as a study of the chalk drawings from Windsor now hanging on the screens here will show the visitor. The wasted hands, as Holbein's hands invariably do, emphasize the character of the sitter. The picture was engraved by Vostermann. Another version of this picture which is at Arundel states that the duke was sixty-six years old at the time the picture was painted; so it belongs to 1539. Wornum preferred No. 41 to No. 91; but it is difficult to understand upon what grounds, and he admits it has "been somewhat repainted about the face." Nothing of the kind has befallen the Queen's picture, which was No. 153 at the Academy in 1871, and in 1880 No. 180. In the background of Van Dyck's 'Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, and his Family' this Holbein and his portrait of the Earl of Surrey (now lost) are represented on the wall, so it would seem that a version of the Duke's portrait was in the possession of the Howard family at the time that Van Dyck made his design (of which a drawing in distemper by Fruytiers was made in 1642, and now belongs to Lord Stafford; see Smith, 628). The Duke of Norfolk has another portrait of his ancestor, which seems, according to Wornum, to have been made up from a portrait of Holbein's, but differs from it in being about a hundred years less ancient; the face is much younger, and the staves are held nearly at right angles to each other, not, as in the examples before us, nearly parallel and upright.

There is nothing here superior to the life-size, whole-length Cartoon of Henry VII. and Henry VIII. (42), done by Holbein with a brush in distemper of black and white on paper. It is, unlike Raphael's famous Cartoons, practically unrestored and uninjured, except that the face of Henry VIII. has been, if it was ever finished, washed out; but it was very possibly left incomplete, as Holbein would naturally desire to devote the sitting the king would give to him to the painting rather than to the cartoon. The face of Henry VII. has been injured in a less degree, or likewise left unfinished. The outlines—the whole consists of little else—have been pricked for pouncing in order to transfer them to the wall on which the picture was painted. A close examination shows that a considerable portion of this work is due to an assistant, a fact that throws light on the origin of several pictures of high merit worthy of Holbein's workshop, and yet not his work, such as the Duke of Norfolk (41), Lord Bristol's Sir Nicholas Poyntz (79), Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, lent by Viscount Dillon (107), and Lord Galway's Nicholas Kratzer (129), all good pictures and replicas of originals belonging to the Queen, the present Primate, and the Louvre severally. The cartoon, which we last saw at the Academy in 1879 (231), was No. 134 in the National Portrait Exhibition in 1866. Although Hentzner, the German traveller, seems to have seen it in 1598, the earliest undoubted record of the picture is that of Van Mander, 1604, who speaks of its lifelike character and the strong impression it made on every one who beheld it. At the first fire at Whitehall on April 10th, 1691, it was burnt, with many relics and works of art of incalculable value. Fortunately for us Charles II. had in 1667 paid Remé van Leemput, a Dutch artist, 150l. to make a reduced copy on canvas 39 in. by 36 in., which is now at Hampton Court, and was No. 135 at the National Portrait Exhibition in 1866. There was a chimney-piece—one authority says a window, which is hardly credible—between the groups (it is replaced in the copy with a pedestal). The two principal figures, Henry VIII. and Queen Jane Seymour, were on either side and behind them, on a smaller scale, as if they stood on raised steps, were Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York. The background consists of a wall, divided in arched niches with a sumptuous entablature designed and decorated in Holbein's manner with escutcheons (bearing the initials "H." and "I." for Henry and Jane, bound by true-lovers' knots) supported by demi-figures. At the sides were piers richly decorated with panels in arabesques. The cruel self-assertion and the ruthlessly domineering character of Henry VIII. are, notwithstanding the imperfection of the face, so intensely and passionately expressed in Van Leemput's copy as to justify the remark of some observer to Van Mander, that he felt quite daunted by the original picture. They are still more noticeable in this cartoon, which gives us the veritable character of the man as he lived soon after the time he was forcing his own daughter to confess herself illegitimate and admit the dishonour of her mother. Leemput's copy gives the date 1537 on the escutcheon corresponding to that with the "H." and "I." Holbein was by this time in the king's employ. On March 10th, 1538, acting as "a sarvand of the Kynges Majesties named Mr. Haunce," he arrived at Brussels, his escort being Mr. "Philip Hobbie" (whose portrait is No. 543 before us), in order to take the likeness of the young widowed Dowager Duchess of Milan. Sir Bryan Tuke, Treasurer of the Chamber, whose portrait Holbein had painted in 1527, paid "Lady Day, anno [regno] xxix. :—Item for Hans Holbein, paynter, viii. xs." supposed to have been his first quarter's salary. Subsequently he was paid for "costis and chargis" in going to "high Burgundy." In 1538 he gave the king for a New Year's gift "a table of the picture of the Prince's grace," probably Lord Yarborough's Edward VI. as a Child (174), not, as some have supposed, that which the Duke of Northumberland recently lent to the Academy, and now here with the number 189. It may be that "whole-length figure of Edward VI. which was certainly his Majesty's," which Evelyn saw at Sir W. Dacy's (Ducie, afterwards Lord Downe), in London, February 15th, 1649, along with "Sir Thomas More's head." It was thought to be Holbein's, although no portrait of the young king by that master is mentioned in Charles I.'s Catalogue by Vander Doort, the picture Holbein presented occurring in the list of gifts. In return for it Henry gave his painter "a gilt cruse with a cover weing xoz quarter," of which the maker was, Mr. Franks thought, Cornelius Hayes, the royal goldsmith. It is certain, as Wornum remarked, that the cartoon differs in some respects from Van Leemput's copy, and shows that some changes were made during the progress of the picture. Henry's face in the cartoon is turned slightly to his left, towards Jane Seymour; in Van Leemput his face is seen in full; his dress is also different, both doublet and surcoat; the right hand is differently treated, and so are other details.

In Lord Yarborough's charming picture (174 here, and 176 in the National Portrait Exhibition, 1866; at the Academy in 1875) the dark crimson velvet hat is tied under the chin of the little prince, and, in the Tudor manner, decorated with plumes, which set off his pretty face and suit his jacket of red and gold and the bright grey background. Although Waagen reported that the servants in Arlington Street declared that this picture was "given by Henry VIII. to an ancestor of Lord Yarborough," it has really quite another history. It was formerly in the Arundel Collection at Stafford House, the so-called Tart Hall, and was one of the pictures Lord Stafford had from his mother. It was sold in 1720. It was long afterwards, in 1826, at Appuldercombe, at Sir R. Worsley's, and now belongs to Lord Yarborough. We have a note in Vander Doort's catalogue of King Charles's pictures indicating a copy and the whereabouts of the original: "No. 22. Copie by Peter Oliver after Hans Holben, whereof my Lord of Arundel has the principal. Item. The picture of King Edward VI. in his infancy, in a red cap with a white feather, and a red coat laced with gold, and golden cloth sleeves, holding in his left hand a round golden rattle, and with his right hand in some action; by a green table, whereon is written in black and white letters, being in a black shutting frame, painted upon the wrong light, 4½ by 2" inches. While it was in the Arundel Collection Hollar etched the portrait, but not very successfully. Nos. 552 and 554, in the South Gallery, are fine portraits of the prince. As the prince looks still younger than in Lord Yarborough's, the Duke of Northumberland's picture has, but on that ground alone, a fair claim to be Holbein's New Year's gift to his patron.

Mr. W. M. Molyneux has contributed a painting of Edward VI. (175), aged ten years, and therefore almost contemporary with the Queen's picture at Windsor (No. 172 in the National Portrait Exhibition, 1866) and the Christ's Hospital portrait, long cherished as that of the founder (No. 177 in the same exhibition), which interests us not only from its origin and character, but because it is associated with that pretty epistle the then Prince of Wales wrote about this time to his father, thanking him for a gift of toys, such as the gold rattle before named. The Duke of Manchester possesses a portrait of Edward dated 1547, and here numbered 183; it was No. 180 in the exhibition of 1866. The Earl of Hardwicke has another very like the Christ's Hospital picture. Soon after this Henry VIII. died, January 28th, 1547, and the beautiful picture now at Petworth, of Edward VI. seated on the throne, dated 1547, was painted some two years after the death of Holbein (which occurred a very short time before November 19th, 1545), and may be awarded, with several works now before us, to the Dutchman Guillim Stretes. No portrait of Edward after he was eight years old can be by Holbein. The only original pictures of the young king's mother by Holbein are those at Vienna (etched by Unger) and Woburn (finely etched by Hollar); the drawing No. 497 before us bearing her name is doubtful. Hilliard's miniature of her is at Windsor, and is a fine example of his peculiarly able, but somewhat timid art and hard manner. When portraits of this period are ascribed to Luke Horneband, one of King Henry's best paid artists, we must remember that he died, as Mr. J. G. Nichols ascertained, in April or May, 1544. The portrait of Henry VIII. (126), from Warwick Castle, Mr. Nichols reasonably suggested might be by either Luke or Gerard Horneband. It is a leading member of a numerous class. On the other hand, we may be certain that Nichols erred in suggesting that the Petworth and Christ's Hospital portraits of Edward VI. and others of the same type, of which some are here, are due to the painter of No. 126, for the style of handling and colouring is quite different.

Miss Morrison's Anne of Cleves (108) bears the name of Holbein, and resembles his work after restoration; but the queen looks older than she could have been when the painter died. However this may be, the dull expression and heavy features seem to justify the description Nicholas Wootton gave to Henry in 1539 before Anne left her home: "She occupieth her tyme moste with the nedyll, wherewithall she [? has much skill]. She canne reede and wryte her [own language], but Frenche, Latyn, or other langaige she [knows not] one nor yet canne not syngre nor pleye upon any instrument; for they take it heere in Germanye for a rebuke and an occasion of lightnesse that greet Ladyes shuld be lernyd or have enye knowledge of musike. Her witte is so goode, that no doubt she wille yn a shorte space Ierne th' Englishe tongue, when so ever she putteth her mynde to hit." "Your Graces servante Hanze Albein hath taken th' effigies of my Ladye Anne and the Ladye Amelye [her sister], and hath expressed their images very lyvely." The portrait in the Louvre, which bears the names of Anne and Holbein, was first so doubly designated by Dr. Waagen. Wornum suggested that the Windsor drawing called Anne of Cleves (519), which did not belong to the collection of Holbeins found by Queen Caroline in a closet at Kensington, represents Anne's sister Amelia.

The portrait of Gertrude, Lady Petre (46), ascribed to Holbein, is most interesting on account of its costume and character, but it was painted by a heavier hand than his. Of the two large pictures ascribed to V. Volpe, No. 47, the Embarkation of Henry VIII. from Dover, 1520, is, with its companion, mentioned in the journal which the Duke of Saxe-Weimar kept when he came to England in 1613. He says they were "very beautiful." Technically speaking we cannot agree with him. The work is, nevertheless, full of curious figures—the trumpeters, for instance, in the lofty poop of the Henri Grace-dieu (the sides of which are hung in the mediæval manner with shields of arms), and the men who are firing the wonderful artillery. The king, in his characteristic attitude, with his feet planted wide apart, as in Holbein's cartoon (42), and dressed in cloth of gold, stands at the gangway of the Great Harry. Hans Holbein (52) and Elizabeth Schmid (53), both from Windsor, and both wrongly attributed to Holbein, seem to be painted in distemper; they exhibit more of the manner of Cranach than Holbein, and are doubtless by a Fleming. They were given by Sir R. Walpole to Queen Caroline, and are Nos. 94 and 95 in Vertue's Catalogue of her pictures, 1743, which does not ascribe them to Holbein. Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk (54), attributed to Holbein, and lent by Mr. Holman Hunt, represents a Flemish bourgeois. It was probably cut out of a votive composition painted long after Holbein's time, in a style and taste opposed to his, and is not in the least like the handsome and martial duke.

Neither is it possible to call Lord Yarborough's Henry VIII. (55) a Holbein. The face has been heavily repainted. The whole is a capital example of the latest class of the king's portraits, and may be compared with No. 126, a less injured and finer picture from Warwick Castle. The dress of cloth of gold, the jewels, pearls, and ornaments of black stones, either jet or obsidian, are splendid illustrations of costume, although they are painted in a laboured and inartistic fashion. Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (51), is much inferior in skill, taste, and pathos to the superb whole-length of the same famous poet at Knole, which was lately at the Academy. Undoubtedly both of them are due to an Italian painter; that before us may have been copied from the other by an assistant. The Knole picture, Mr. Scharf thinks (Archæologia, xxix, pp. 50 and 53), was probably due to the painter of the admirable 'Sir Thomas Gresham,' now at Gresham College, which was No. 105 at the Academy in 1880, and he suggests that they are both by Girolamo da Treviso, who was certainly in England, and known as Toto del Nunziato. Employed in King Henry's service as an engineer as well as painter, he was shot at the siege of Boulogne-sur-Mer in 1544. The picture was not (as the Catalogue says) bought at the sale at Tart Hall in 1720 by Sir R. Walpole, and given to the Duke of Norfolk, but, according to Horace Walpole (letter to Bentley, August 5th, 1752), it was sold to the then duke at the sale of the pictures of Walpole's brother. To attribute it to Stretes is guesswork only; the frame, which is original, is decidedly curious. The Knole picture has no elaborate encadrement like that before us, which may be later than the figure it encloses. However inferior to that at Knole, this is an impressive and beautiful picture so far as it goes. The portrait called Francis I. (56) is nothing of the kind, but resembles his rival, Charles V. No. 62, the very excellent Portrait of a Man, lent by Mr. C. Eastlake, is a capital example of what is wisely called the School of Holbein, and so good, sound, and accomplished that many might not unfairly award it to the master himself. Mr. Scharf suggests that Asper of Zurich, who died in 1571, was the artist; but it seems to us to be somewhat earlier and more primitive in style than that painter's work. The technique is like Holbein's, and accords with that of his time, not being very different from Amberger's; but the expression is weaker than it would be in a Holbein, while the drawing of the eyes is less thorough, the modelling, although skilful, is less intelligent than his, and the forms, fine as they are, are here and there empty.

In Cardinal Fisher (61), lent by the Hon. H. T. Wilson, an intensely devout and ascetic expression has been depicted with peculiarly dry technique. It has almost perished, and the panel is sadly cracked. We hesitate, as we have said, to call Sir J. Millais's Portrait of a Man (67) a Holbein, though it is an admirable and accomplished portrait, delineated with astonishing precision and with firmness worthy of Sir John himself in his Pre-Raphaelite days. Its technique, especially the solid impasto and firm modelling, is quite different from Holbein's at any time, and there is hardly a trace of glazes in the brilliant and surprisingly fresh complexion. No. 70, Sir J. More, may be rightly so named—it resembles the fine likeness in Holbein's great group of the judge's family at Lord St. Oswald's; but it is a very heavily repainted and coarse example of an indifferent German or Swiss artist, and has nothing in common with the art of Holbein. A perfectly genuine Holbein—compare its technique with that of Sir J. Millais's picture (67) on the one hand, and the 'Duchess of Milan' (92) on the other—which has suffered little from time or the restorer, is John Reskemeer (72), the "Cornish gent." of the fine drawing (527), which was, no doubt, the study for it. It is most interesting on account of its style, the peculiar painting of the hair and beard in thin pigments, and the wonderful drawing and modelling of the features. The hands seem to have been touched more than the face; in the background is the branch of a fig tree, often so placed by Holbein, as in the Meier Madonna at Darmstadt. The picture is mentioned in King Charles's Catalogue as No. 30: "Done by Holben, given to the King by the deceased Sir Rob. Killigrew, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen's Majesty. Item. In an old defaced gilded frame, wherein a side-faced gentleman, out of Cornwall, in his black cap, painted with a long peaked beard, holding both his hands before him; some part of a landscape, being less than the life, upon a defaced cracked board, painted upon the wrong light," i.e., the light comes from the left of the person represented. The First Earl of Southampton (77), lent by Major-General F. Sotheby, a much injured work, has not a trace of Holbein, to whom it is attributed.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY. (First Notice.—The Landseers.)

It was a very English idea to start an exhibition illustrating what we call "sport" by pictures, sculptures, old fowling-pieces and other weapons, and "trophies of the chase"; but it is significant of the change in the public taste that, although the authorities in Bond Street could easily have borrowed Wilkies, Landseers, and Mulready's depicting rat-catching, they have not hung a single picture illustrative of that once truly British sport; while cock-fighting, which Hogarth, Zoffany, and a dozen others delineated with much enjoyment, is no more represented here than bear-baiting or bull-baiting, and as for the "noble art of self-defence," Sir Coutts Lindsay's assistants ignore it. Yet it is a pity that, as Landseer supplies the best of the works before us, some of his earlier pictures were not collected, such as Lord Durham's 'Rat-catching,' which would offend the most refined taste even less than the bleeding deer or dying birds of which so many representations are shown.

The first of the Landseers—to take the order of the Catalogue—is No. 4, the solid, animated, firm, and brilliant Study of Heads of cattle, painted about 1830 and from the life, displaying more sense of colour than Landseer usually evinced, and so much character that among Englishmen James Ward only has surpassed him in this respect. There is equal sympathy with the animal world, but the touch is weaker, the draughtsmanship less researchful, and the colour inferior, in a Landseer of 1862, Hunter and Hounds (6), best known by Thomas Landseer's print of 'No Hunting till Weather Breaks,' a group of horses and dogs distinguished by the desponding air of the former and the fidgeting of the latter. Highland Nurses (8) is a first-rate instance of Landseer's sentiment; but here his facile hand and ready brush betrayed the painter into art of a mechanical sort which, although the result is charming in its way, boded ill for his future. Like too many of his works—for example, the famous 'Bolton Abbey in the Olden Time'—this picture has cracked, is cracking, and will continue to crack. Highland Interior (10), a work of 1831, is but a sketch at large with much of Landseer's pseudo-pathos, and as a domestic scene far from real. Like nearly all the pictures from the Holme Wood Collection, Otter and Salmon (45) is much injured by the oiling of its inappropriate oak frame. It is a transition picture of 1841, and familiar to every one in J. R. Jackson's print. The fish is admirable, and the whole work is full of fine colour (a rare charm, as we have said, in Landseer) and wealth of tone. The connoisseur will most enjoy the landscape of water foreshortened through a vast space and the stateliness of the hills beyond. We may pass Not Caught Yet (50), which T. Landseer immortalized in a fine plate, and proceed to No. 64, the so-called Highland Scene, which Sir J. Fowler has lent. It is one of the most striking instances of the painter's intense sympathy with, and poetic perception of, the dramatic pathos in Highland landscape. Few painters have more truly suggested the mournful terror of a gloomy tarn, while the sky owes much to the painter's noble feeling and skilful treatment.

The Sanctuary (67) belongs to Her Majesty, and will survive in Thomas Landseer's and C. G. Lewis's famous prints. Another instance of the sentiment Sir Edwin so often indulged in during the second third of his life, millions have been delighted by the poetry of the steel-like levels of the shallow lake across which the stag has left a track of ripples as he swam. The hills that fade before they darken, the valleys that gather shadows and vapours in the failing light, are both poetical and original elements, the profound stillness of the scene being indicated by the hasty flight landward of the wild ducks whom the deer's coming has disturbed at their nests among the sedges. There is not less art in the conception than in the adaptation of nature to express the leading idea of the picture. The man is dull who fails to see this, and dull indeed is he who does not regret that the light is fading out of this masterpiece. To it was awarded the great gold medal of the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1855, and it was at the International Exhibition, 1862. The scene is, we believe, the coast of Loch Maree, with a low island for a foreground.

When Landseer was commissioned to decorate the Refreshment Room of the House of Commons, he produced the now world-famous Monarch of the Glen (88), and offered it to the nation for 300l.—in fact, for nothing—and only inconceivable stupidity or great magnanimity induced the House to reject this magnificient work, for which Lord Londesborough immediately gave the painter 800 guineas, while for the copyright Mr. Graves paid him 500 guineas. Lord Londesborough sold it, and since then it has fetched 6,000l. at Christie's. It has been engraved twice. The Connoisseurs (115), which was at the Academy in 1865, is the well-known portrait of the artist sketching, while over each shoulder looks a critical colliie and studies his work. The flesh is painty and rather heavy; the puffy forms and ashy complexion betray Sir Edwin's declining health. It belongs to the Prince of Wales, being a souvenir from the painter. Very famous indeed is Children of the Mist (118), a very small picture, which was painted twelve years before No. 115; it was sold to Messrs. Agnew in 1875 for 1,207l. It was at the Academy in 1853, and at Manchester in 1857, where, with Mr. Wallis's 'Death of Chatterton,' it divided the suffrages of admirers of modern pictures. The Queen possesses the original sketch, and Mr. A. Graves tells us that Thomas Landseer considered his plate from it his masterpiece. Sir Edwin used to say that he received more complimentary notes about this picture than about any other.

The Challenge (128), sometimes called 'Coming Events cast their Shadows Before,' and its sequel, called Morning (186), ought surely to have been hung together. The Swannery invaded by [Sea] Eagles (68), the original of Mr. Pratt's fine print we lately admired, is also so well known to our readers that we need only say now that it seems to have gained warmth of colour and softness of tone since we saw it a few months ago. It may be said that with this vigorous picture Sir Edwin's artistic career terminated. In it and other pictures of his later years the painter evidently avoided those treacherous materials which have done so much mischief to his intermediate works. So far as we know, and speaking generally, Landseer's works before 1830-3 and after 1842 are in fairly good condition. 'Shoeing,' now in the National Gallery, painted in 1844, seems to be as sound as 'Fighting Dogs getting Wind,' the picture which, in 1818, brought him into notice when a lad of sixteen.

The "Shrew" Tamed (142) created an immense sensation in 1861. Now it needs a note in the Catalogue explaining that the lady whose portrait is before us tamed vicious horses with such extraordinary success that not Jenny Lind was more run after. The dainty graceful figure in a blue riding habit, lying on the straw, and propped against a horse's flank, has the charm that belongs to forthright, broad, and simple execution, and, so far as it goes, it is to be admired. The resources of Sir Edwin's touch, varied as it was, will be quite understood by those who compare No. 142 with the totally different 'Piper and Pair of Nutcrackers,' 1864, the hat in 'Eos,' 1842, and that skilful handling of the feathers in 'The Cavalier's Pets,' 1845, which is now at South Kensington, and was finished in two days! The Head of "Old Brutus" (146), painted in 1815, is the earliest example here, a fine and vigorously painted head of a rough old white dog, much honoured by all the house of Landseer, which at once showed that the lad who painted it would justify his friends' hopes. The Deerstalker's Return (190), painted in 1827, comes from Alnwick, where we described it in "The Private Collections of England," No. I. Finden's famous plate, one of his best, more than justifies our admiration for the beautiful design of two Highlanders gossiping as they pace homewards on the hillaide, leading ponies laden with slain deer and accompanied by graceful hounds, such as Landseer loved to paint. The composition is in its lines and movements one of the most scientific and graceful we know. It is fine enough for a bas-relief by Flaxman. Browsing (203) is almost in monochrome, and the last Landseer we need commend to the reader. It is well to see how successfully the contributions of our living dog-painter, Mr. Briton Riviere, bear comparison with those of the dead master in this line.

Fine-Art Gossip.

At a general assembly of Academicians and Associates of the Royal Academy, held on Tuesday evening, Mr. Ernest Albert Waterlow, painter, was elected an Associate.

THE Earl of Carlisle has sold to the Duc d'Aumale his invaluable collection of French drawings, portraits drawn in black and red chalks of personages associated with the courts of Henri II., François II., and Henri III., three hundred and fourteen in number, and comprising instances of great value, merit, rarity, and historic interest. They include portraits of Mary, Queen of Scots, Magdalen of France, and François II. by, or attributed to, Janet, lent to the Stuart Exhibition at the New Gallery last year. We described them in No. XXV. of "The Private Collections of England" (Athen. No. 2551, Sept. 16th, 1876). This is the second collection of similar drawings—those formerly in Stafford House having preceded them—which has ceased to belong to an English family. The Earl of Dudley lately sold to Mr. C. Vanderbilt his famous Turner, the 'Grand Canal of Venice,' the price being, it is said, 20,000l. It is added that the purchaser has given the picture to the Metropolitan Museum at New York.

THE Fine-Art Society has appointed to-day (Saturday) for a private view of a collection of drawings of Cambridge and of the Riviera, by Mr. J. Fulleylove. The public will be admitted on Monday next.

TO-DAY (Saturday) has been appointed by Mr. McLean for a private view at his gallery in the Haymarket of paintings of "Cathedral Towns and Picturesque Places in Germany and Italy," by Mr. E. H. Bearne. The public will be admitted on Monday.

THE sum realized by the sale of works of art at the autumn exhibition in the Walker Art Gallery, Liverpool, amounted to 7,515l.

MR. AXMER VALLANCE is writing a series of illustrated articles on church furnishing and decoration from the point of view of taste and common sense. The first of these articles, with eight illustrations, will appear in the February number of the Art Journal.

MR. LOWES DICKINSON's portrait of Lord Napier of Magdala, which is being engraved by Mr. J. C. Webb, is now on view at Messrs. P. & D. Colnaghi's, Pall Mall East. The same painter has nearly completed a portrait of Mr. Thomas Hughes ('Tom Brown'), which will be engraved in due time.

THE sale of the late Mr. F. Tayler's sketches and studies will take place early next month at Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods's. They include landscapes in Scotland, Wales, England, and Brittany, about one hundred and eighty in all, with examples in a manner the present generation does not associate with the painter's name.

THE Rev. J. Woodward is going to publish a volume dealing with the science of heraldry from an ecclesiastical point of view. It will give information as to the armorial insignia of episcopal sees, abbeys, religious foundations, and communities at home and abroad, indicate the various manners in which ecclesiastics of different grades have borne their arms and combined their personal with their official insignia, and describe those ornaments and external additions to the shield by which ecclesiastical ranks and offices are distinguished. The work consists of two parts, the first dealing with the general use of armorial insignia by the ecclesiastics of the Western Church. The second part contains in an enlarged and corrected form the 'Notice of the Arms of the Bishops of Great Britain and Ireland, with Heraldic Notes,' written by the author in illustration of a series of illuminated coats of arms published by Mr.

A. Warren in 1868. This has been long out of print. The continental portion of this section also contains the blazon of the arms of the Popes from 1144 to the present time; an account of the ecclesiastical principalities of the Holy Roman Empire; and historical and heraldic information with regard to the principal sees, religious houses, and chapters in Germany, Italy, France, Poland, and the Low Countries. The number of coats of arms blazoned in the work exceeds eight hundred. In an appendix are given essays on 'The Use of Supporters by Ecclesiastics,' and 'On the Continental Chapters, with their Preuves de Noblesse.'

THE Burlington Fine-Arts Club has opened an exhibition of drawings in water colours and in black and white by the late Mr. Spencer Vincent.

MR. JOSEPH PENNELL writes on the 18th inst.: "May I state in answer to Mr. Henry Blackburn that the passage in my book on 'Pen Drawing,' quoted in to-day's Athenæum, does not call 'for the most emphatic and unqualified denial' which he demands? An illustrated publication similar to Mr. Blackburn's 'Academy Sketches' was issued in Paris in 1869, ten years before the date he mentions, and six years before the starting of his own series."

THE deaths are announced of the French artists MM. Noël Saunier, J. Lefman, and Etienne Guillaumet. The first, a pupil of his father and of Pils, distinguished himself by various paintings, some of which it has been our privilege to praise when they were at the Salons. The second was a capable engraver. The third illustrated that stupendous compilation of M. Alphand, 'Les Promenades de Paris,' which we reviewed some years ago.

THE Musée du Luxembourg, which for some time past has been closed for repairs and rearrangements, was reopened to the public last week.

THE ceiling in three parts of the Salle des Pastels in the Louvre, by M. Hector Leroux, is finished. It illustrates Horace's ode (i. 30) 'Ad Venerem.' Among the figures are Venus, Glycera (dedicating a vase to the goddess), Cupid, the ungrat Graces, Hermes, nymphs, and other personages.

WE are sorry to learn that Hogarth's house at Chiswick, one of the few unrestored relics of the kind now existing, is in a sad state of dilapidation, showing, among other injuries, a hole in the roof and many more signs of ruinous neglect. There ought to be no difficulty in reinstating this little building, purchasing it, and turning it to use as a home for a decayed artist. Surely some of Hogarth's admirers will combine for this end in his honour. Some time ago it was proposed to the Royal Academy to do this; the answer was a sort of "non possumus." Will not the Academicians individually, or one of them as the recipient of subscriptions, take the matter up, save the house from destruction, and bring it again to use? Hogarth's name is honoured in Germany, France, and the United States; surely from these countries, as well as from England, help would come in the form of a few hundred pounds—all that is required. A Scottish namesake restored Hogarth's tomb; other Scotsmen will doubtless help to save his house.

THE two temples of Loeri are now nearly cleared, and it is thus apparent that the Hellenic temple must have been about double the size of the archaic one found beneath at a slightly different orientation. It results from the observations of Dörpfeld and Petersen (Director of the German School in Rome) that the more recent temple is constructed according to the measure of the Samian cubit, which, according to Herodotus, is equal to the larger Egyptian cubit. The intercourse between Samos and Magna Græcia is known to history, an instance of which may be found in an inscription lately discovered at Olympia of a Samian artist from Rhegium. In the interior of the cell of the archaic temple have been found some traces of foundations which Prof. Petersen supposes to be the base of the ancient image worshipped in that temple. Near the middle of the cell of the later temple traces of similar foundations have been found, which may have belonged to the altar. No ancient statues or inscriptions have rewarded these excavations save the marble group of the youth leaning against a horse, which would be now nearly complete except for the missing head of the youth, so that we are left without indication as to whom the temples were dedicated, unless we may assign them to Proserpine, known to have been specially worshipped at Locri. A plan of the temple will be made by Dr. Dörpfeld. A plan of the whole locality will be drawn up by Orsi and De Stefani by order of the Italian Government.

DR. DÖRPFELD, on his return from Locri, started for Cyprus, in order to superintend the excavations of the German Archaeological Institute on the site of the ancient Golgi.

An important discovery of republican remains has just been made in Rome. In cutting a large sewer in the Trastevere, near San Crisogono, where it crosses the Via della Lungaretta, at a depth of 6 mètres, two massive arcades of squared tufo were found, 3 mètres wide, resting on a pier 2.35 mètres wide and 6 mètres deep. The work resembles that of the Servian wall, and certainly belongs to the first age of the republic. The remains are supposed to be those of an ancient viaduct which ran along the right bank of the Tiber over some marshy ground and connected together the Janiculum, Cestian, and Palatine bridges. Other traces of this viaduct have been discovered before in the Via della Lungaretta, which has preserved its direction and original width.

THE Greek Minister of Public Instruction has decided that the fragments of the Cheronæan Lion are to be put together upon the original base.

In the newly discovered tombs near the Place de la Constitution, Athens, upon a skeleton was found a golden ring with a precious stone and a golden earring. In another tomb were found leaves of gold.

NEAR Leucosia, in Cyprus, at the foot of the mound of the Prodomos where formerly stood the ancient temple of Apollo, Herr Richter has found several tombs, in two of which were discovered some statuettes and other objects, some being of gold. A colossal stone lion was discovered at the same time.

MUSIC

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Suite in E minor. By Edward German. (Ashdown.)—We describe this work as being in E minor, as that is the key of the opening movement, but the final tarantella is in A minor, and the other movements, six in all, are in different keys. The suite deserves high praise, being equally remarkable for freshness of idea and musicianly feeling. No better piano music by a young English composer has appeared for some time.—The same publishers send some post-humous works by Stephen Heller, "mises en ordre et terminées par H. Barbedette." They comprise three suites made up of various sketches, six preludes, and a further collection of three sketches. The suites consist of pieces in three-four time, mostly in the manner of waltzes. The others are more varied in character, but not otherwise remarkable. What proportion of the entire series is from the pen of the editor it is impossible to say. At any rate, the trifles are, on the whole, worthy of the deceased composer.

Beethoven's Symphonies, Nos. 1 to 9. Arranged for the Pianoforte by E. Pauer.—Haydn's Symphonies, Nos. 1 to 6. Arranged for the Pianoforte by Max Pauer.—Mozart's Symphonies, Nos. 1 and 2. Arranged for the Pianoforte by Max Pauer. (Augener & Co.)—Transcriptions of symphonies must necessarily be more or less unsatisfactory, but they may be useful to students, and the present series may, therefore, be warmly welcomed, as the limitations of the key-board have been regarded, while the balance of parts in the original scores has been preserved as far as possible. The Haydn symphonies are selected from the 'Salomon' set, and those of Mozart are the works in C ('Jupiter') and G minor.

Tschaikowsky Album (Enoch & Sons) is one of the latest issues of the Litolf edition of pianoforte music, and contains seventeen pieces by the Russian composer, all of them brief, but several highly characteristic and charming. Tschaikowsky's music is not so widely known as it should be, and pianists will find much that cannot fail to please them in this album.

Messrs. Forsyth Brothers send a large number of drawing room pieces. Danse Antique, Graceful Dance, Marche Petite, and A Little Song without Words, by Edmund Rogers, are moderately easy, melodious sketches, written with considerable refinement. Of the same calibre are Knospen und Klänge aus Norden, by Cornelius Gurliitt; Danse de Ballet and Bourrée in C, by Caroline Lowthian; Auf Wiedersehen and A Tar's Song, by George Marsden; and Gavotte in C, by Otto Sondermann. Even quieter and more unassuming are Spring Song, Lullaby, and Berceuse, by Arthur Page.

Second Sonata in G minor, Op. 12; Rustic Suite, Op. 14. By Erskine Allon. (London Music Publishing Company.)—Mr. Allon's sonata has this peculiarity, that the final movement is not in the tonic, but the relative major, that is to say, B flat, otherwise classic usage is adhered to, and structurally as well as thematically we note a welcome advance towards clearness of form and expression on the part of this composer. The opening is curiously reminiscent of recent works by Dr. Parry and Prof. Stanford, and the general style suggests the influence of Brahms. The special effects possible only on the piano have not been much studied, the general feeling being decidedly orchestral. It is difficult to perceive much rusticity in the suite beyond a certain energy which might pass for bucolic brusqueness of manner. The lightness of touch necessary for effect is wanting, and, except for the display of musicianship, the suite cannot be regarded as a successful effort.

From the recent publications of Messrs. Weekes & Co. we may select for favourable mention Reverie in G and The Old Mill in the Valley, by Edwin H. Prout, two light and elegant trifles; the Dickens Series of three little pieces for elementary players, by Clementine Ward; Toccata in E flat, by Wilfred Bendall, a spirited and moderately difficult piece; and Berceuse, by Eugène Wagner, an expressive and somewhat unconventional sketch.

Studies, Book II. By Henri Roubier. (Joseph Williams.)—These studies may be commended as being attractive to the learner by reason of their melodic qualities. In the aggregate they are likely to be beneficial, but they are singularly unequal as regards difficulty, some being as simple as those of Bertini, while one or two could only be mastered by very advanced students. The same composer's Four Sonatinas, in G, F, B flat, and C, are easy and slightly Mozartean in manner, though at times the progressions and the general character of the music are wholly modern.—From the same publisher we have Romance, Ménuet Symphonique, and La Coquette, by G. Bachmann, three unpretentious and tuneful pieces, all in three-four time and in E flat; Queenie, minuet, by Emily B. Farmer, and Cardine, mazurka, by Henry Klusmann, both suitable for elementary players.

The Absence, romance, and The Millwheel, by Herbert Sharpe (Woolhouse), are musicianly, but somewhat dry pieces of moderate difficulty. The second, however, would prove useful as a technical study.—We have also from the same firm Les Contrastes, a piquant gavotte, by Harrison Frewin; La Gioconda and Marche des Mousquetaires, by G. Saint George, both bright and rather vulgar pieces; Bolero in D minor, by Sydney Shaw; Resignation, a sentimental sketch in D flat, by Eugène Wagner; and Two Easy Pieces, for small hands, by Charles A. Trew.

Musical Gossip.

LAST Saturday's Popular Concert was chiefly remarkable for the fact that for the first time in the history of the enterprise the name of Liszt appeared in the instrumental portion of the programme. We have frequently urged a more liberal policy in the conduct of these concerts; but for the exclusion of Liszt for thirty-one years little blame can attach to Mr. Arthur Chappell, for if much pianoforte music of the same nature as the Rhapsodie in C sharp minor, No. 12, were to be introduced, the Popular Concerts would lose their educational value. The fascination of Liszt's personality is no doubt a strong and abiding influence with Herr Stavenhagen, as it was with other pupils of the deceased virtuoso, and the mastery of the instrument evinced in the rendering of the Rhapsodie compelled admiration; but the great gifts of the young pianist would be better displayed in music of a higher class. We must add that Herr Stavenhagen also gave a deeply expressive rendering of Chopin's Prelude in D flat. The concerted works in the programme were Mozart's Quartet in C, No. 1, and Beethoven's Trio in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3. The first appearance of a baritone vocalist, Mr. Norman Salmond, was a success. In airs by Handel and Mr. Hamish MacCunn he displayed a pleasing voice and a good method.

ON Monday a familiar programme was presented, including Beethoven's Quartet in C, Op. 18, No. 2, and Trio in E flat, Op. 70, No. 2; Mendelssohn's Tema con Variazioni for piano and violoncello, Op. 17; and Chopin's Ballade in F minor, No. 4, played by Miss Fanny Davies. Madame Bertha Moore was the vocalist.

THE production of Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette' for the first time in English by the Carl Rosa Company at Liverpool appears to be a striking success. The local papers are enthusiastic concerning Mr. Barton McGuckin as Romeo, Mlle. Zélie de Lussan as Juliet, and Signor Abramoff as the Friar, while the remaining parts are said to be all well filled. The mise en scène is the same as that of Covent Garden last season, and the orchestra and chorus (the latter strengthened by the Liverpool Opera Society) are praised in the highest terms. The work will, of course, be performed at Drury Lane when the company commences its season at Easter.

THE Royal Choral Society's performance of 'Elijah' on Wednesday was chiefly remarkable for the number of young vocalists who were entrusted with the solo parts. Miss Monteith made a favourable impression in the soprano music, her voice being of pleasant quality and well produced, though not particularly powerful. Miss Sarah Berry, a young mezzo-soprano, also showed much promise, and Mr. Henry Piercy did well, especially in the earlier portion of the work. Of Madame Belle Cole and Mr. Henschel nothing need be said. The choir, as usual, sang in a manner that left no room for criticism.

At the first of Mr. Dannreuther's Musical Evenings, on Thursday last week, a new Pianoforte Trio in E flat, by Prof. Villiers Stanford, was performed for the first time. The work is numbered Op. 35, and we therefore presume it is published, but the score is not at present before us, and it would be unjust to attempt an assessment of the merits of the trio after a first hearing. So far as could be judged it contains a larger measure of spontaneity than was discovered in Prof. Stanford's instrumental works produced last year, and in form it is fairly orthodox, though it contains no regular slow movement, the two middle sections being an allegretto con moto in a minor and a tempo di menuetto in c. In the finale the composer follows Schumann's example in his E flat Quintet, by commencing in the relative minor of the tonic. The trio deserves a more public hearing whenever opportunity shall serve. The rest of the programme consisted of Bach's Suite in B minor for strings and flute, pianoforte solos by Chopin, and Lieder by Liszt and Brahms, rendered by Miss Anna Williams.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association performed Prof. Stanford's 'The Revenge,' Dr. Bridge's 'Callirhoë,' and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, under the direction of Mr. Prout, on Monday evening, at the Shoreditch Town Hall. The choral works suffered owing to the fact that a large number of the choir were absent through influenza; but it is only fair to say that deficiency of power was the sole defect in the performance of 'Callirhoë.' Full justice was rendered to the solo parts by Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Mary Chamberlain, and Mr. Charles Kenningham.

THE eighth of the London Ballad Concerts took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The best feature of the programme was the extremely refined part-singing of Mr. Eaton Fanning's select choir.

THE Bristol Festival Choir commenced rehearsing last Thursday. The full programme for next October's festival is not yet decided, but among the works likely to be included are Handel's 'Theodora' and Dr. Hubert Parry's 'Judith.'

THE first of the three vocal recitals announced by Miss Marguerite Hall and Mr. W. Nicholl to take place on Tuesday last was postponed, as Miss Hall is suffering from a severe attack of influenza.

IN consequence of the great success of the first performance, Handel's 'Theodora' was repeated at Sir Charles Halle's Manchester concert on Thursday, with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Lucille Saunders, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Pierpoint as the principal vocalists.

A MEETING was held at the German Athenæum on Saturday last on behalf of the Beethoven Haus Society in Bonn, Sir George Grove occupying the chair. The musicians present seemed to concur in the view that the establishment of the museum in the great composer's birthplace was a matter of international interest, and it was ultimately resolved that, if possible, an orchestral concert should be given, under the direction of Herr Joachim, the proceeds to be handed over to the Bonn society for the object above mentioned.

At last there is a definite scheme for the rebuilding of the Paris Opéra Comique on the Place Boieldieu. M. Fallières, the Minister of Fine Arts, is about to present a project for the purpose, and if agreed to by both Chambers the work will be commenced in April, and completed by the end of 1891. The cost is estimated at nearly 160,000*l.*

THE death is announced of Baltasar Saldoni, one of the most remarkable musicians Spain has produced in the present century. M. Pouglin, in his supplement to Fétis and also in this week's Ménestrel, speaks in the highest terms of his compositions, which, unfortunately, are quite unknown in this country. Saldoni wrote many Italian and Spanish operas, an immense number of masses, cantatas, and other vocal works, about forty songs, a method for the voice which is adopted at the Madrid Conservatoire, and a 'Dictionary of Spanish Musicians' in five volumes, the last of which brings the work up to date, and is not yet published. Saldoni was eighty-three years old at the time of his death.

WE have also to record the death of Franz Lachner, the most celebrated of a family of musicians. Even in the lifetime of Schubert, with whom he was intimate, he was regarded as a talented musician, and at the age of twenty-three became Kapellmeister of the Kärntnertheater in Vienna, and nine years later Hofkapellmeister at Munich. In 1865, when he was sixty-one years old, he retired. His fecundity as a composer was immense, but he had little inspiration, and his music is now rarely heard, at any rate out of Germany. Lachner had attained the age of eighty-six years.

SOME months since we announced the intention of Herr Rubinstein to inaugurate a series of competitions between young musicians for prizes of considerable value. The first of the series will take place in August next, when two prizes will be offered of 200*l.* each, one for the composition of a concertstück for piano and orchestra, a sonata for piano alone or with one stringed instrument, or a series of short pieces for piano; the other for a pianist, who will be called upon to execute various works by Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann, and Liszt. Competitors may be of any nationality, but must be between the ages of twenty and twenty-six. Further particulars may be gained on application to the Conservatoire at St. Petersburg.

THE number of new operas produced in Italy last year is set down as thirty-three. This is below the average, and many of the works were merely operettas.

THAT 'Die Meistersinger' is a failure at La Scala there is no longer any room for doubt. Five performances were given to steadily diminishing audiences, and now the work has been shelved in favour of 'Un Ballo in Maschera.' To those who have any knowledge of Milanese audiences there is nothing to cause surprise in this. The public that hooted Boito's 'Mefistofele' off the stage was not likely to accept Wagner's humorous masterpiece.

ANOTHER instance of Rubinstein's generosity is reported from St. Petersburg. He has bestowed on the Conservatorium in that place and on the Russian Imperial Society of Music all the gifts in money which he has received on the occasion of his recent jubilee celebration.

THE Beethoven Society at Bonn has acquired the last pianoforte used by the composer. The instrument was made expressly for him by Conrad Graff.

THE Berliner Musik Zeitung has ceased to appear, after an existence of forty-three years.

AN important sale of autograph musical manuscripts has lately been held in Berlin. Schubert's Overture to 'Fierabras' realized 14*l.* 10*s.*; Wagner's overture 'Polonia,' arranged for piano with the words and music of a French romance, 16*l.*; and minor compositions of Schubert, Beethoven, and Schumann, 8*l.* 10*s.*, 3*l.* 15*s.*, and 3*l.* 14*s.* respectively.

Dramatic Gossip.

THE public will be gratified to learn that some concluding records of her life by Mrs. Kemble are shortly to be published by Mr. Bentley.

A NOVEL experiment will be tried by Mr. Henry Irving and Miss Ellen Terry at the close of the present season at the Lyceum. This will consist of a series of readings of 'Macbeth' with an accompaniment of Sir Arthur Sullivan's music.

'ACROSS HER PATH,' a four-act drama by Miss Annie Irish, produced on Tuesday afternoon at Terry's Theatre, is an adaptation of a novel by Miss Annie Swan. It begins with tolerable freshness, and is fairly constructed from the point of view of melodrama, but soon loses its grip on the audience. For the falling off in interest the conduct of the heroine, who by a display of painful weakness challenges the misfortunes which come upon her, is mainly responsible. Miss Irish, who designed the heroine for herself, shows some emotional power, but is seen to less advantage than in comedy. Miss Le Thière and Mrs. E. H. Brooke gave faithful portraits of elderly characters.

AFTER many postponements 'The Taming of the Shrew' was given on Thursday at the Globe Theatre.

Not too admirable from any but a spectacular point of view is the revival by the Daly Company in New York of 'As You Like It.' As the performance, if successful, was likely to have been seen in London, some interest attends the announcement. It is easily conceivable that Miss Rehan is less suited to Rosalind than to Katherine. If Scott were to come once more into fashion, she would be an ideal Di Vernon.

ONE more "variety actress" from America is to be seen in London. This is Miss Annie Pixley, who is to appear in an American piece, entitled 'The Deacon's Daughter.'

TERRY'S THEATRE will open next month under Miss Cissy Grahame with a satirical comedy by Mr. Jerome, in which Mr. Penley and Miss Gertrude Kingston will appear.

MISS WALLIS will reappear in the autumn in a drama written specially for her by Mr. Buchanan.

'THE HOME FEUD' is the title bestowed on a new play by Mr. Walter Frith, which is to be produced on February 14th at the Comedy. Misses Gertrude Kingston, May Whitty, and Eva Moore, and Messrs. Rodney, Stewart Dawson, Nutcombe Gould, and Gardiner are also in a cast which formerly comprised Miss Beatrice Lamb, whose engagement at the St. James's stands in the way of her appearance.

BYRON'S comedy 'Uncle Dick's Darling' was played on Saturday last at Toole's Theatre, with Mr. Toole in his original part of Dick Dolland, with Miss Vanbrugh in Miss Neilson's character of Mary Belton, and Mr. Billington as the successor of Mr. Irving in Chenevix. 'The Birthplace of Podgers' of Mr. Hollingshead, with Mr. Toole as Tom Cranky, was the afterpiece. On Monday 'The Butler' was revived.

AFTER a run of close upon seven hundred nights, 'Sweet Lavender' is this night withdrawn from Terry's Theatre.

THE death, in Australia, is announced of Philip Beck, a young actor, who played for a while in London, and left behind him on his departure the record of a curious feat in the recitation from memory at the Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, of Coleridge's tragedy of 'Remorse.'

THE acting rights of 'Le Pater' of M. François Coppée, recently interdicted in Paris, have been acquired by Mr. Hare.

THE dramatic rights for Great Britain of 'Prince and Pauper,' by Mr. Samuel L. Clemens (Mark Twain), have been secured by Mrs. Oscar Beringer.

Correspondence of Princess Lieven and Earl Grey. Edited and translated by Guy Le Strange. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

THESE letters are by no means uninteresting, but there are too many of them. Two bulky volumes, with the prospect of a third, are a rather severe trial for the patience of the most leisurely of readers; and we cannot help thinking that Mr. Le Strange would have been better advised if he had considerably increased his excisions of "portions of some of the letters where the writers had made repetitions, or had dilated at length on the subject of the weather, personal health, and other matters of merely ephemeral interest." As it is, the inquiries after Princess Lieven's colds and the comments on yesterday's rain tend to become somewhat wearisome; and even where more important events are chronicled the news has by this time become exceedingly stale, and might well have been relegated to an explanatory foot-note. But though he has been too sparing of the editorial file, Mr. Le Strange has otherwise done his work very thoroughly. His translation of the lady's share of the correspondence is idiomatic and graceful, and his connecting remarks are always accurate and to the point. In short, there have been many worse, though few less pretentious editors than Mr. Le Strange.

Princess Lieven, or as she was commonly called Madame de Lieven, the wife of the Russian ambassador, is frequently mentioned in the Greville journals. She played a great part in English society for several years, and combined the functions of a leader of fashion with those of an important, though unofficial agent of the Russian court. The rôle must have been a difficult one, and it is greatly to her credit that she should have contrived to keep on terms of intimacy with the leaders of both parties without violations of confidences, and have forwarded the policy of her Government without appearing to meddle unduly with English affairs. Not that she did not occasionally make enemies. A quarrel with the Duke of Wellington is mentioned rather obscurely by Greville, and from the present correspondence it may be gathered that the rupture took place in 1829, and was occasioned by the discussions on the candidates for the Greek throne. But its real cause seems to have been an impression, entertained alike by the Duke and by Lord Aberdeen, the Foreign Secretary, that both husband and wife, especially the wife, were "much too deep," and that it was in consequence desirable that there should be a change at the Russian Embassy. Of course Madame de Lieven represented herself as the victim of wholly groundless calumny, created by her disinterested friendship for Lord Grey. "The present Government," she writes on December 28th,

"have taken umbrage at my intimacy with you, and the King is in a bad humour for the same cause. The Duke of Wellington would be very glad to be rid of us, and if I am correctly informed, he has already let his wishes be known at Petersburg.... You cannot imagine with what avidity the Duke of Wellington swallows all the gossip they tell him about me. The informers, to keep up their credit, have to make their stories interesting, and since my dignity will not allow me to make any justification, or even explanation—unless it be asked of me—the result is, the tale-bearers have it all their own way. It is a thousand pities great men take pleasure in small things, and believe all that is told them."

There is rather too much protest here and not enough proof. Later on, Lord Palmerston, according to Greville, also came to the conclusion that Madame de Lieven wanted to be "taken down a peg," and by that altitude she was accordingly reduced. She seems to have meddled with the choice of an English ambassador to St. Petersburg, and in particular to have tried to prevent the nomination of Stratford Canning, whom she knew to be obnoxious to the Czar. Lord Palmerston resented her interference, and "to punish her" Canning was gazetted. The result was, as is well known, that Nicholas refused to receive the English ambassador, and he seems also to have vented his displeasure on his agents who had failed to avert the appointment. The Lievens were shortly afterwards recalled without much ceremony, and the second volume of the correspondence closes with mutual condolences—from Lord Grey on account of Madame de Lieven's approaching departure, and from the princess because of the statesman's resignation of office, which, by a somewhat odd coincidence, occurred just as she was making her adieus.

It is, however, the habit of ladies, especially of ladies who, as was evidently the case with Madame de Lieven, possess quick sympathies and ready tongues, to be betrayed into occasional excesses of zeal; and the wonder is not that she made mistakes, but that she did not make constant mistakes. She appears, indeed, to have used plain speaking, not subterfuge, as her most effective weapon, and it is clear that the Russian diplomatess of reality and the Russian diplomatess of say, M. Sardou, have very little in common—as, perhaps, one might expect. In the preface Mr. Le Strange gives an extract from a letter of the princess to the Duke of Sutherland, to whose custody the correspondence was entrusted, in which she says of Earl Grey and herself that they had been throughout "lui très anglais, moi très russe." And in another passage she remarks that her letters were "très intimes, plus intimes que les siennes." Certainly, if she knew when to flatter, she knew also when to reprimand. Greville, who would appear, by the way, to have known nothing about this correspondence, though in later years he himself became the recipient of Madame de Lieven's epistles, noted down that she once told the earl in public that he "was naturally all that is right-minded and good, but was supposed to be influenced against his own better judgment by those about him." Similar admonitions were addressed to him very frequently in private. In particular he was given to understand that the actions of Russia and her Czar were superior to criticism, and that any hint that the invasion of Turkey was prompted by a desire for territorial acquisitions would be promptly resented. "Well, my dear Lord," she writes in 1827, "I, for my part, shall consider as personal anything you may say having a tendency to embarrass the fulfilment of the treaty [of July], which I consider the sheet-anchor of Greek independence." She even provoked from him the reply:—

"Well, you threaten me, and it is to me a severe threat, that if I take the part which it is my duty to take in the affairs of Greece you will consider it a personal offence. I must submit to the penalty if I should be so unfortunate as to incur it; but in my turn I must add, not a threat, but the expression of a resolution equally firm, and equally sincere, that if our friendship is broken off on this ground it can never be renewed."

This is by no means the only collision of opinion which occurred during the ten years (1824-34) covered by the correspondence now published, and Madame de Lieven was invariably the aggressor. But the differences were soon made up, through the natural expedient of agreeing to differ. In fact, it is evident that, however the curious friendship may have sprung up, it was not long before the two had become indispensable to one another. Madame de Lieven throughout her life loved to pose as an Egeria, and Lord Grey was by far the best Numa to be found in England, as M. Guizot was afterwards in France. The Duke of Wellington, as she must have known, would not have endured an Egeria; he preferred pretty and rather foolish women, and there is a good deal to be said for his taste. She also revelled in political and semi-political gossip, and loved receiving letters only one degree less than she loved writing them. Nor was her pride in her powers altogether misplaced, though it is absurd to mention her, as Greville does, in the same breath with Madame de Sévigné. Her compliments were well turned and not too obvious; she knew how to state her case well, and when she begged the question did so with discretion; and in the matter of style, if she was seldom brilliantly epigrammatic—and it should be remembered that we are dealing with a translation—she was often neatly humorous. Thus she writes in March, 1831:—

"We had the Duke of Wellington to dinner. He showed no bitterness, but seemed quite confident of the rejection of the Reform Bill. And when I asked him if this would not lead to serious commotions in the country, he answered me, 'Bah! Bah! It does not appear to me a very powerful argument.'"

If Lord Grey was necessary to Madame de Lieven, Madame de Lieven was equally necessary to Lord Grey. He was naturally a despondent man, who felt the need of an optimistic adviser; he was also naturally a reserved man, who found it difficult to give confidences, and was, therefore, additionally grateful to any one who would meet him half way. Possibly he got on with women better than he did with men; that sort of person often does. And though nominally the leader of a great party, he was during the years 1824-30 really in a condition of political isolation. "I am myself alone," he writes, and Madame de Lieven, in ignorance apparently that the phrase was a quotation from the Divine Williams, thinks it exceedingly happy. His loneliness was almost complete after he had declined to follow the example of Lord Lansdowne and other important Whigs, and become a member of Canning's administration. His reasons for refusing support were given in a speech delivered on May 10th, 1827, and might have been stated by Mr. Le Strange, as they would clear much that otherwise must be rather obscure to the general reader. They comprised a powerful indictment of Canning's Liberalism. The Prime Minister, said Lord Grey, affected to be a friend of civil and religious liberty, yet he was opposed to parliamentary reform and to the repeal of the Test Act, he was a supporter of the punishment of political libel by transportation, and a friend of Catholic Emancipation only to the extent of allowing it to remain an open question, i.e., it was excluded as a measure of Government. As to Canning's foreign policy, the earl showed that the famous boast of calling the New World into existence to redress the balance of the Old was an empty flourish; the South American republics, he said, had been called into existence by their own exertions, and even against Canning's will, if declarations went for anything, while the suppression of the constitutional cause in Spain by French arms might have been prevented instead of connived at.

Lord Grey was a man of very fixed principles, and the death of Canning did not cause him to lay aside his hostility to Canningism. Indeed, when the Duke of Wellington's administration had been purged of Canning's disciples it found in the earl an extremely lenient critic. He was, indeed, too suspicious of Russia, despite his correspondent's constant assurances that the Czar did not covet "an inch of territory," to be particularly indignant with the duke and Lord Aberdeen for their curtailment of Greek liberties. He declined to believe that the duke was guilty, as rumour stated, of forcing the Polignac ministry upon France, though he fully endorsed Madame de Lieven's shrewd prophecy, "I think the end of it all may well be the final overthrow of the Bourbons," as, in fact, it proved. He was even disposed to view with tolerance the contradictions in which the duke and Lord Aberdeen were involved through their half-hearted handling of the Portuguese difficulty, nor had Madame de Lieven any very decided opinions on the knotty question. In fact, her enthusiasm for the monarchical principle was tempered throughout by her hatred of Metternich, and she was, perhaps, swayed in this particular instance by the consideration that Palmella, the champion of Donna Maria, was one of her own most devoted admirers.

If Lord Grey was favourably disposed towards the foreign policy of the duke's Cabinet—which, to tell the truth, was not brilliant—he was equally disposed to give them credit for honourable motives when they suddenly determined to carry Catholic Emancipation. There is a ring of true patriotism in the following sentences, written in August, 1828:—

"If the Duke of Wellington sets to work in earnest to settle the question of Ireland, I do not think it at all improbable that Peel will retire—that is for a time. I should think better of him if he had the manliness to keep his office, and to avow a change of opinion, which there are so many reasons to justify.....I, for one, thinking this question so much the most important of any that we now have to consider, should not hesitate to avow myself a supporter of the minister who had the power and the wisdom to carry a measure so essential to the entity of the British empire. Against this Greece, Portugal, and Constantinople are, in my opinion, of little weight in the balance."

He was almost prepared to accept the duke in the character of a parliamentary reformer. "This would be, as Sefton would say, 'Good fun.'"

So little of a party man had Lord Grey become, that it is evident from these letters that if a fair offer had been made to him there were occasions on which he would have been by no means indisposed to accept office under the duke. The fact was tolerably well known before, but it comes out very clearly in his unreserved confidences to his intimate friend. But the offer never came—partly, no doubt, from the duke's love of autocracy, but partly also from the determination of the king to exclude Grey from office, a determination which dated from the quarrel in connexion with the Regency Bill of 1811. Accordingly he remained until the eve of his accession to power in melancholy seclusion, loath to leave Howick for London in spite of Madame de Lieven's presence there, and reduced to rely upon her for information about the opposition that was being organized against the tottering Government, and about the duke's attempts to lure back the errant Canningites into the fold. There is a curious letter of his, dated December 29th, 1829, in which he professes himself unable to act with (1) the king, by whom he was proscribed; (2) the Duke of Wellington, whom he had supported to a certain extent, but whose general policy was opposed to his; (3) the ultra-Tories; (4) Huskisson and his clique; (5) the friends of Canning—the distinction between the last two factions seems rather minute, but what is probably meant is that the Canningites who had accepted office under the duke were regarded as a separate body from those who had not; (6) the remnant of the Grenvilles; (7) "the divided, though more numerous, members of the old Opposition [i.e., the Whigs], with Lord Lansdowne, &c., whose views and whose policy I find it difficult to define, but whom I see no prospect at present of uniting in any consistent and vigorous course of action." When one considers that all these discordant elements, with the exception of the followers of Wellington, were united in the Grey Government—for the Duke of Richmond was an ultra-Tory—it is not difficult to see how it was that that Government's existence was not very protracted. Lord Grey himself also appears throughout the correspondence as a respectable rather than a great leader, calculated to inspire regard rather than to arouse enthusiasm, and too moderate, perhaps too indifferent, at heart to carry a series of great reforms. But of this, again, the ordinary political student is already aware, though he will perhaps be surprised to find how seldom reform is mentioned, previous to the autumn of 1830, by the Premier who carried the Reform Bill.

No new light is thrown in these letters on the great constitutional struggle of 1830-32. There is, however, a curious suggestion thrown out by the princess when the conflict was at its height: "Keep Peel in your mind; everything is possible." And the earl's reply is no less curious: "As to the matter of Peel, I think there is a good deal in what you say; and I have no indisposition towards him." Yet the correspondence turns for the most part upon foreign affairs, varied occasionally with some decorous scandal about the Duke of Cumberland or Lady Jersey, and in the July revolution, the revolt of Belgium against the King of the Netherlands, and the civil war in Portugal, the correspondents found abundant topics of discussion. Upon all these questions Lord Grey's Liberalism left nothing to be desired, and he was most outspoken against the attempts of Russia to hinder the accomplishment of Belgian independence. But with regard to the insurrection in Poland his attitude was one of painful indecision. The princess attempted to carry matters with a high hand; she received Lord Grey's feeble suggestions that something ought to be done for the Poles in anything but a conciliatory spirit, and she induced him to substitute "contest" for "war" in the paragraph in the King's Speech which dealt with foreign affairs, whereby the Poles were degraded from belligerents into rebels. It was not until an angry protest was lodged by Prince Lieven, and endorsed by the princess, against Lord Grey's invitation of the Polish envoy, Prince Czartoryski, to dinner, that he ventured to assert himself. Then he fired up, and gave the princess to understand that she had gone too far. But a meal to a solitary refugee was, after all, a cold consolation to a nation in extremities, and Lord Grey should clearly have made up his mind either to throw the influence of England into the scale, or to refrain altogether from half-hearted protests and platonic expressions of sympathy with the oppressed. On the whole, however, he appears in the correspondence in a favourable light, and if the present publication does not add much to his reputation it certainly does not do it any injury.

Records of a Quaker Family: the Richardsons of Cleveland. By A. O. Boyce. (Harris & Co.)

THIS book was designed by Mrs. Boyce to be a biography of three sisters who belonged to the Society of Friends, Elizabeth, Mary, and Hannah Richardson. But it has expanded into a family history of the Richardsons of Cleveland, from whom are descended Thomas Richardson (the founder of the firm of Overend & Gurney), the Rown-trees of York, the Stickneys of Ridgmont, the Peases of Darlington, and many members of the Quaker aristocracy. The volume is discursive; but it proceeds to its goal in its own equable manner, without haste, exaggeration, or artificiality, and with a simplicity which cannot fail to please. One of the highest gifts which, speaking from a literary point of view, a writer can display is that of adapting the treatment to the subject. And this harmony of subject and manner is the charm of Mrs. Boyce's 'Records of a Quaker Family.'

In what does the peculiar fascination of Quaker biographies consist? The question sets one thinking. The male members of the Society had about them a quiet depth of character, an uprightness, integrity, and fixity of purpose which seemed to be their birthright. Homely they might be; vulgar they could not be. The women seemed to enjoy, as their special heritage, a reserve and delicacy which appeared in their dress (who, we may ask with Charles Lamb, ever saw a Quaker with a soiled glove?), a placidity of mind, a calm dignity, a cheerful equability of temper. Plain a Quaker woman may be in her attire, jaunty never. The Society had the art of producing nature's gentlemen and gentlewomen. At home or abroad, their tranquillity of mind, whatever its source, lifted them above the pettinesses of society, and even smoothed the rough places of their lives. A fragrance hovers about the pages which tell of the well-ordered households and useful, innocent lives of Quakers of former generations, like the faint scent of lavender which lingers round the spotless linen of old-fashioned, careful housewives.

The record opens in the year 1684 with the marriage of William Richardson, of Ayton in Cleveland, to Elizabeth Wilson. The Quakers were then a despised and persecuted sect. Only those whose convictions were strong, and who strove to attain a high spirituality of life, joined the Society of George Fox. Now they furnish their quota of magistrates, judges, and high sheriffs; then they were more likely to be brought as culprits before those formidable officials. But the key-note, as it were, of the Quaker character is struck in the lives of William and Elizabeth Richardson. They passed staunchly through a time of trial. Repeated fines for refusing oaths robbed them of a third of their annual income. Yet they adhered to the course of which their consciences approved with a quiet patience that extorted the respect of high and low among their neighbours. They had twelve children. From their mother the sons and daughters received a careful training; from their father they inherited considerable wealth as well as an honest and honourable name. The household was strictly, yet not sternly governed. One of the sons has recorded how "much endeavour was used that we might take delight in our books, and in doing any little turns, if but innocent, though of little service. When very young, to play a little was allowed, but not on the first day of the week, which Christians have set apart for worship. And to play for anything, were it but for a pin or a cherry-stone, is better let alone. Childer have pride enough in overdoing one another without playing for anything. Though she [the mother] had such care over us, lest we should do wrong, yet she behaved to us, when we did amiss, as she advised us to do to one another and to all; not to give one bad word for another, but to endeavour to overcome evil with good. 'Railing did but add fuel to the fire,' she often said, but 'a soft answer turneth away wrath.' If one said 'It is,' and another said 'It is not,' there was a fault, because one must be wrong. To say 'I will' or 'I will not' was not to be in practice, because of the uncertainty of all things."

The spirit which ruled this well-regulated household governed the business transactions of the family. William Richardson, who was a tanner by trade, added a malt kiln to his ventures. His profits were considerable; but Mrs. Richardson advised her husband to discontinue his malt trade. We quote once more the son:—

"I can remember (although thy father and I were so young that we were not fit to go anywhere with a horse) her saying to our father, 'If these lads live, and this malt kiln be kept on, they may likely be sent to alehouses with malt, and if they should get a habit of drinking, what will all that we can get signify? Let us part with it. I have no fear that Providence will provide for us and them if we do as we ought. Let us be content with the tanning trade.'"

From the family of William and Elizabeth Richardson sprang the different persons whose lives are recorded in this volume down to 1870. But the interest of the book for general readers lies less in the marriages of the Richardsons than in the quaint sidelights that their history throws upon social life, upon Quaker character, and upon persons whose names are more famous than those of the comparatively obscure but useful members of the family.

We read, for instance, of husbands and wives riding "double horse" from Yorkshire to London, of rude mobs at Whitby breaking the windows and destroying the property of Quakers because they refused to illuminate their houses on occasions of public rejoicings, and of the fierce opposition which was made to the proposal to light the streets of North Shields. This last "project was thought most revolutionary, and a crowded meeting was held to oppose it. Eloquence might be lacking amongst the opponents of change, but strength of lungs was present in full force, and the strugglers for light were howled down."

A testimonial was, it is said, presented to one worthy who stood upon a form and shouted "'Nee leets! nee leets!' with deafening vigour." A public library was introduced into North Shields in 1807. While the founders were arranging their books, one of the Philistines entered the room, and, scowling on the group, said, "Men of Shields, what business have you with any books but your ledgers?" The same dislike to change showed itself in other ways. When, forty years ago, champagne was introduced by some new-comers at an evening party, heads were gravely shaken. "No good would come of it. The old set had never had champagne at their parties." Political passions ran high among this rough but generous population:—

"In 1820 an angry mob swept through Dockray Square in North Shields, the leader carrying a green bag stuffed with straw. This was taken to a waste place and burned with every mark of execration."

It was thus that the people expressed their sympathy with Queen Caroline. With the advance of education came a change in thought as well as manners, which might be illustrated in many ways. One will suffice. A working man of Sunderland had, late in life, learnt to read. "How nice it will be for him to read the Bible!" said a lady visitor to the man's wife. "Oh, the Bible, ma'am!" was the reply. "He has got far past the Bible! He reads the papers."

Many quaint illustrations of Quaker character might be culled from this volume, as well as many curious facts respecting celebrated men of the past and present. William Tuke, Dr. Fothergill, Dr. Aikin, William Howitt, Mason, Lindley Murray, John Bright, and Mr. Gladstone, not to mention a crowd of other celebrities, pass through these pages. Desultory and devoid of any very striking features as the volume is, all those who, like Charles Lamb, "love the early Quakers," should read Mrs. Boyce's 'Records of a Quaker Family.'

Life of General Lafayette. With a Critical Estimate of his Character and Public Acts. By Bayard Tuckerman. 2 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)

ALTHOUGH it is said that there are over three hundred books in existence having Lafayette for their principal subject, we do not know that there has been heretofore any single work of value which could be strictly called a biography of him. Few historical figures are more familiar to Americans than the "hero of two worlds," and no account either of the American and French Revolutions, or of the movements of the human race in general during the half century between 1780 and 1830, can be imagined which should not accord to him a certain prominence. Yet somehow, no matter how much the chronicle has to say about him, he always produces the effect of a subordinate character in a drama, serving as a foil to greater and more striking people, and continually being lost to sight in the interest aroused by the stupendous catastrophes and exciting situations he has been employed to bring about. Mr. Tuckerman's effort to keep General Lafayette resolutely in the foreground, and make all the great personages and vast events of his time mere helps to a study of the man, has, therefore, the attraction of novelty. It is new work, too, in the sense that it confessedly takes much of its colour from 'The Diary and Correspondence of Gouverneur Morris,' published so recently as 1888. This is in more respects than one unfortunate. Mr. Morris, although the official representative of the United States in Paris, was curiously out of touch with the political feelings of his own countrymen, like Jefferson and Madison, and never had any sympathy with even the earliest and least violent phases of the French Revolution. He was, indeed, at open issue with Jefferson and the French popular party before even the fall of the Bastille. It is clear that the comments of an observer occupying such a standpoint furnish an extremely unsafe foundation for estimates of Lafayette's actions and character. Yet Mr. Tuckerman not only pays an unpleasant amount of deference throughout his book to these captious and unsympathetic comments, but he quite obviously allows them to influence his own views of his subject. To find an American author, for example, characterizing the visit to Paris and the Hôtel de Ville which Louis XVI. made on July 17th, 1789, to approve the nominations of Lafayette and Bailly, as an act of "lasting injury to the cause of good government in France," is, at the least, confusing. The French Revolution is a subject upon which able and sincere men will doubtless continue to differ indefinitely; but one does not look to the Transatlantic Republic for declarations that one of Louis's first reluctant steps towards recognition that there were any rights in France except his own was injurious to the cause of good government. There is scarcely any European writer of reputation, even in the most legitimist of continental countries, who would have ventured upon such a statement, and Mr. Tuckerman would surely not have made it save under the misleading influence of dead-and-gone Gouverneur Morris, who was greatly concerned about his social relations with the fine folk at Versailles, and cared little whether famine ravaged the provinces or not.

The public career of Lafayette, which was spent under two republics and seven different sovereigns, not to speak of five years under the more rudimentary control of a gaol governor, had a most whimsical beginning. Late in 1776 the Duke of Gloucester, then a man of thirty-three, who had been for ten years more or less an exile on account of his marriage with the Countess of Waldegrave, happened in his wanderings to visit Metz, and to dine with the officers of the garrison. Being naturally hostile to his brother George III. and to his ministers, the duke related with high glee what he had heard about certain rebels in America, who had successfully defied his brother, driven out a British army, and generally humiliated the people to whom the duke owed a grudge. A tall youth of nineteen, thin, red-headed, and awkward, but the chief of an ancient and noble family, heard this odd narrative, and caught from it, strangely enough, the spark for a flame of lifelong enthusiasm. Lafayette's decision to go and help these people struggling to be free seems to have been spontaneous. He had not been especially successful in interesting himself at home. Once Marie Antoinette had enlisted him among the select little coterie who performed amateur plays and danced quadrilles in costume at court; but this amusement had not been to his liking. The American adventure was, and he triumphed over or evaded such attempts as were made to prevent his embarking on it. Very little fighting fell to his share in the American army—indeed, history takes note of no other celebrated general anywhere who came so near being guiltless of shedding blood in warfare; but he typified a great deal that was welcome to the American mind, and when he returned to France at the completion of the war no laurelled victor could have been greeted with more enthusiasm. He had honestly admired the democratic institutions of America, and he was the close personal friend of the principal American statesmen. Quite naturally he assumed a prominent position in the movement which began to agitate France by reflex influence from America. His bold demand in 1787 for a National Assembly was practically the beginning of the Revolution, and for the moment he promised to be the chief man in France. On the fall of the Bastille two years later he was made Commander of the National Guard; and thus at thirty-two he had the most powerful position in the kingdom. For two years he kept this post, yet he was quite overshadowed by Mirabeau (who called him "Cromwell-Grandison"), and proved after all to be nothing more than a sort of magnified policeman—preventing excesses when he was able to reach the spot in time, but not really affecting the drift of events against the will of stronger men. When he was sent to command on the frontier one of what Carlyle calls "those three moulting crane-flights of armies," he did no fighting, and after six months or so was declared a traitor by the Mountain. Thereupon he fled across the frontier, and was promptly imprisoned by the Austrians as a Jacobin. Bonaparte got him out of prison, and both as First Consul and Emperor displayed much anxiety to please him and to win his support; but Lafayette held aloof, and made no secret of his hostility to the Empire. After Waterloo his was the most vehement voice in the Chamber of Deputies which compelled Napoleon to abdicate, and handed over the control of the executive to Fouché. Lafayette's abiding passion throughout had been the making of constitutions which everybody applauded and nobody obeyed. He had helped to overthrow Louis XVI. for this; had quarrelled with Napoleon because he did not see the need of a constitution; and now he did what in him lay to make constitutions for the embarrassment of the Bourbons he had aided to bring back. It was in the name of still a new constitution that he figured as an aged man in the revolt of 1830, and placed his constitutional ideal, Louis Philippe, on the throne. He died four years later, despondent over the accumulating indications that even this constitution would prove waste paper.

This running summary of Lafayette's long and eventful career suffices to indicate the difficulties surrounding an attempt to maintain a sustained interest in him as against his surroundings and his contemporaries. He was continually being dwarfed by comparison with the bigger men about him. Even in America one thinks of him mainly as the young man upon whom Washington lavished so much of his rare affection, and later, in 1824, as the elderly man whom a whole continent delighted to honour. From the very outset of the Revolution in France other men overshadowed him, and exerted the real power even when he was invested with all the visible insignia of authority. Doubtless some perception of this, forced upon him during his long solitude in prison, prompted alike his refusal to come into measurement with the towering individuality of Bonaparte, and his labours to bring back the Bourbon mediocrities. With them he felt sure of a better chance to occupy attention. Years before, in 1787, his friend Jefferson wrote that Lafayette's "foible is a canine appetite for popularity and fame." And when poor old Charles X., who had been his boyish friend and to the end cherished a kindly liking for him, was sailing out of Cherbourg into his last exile, he said, "For a long time Lafayette has wished to be king of the masses, but he will never be anything." These verdicts, passed upon him respectively at thirty and at seventy-three, are in themselves a complete demonstration of cause and effect.

Yet he was one of the most upright and public-spirited men of his generation—sincere, liberal, devoted to the service of his convictions, and full of human sympathies. Fortune gave him many strange parts to play in novel and dangerous crises, and he played them all with dignity and personal honour. He deserved well of his own country, and surely he deserved, from America at least, a better biography than this. As has been said, the value of any story of his life must depend largely upon the author's treatment of his accessories. In this Mr. Tuckerman has not been successful. The story of the enthusiastic young marquis in America might easily, we conceive, have been given a far more picturesque setting; and as for the entire revolutionary epoch in France, the author apprehends neither its actual significance nor its scenic possibilities. A great deal of interesting matter about General Lafayette is certainly gathered here in compact form, and out of it the reader may construct a tolerably well defined idea of the man's character, and of the qualities, strong and weak, which shaped his remarkable career. But he will be almost as often misled as assisted by the author's comments on this character and career, and he will marvel not a little, we fancy, that these comments should emanate from the republic which Jefferson and Franklin helped to found.

THE reader of 'The New Prince Fortunatus' has the pleasure of being introduced among fine company. The hero is an actor, and not only that, but the leading performer in a comic opera, while the remainder of the list of characters is very rich in earls' daughters. It is quite gratifying to feel for the moment how poor a thing it is to be anything less than an actor or a peer. The book should be strongly recommended to country readers as containing a decidedly faithful picture of the amusements and occupations of society as it is. Upon these matters Mr. Black has put forth his full strength, and he has shown a great knowledge of them. A novel of Mr. Black's must, of course, be freely interspersed with salmon-fishing and snatches of songs, and it would be incomplete without his contemplative bore, who is as indispensable as the père noble of the old French drama. Further, Mr. Black exhibits a new accomplishment: he has become acquainted with the Neapolitan dialect, which he appears to be able to write, and at times even to translate. Now and then his Neapolitan phrases will strike his readers like a Greek quotation in the House of Commons. Erudition is a very fine thing; but it is not so much admired when it is unintelligible. Novel-readers are not expected to be familiar with the Neapolitan dialect. On the other hand, a reviewer, speaking for himself alone, is quite delighted to state that a novel of Mr. Black's is a treat. It is a treat to read the work of a man who is always well informed, who writes good English, and who deals with every episode so as to make it exciting. It is a fact that Mr. Black can stir one's pulse every time he takes one out salmon-fishing or grouse-shooting or deer-stalking, and he has done so a good many times (perhaps a good many scores of times) in his many novels. The worst of it is that the real gist of 'The New Prince Fortunatus' is less interesting. One finds it delightful to be kept in the Highlands, passably agreeable to be amused at Pastoral Plays, little dinners, and other London amusements; but it is like going back to work after a holiday whenever the story goes into its main lines, and forces one to remember that Nina, formerly of Naples, but now of the New Theatre, is the real heroine. So much so that, with all its wit and brilliancy and humour, one ends with finding that three stout volumes make rather a long novel.

To give an opinion on Wilkie Collins's 'Blind Love,' a part of which has already appeared in the Illustrated London News, is not easy. To say what one thinks of the illustrations is easy enough—one simply wishes them away. 'Blind Love,' on the whole, is not specially characteristic of its dead author, who, one should not forget, was before all things the author of 'The Woman in White,' one of the most sensational of sensational novels. 'Blind Love' is not exciting; it is not particularly amusing or interesting either, though the parts assigned to some of the characters are real enough; but they are not sympathetic, attractive sort of people—not people one cares greatly to watch and observe. Mr. Besant in his preface tells how he came to take the story in hand, and how much, or we might say how little, was left for him to do. This little is probably well done, for there is no uncomfortable sense of break or strain. Yet the reader is conscious of that vague feeling of dissatisfaction that springs from a piece of fiction he knows to be begun and ended by different hands. 'Blind Love' is not so remarkable, however, nor so personal that one should really fear any touch but the author's own, as was the case with 'Edwin Drood,' for instance. There is nothing that particularly recalls Wilkie Collins's more conspicuous idiosyncrasies. The impressively printed pronouns are like Mr. Besant; but as examples of these occur early as well as late in the story, we have no right to attribute them to him. There is a vain feeling of expectation, a looking for something that does not come—a something more dramatic, intense, and inevitable than anything that has gone before. Perhaps the best and strongest, yet the quietest situation, is when the maid (hidden by a curtain) "assists" at the deliberate poisoning of Dr. Vimpany's patient. Love and money are the ruling passions of this little drama, but even these must be somewhat half-heartedly and carelessly presented, for, in spite of some masterly touches, they fail to convince or interest. The friendly relations between mistress and maid will surely appeal to Mr. Besant, and would have been after the heart of Charles Reade himself, who made many such.

The vice of the "perpetual present" is dispensed with in Mrs. (?) Cotterell's 'Strange Gods,' otherwise it might almost have been written by no less a person than Miss Broughton herself. There is the heroine with every charm that ignorance and rudeness can give, before whom able-bodied males fall like ninepins. One there is, a lover-cousin, who out-Herods every one else in "rampagiousness" and lack of manners. He loves Jenet in the "fierce tigerish" fashion so dear to the lady novelist. The particular "sutoring" of this pair consists in violent quarrelling and kissing. An elderly man, "a scholar and a gentleman," also goes down before Jenet, and ends by bearing her away from the frenzied cousin and the adoring villagers. It is he who presents the strange gods to her notice, and gives the author sundry opportunities of quoting her classical dictionary. At odd times she is satirizing country society, vituperating poor curates and their elderly female helpers, and presenting things generally in an unpleasant light. To people who like this sort of amusement 'Strange Gods' will seem no worse, perhaps better, than its fellows, only there are symptoms surely that the vein, such as it is, is becoming exhausted.

We do not recognize the presence of any particularly unruly spirit in Mrs. Aylmer Gowing's story, unless it be the author's own, and she is certainly a law to herself with regard to expression and grammar. Some of her sentences are fourteen to twenty lines long, and as she has not all the skill of a De Quincey in manipulating them the result may be imagined. Her notion of what an "Irish lady of territorial pretensions" is like is unattractive. She ridicules the parting guests to her young daughter as "old dusts" and "old fogeys," and then proceeds to give details of former suitors, and the story of how she came to be "in love with your poor Pa." "When my daughter is grown up," says the energetic lady to her friends, "we'll, we'll"—coming out after searching for a phrase with a national idiom—"we'll snuff the moon." Besides the Irish lady, Mrs. Gowing introduces us to a "captain's lady," a "squire's lady," and others. They "cotton" to one another, "pull themselves together," and are "in style and dress perfect ladies." Evidently Mrs. Gowing is well up in many things, and her readers will note with a shudder that, with an income reduced to 450*l.* a year, it may be necessary to live in "a common lodging-house." As to the real probabilities or improbabilities of the story itself there is nothing on earth to say.

It is not easy to understand why Derwentwater's rising should be chosen as the date of Mr. Clare's Northumbrian story. Another pretext would have sufficed to send Phyllis Dobson's unlucky lover into hiding while she gave her hand to the rival she took in her despair. There is nothing to mark the period particularly; indeed, as the author says, the upper valley of the Tyne has changed little in the manners and customs of its people for several generations. Nor is there any allusion to history, which, perhaps, some readers may regard as an agreeable surprise. The plot is slight, and the expedient for saving the life of the apparently murdered man somewhat audacious. But the descriptions of scenery are good, and even the improbable incident of Fenwick's escape down the mine shaft loses nothing in the telling. Dame Jobson and her friend Mrs. Heatherington are lifelike enough for us to wish we heard more about them—"dour" old wives both. Nor is the rude antagonism between the two sturdy lovers without its truth to nature. Phyllis herself is somewhat insipid, although she too, through the dignity of sorrow, commands the reader's interest in the sad climax of her story, when Fenwick returns and is manly enough to deny his longings for her sake. The hard nature of Mark, untroubled by remorse, but moved at last to self-contempt by the contrast of his rival's conduct and the sight of his wife's misery, is well set forth. Altogether there are several indications that the writer could give his public something better.

To wonder why any particular book was written, or what object it is intended to serve, is apt to be regarded in these days as a crude and futile speculation. The novel produced, as we are wont to say, for the circulating library is scarcely expected any longer to have an object or a motive; it is enough that it should while away an hour, and amuse its reader whether by intention or by execution. Mr. Eastwood will certainly amuse, for nothing could be more laughable than sundry portions of 'In Satan's Bonds.' He describes the philanderings of a lymphatic and calf-like hero, and the crimes of Nihilists and American citizens who, considered as what they are labelled, are the veriest frauds. For the love-making, let the reader apply his moral thermometer to such a passage as this:—

"Tell me first, my Louise, what would you have done had their fate been ours? Would you have left me and retained your honour, or would you have fled with me at the loss of your reputation? Would you in such a case have chosen honour or shame? 'Oh, shame, shame, shame, a thousand times! What is honour compared to love.....'"

Both the art and the fervour of the story are fairly exemplified in that quotation.

The Texan struggle for freedom and independence and the final collapse of the Mexican yoke form the theme of 'Woven of Love and Glory.' It is a stirring sort of subject, and the author seems to have done her best to invest it with spirit and vitality. It is not, it is true, an inspired best, but it is all very well so far as it goes. Without having much spontaneity of imagination or heat of feeling to recommend it, it is a book many readers will like, because it has common sense, propriety of expression, and a certain amount of literary capability besides. More than this, it appears to us, cannot be said.

CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS.

The Histories of Polybius. Translated by E. S. Shuckburgh, M.A. (Macmillan & Co.)—By his translation of the 'Histories of Polybius' Mr. Evelyn Shuckburgh has done a great service to many students of antiquity who would rather read Polybius in any other language than the original Greek. In truth, he is a detestable writer, long in the wind, but short in the vocabulary, and wearisome to a degree with his little round of catchwords, προαίρεσις, ἐπίστασις, τρόπος, τοῦτο τὸ μέρος, ὁλοσχερῆς, and the like, applied indiscriminately to all manner of things. It is unfortunate that so dull an historian is the best, and sometimes the sole, authority for so long and interesting a period, but Mr. Shuckburgh has done much to remove our regrets on this score. His translation is eminently readable, and if at times too free, at times not quite accurate, it does not, so far as we have noticed, at any point gravely misrepresent the original. We have compared it with the Greek in a large part of Book ii. and in the fragments assigned by Hultsch to Book xviii. The later portion seems to us better done than the earlier, which is often defective in the respects mentioned above. For instance, in ii. 39, § 4, τῇ τοῦτων πίστει seems to be not "confidence in them," but "their good faith," as in § 10, a few lines lower; in § 11 τότε μὲν οὖν ψιλῶς αὐτὰ τὰ κατὰ τὴν προαίρεσιν ὑπῆρχε παρ' αὐτοῖς is hardly translated at all by "they possessed only the elements of success"; and in 40, § 3, τίνα δ' ἦν ἐκάστοις τὰ πραχθέντα καὶ πῶς καὶ κατὰ πόλους καιροῦς, πειρασόμεθα δηλοῦν αἱ κατὰ τὸ πρέπον τῇ γραφῇ ποιούμενοι τὴν ἐπίστασιν, is rendered very freely indeed by "the actual achievements of these several statesmen I shall narrate in their proper places." Similarly, in ii. 43, § 3 (ἀρχήθεν—αὐτῶν), § 10 (διαίρεσις—"partition," not "disruption"), 44, § 5, 45, § 2 (καὶ συμπλέκειν, κ.τ.λ.), and in many other passages we have marked cases of little phrases omitted or so loosely translated as not quite to do justice to the original. In some of these, no doubt, Mr. Shuckburgh might appeal to his preface and say that he does not profess to have been "careful to follow the Greek idiom," but he might have been more careful without damaging his English. For almost any practical purpose, however, Mr. Shuckburgh is accurate enough, and we congratulate him on the successful accomplishment of a most difficult and laborious task. It is worth while to add, in conclusion, for the benefit of readers who have Mr. Strachan-Davidson's 'Selections from Polybius,' that Mr. Shuckburgh follows Hultsch's notation of the fragments, while Mr. Strachan-Davidson follows Bekker. There is a good deal of difference between the two.

Bohn's Standard Library.—Whiston's Josephus. Revised by the Rev. A. R. Shilleto. (Bell & Sons.)—Whiston's 'Josephus,' since its first publication in 1737, must have been reprinted a hundred times, but we are glad to receive a revised edition of it in the pleasant type and comfortable size of 'Bohn's Standard Library.' The present instalment consists of three volumes only, containing the 'Antiquities of the Jews,' from the Creation to A.D. 66. The revision has been entrusted to the Rev. A. R. Shilleto, who has been assisted with topographical notes by Sir C. Wilson, one of the pioneers of recent exploration in Palestine. Mr. Shilleto professes, indeed, to have left little of Whiston's work, but fortunately he has somewhat exaggerated the amount of his alterations. He has introduced a few good emendations of the text, has cut down Whiston's notes, and has shortened the sentences in many places; but the language is still mainly Whiston's, and preserves that flavour of a bygone age which most of us would be sorry to miss in such a book. If there are still any boys whose Sunday reading is too jealously supervised, we advise them to ask for Whiston's 'Josephus' as a present. They may then beguile the Sabbath with deeds of bloodshed and derring-do quite equal to those of any hero of fiction.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

WE have received from the Fabian Society a volume, edited by Mr. Bernard Shaw, of Fabian Essays in Socialism, most of which have been delivered as lectures by members of the executive council of the Society. The book may be taken, although the contrary is modestly stated in it, as a sort of official expression of the opinion of the moderate party among English Social Democrats, and is for that reason of considerable value. There is a close concurrence of doctrine, and even in the mode of stating the opinions held, among the writers, of whom Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Sidney Webb, and two others write on the basis of socialism, economic, historic, industrial, and moral; while Mr. Graham Wallas, Mr. Bernard Shaw, and two others write on the organization of society under socialism and on the transition to social democracy. We have ourselves, in reading the book, suffered from a certain want of clearness common to all the essayists; but where we have understood we have found no contradiction, and little that can fairly be complained of—given the point of view of the seven authors. Almost the only difference among them concerns the question how far we may be said to have already adopted a number of socialist principles in our legislation, for some of the writers contend that we have become socialists to a great extent, while others ridicule the idea that our sixpenny telegrams or even our penny letters, or many of the other points of modern progress of which some are proud, constitute in any degree steps towards a socialistic system. One of the writers goes, indeed, so far as to say: "In perfect unconsciousness of the nature of his act, Mr. Ritchie has established the Commune. He has divided England into districts ruled by County Councils, and has thus created the machinery without which Socialism was impracticable." But if this be so, then every country in the world has taken a long step towards socialism, the most conservative and the most advanced alike, for English local government is still, even after Mr. Ritchie's reforms, less democratically organized than is that of almost any country. The districts into which Mr. Ritchie is said to have divided England are, generally speaking, the old English counties, whose historic existence dates back in most cases before all record. In other countries there is a district answering to this county, and there is also a far smaller district which, under the very name of commune in large parts of Latin Europe and Latin America, is democratically organized—as it may be in the future organized here, but has not been since the disappearance in England of the parish life of the Saxon times. If there ever was a conservative government, one was to be found in the government of France under the Restoration; if there ever was a bourgeois government, hostile to socialism and detested by socialists, it was the Government of July; yet in France under both these forms of government there existed a more democratic organization of the commune than that prevailing in this country now. As to the want of clearness of which we complain, we may give an example of it from a note at p. 20. It is stated in the text that the market value of capital, indicated by the current rate of interest, falls with the increase of population, whereas the market value of established stock rises with it. The note is as follows:—

"The current rate must, under present conditions, eventually fall to zero, and even become 'negative.' By that time shares which now bring in a dividend of 100 per cent., may very possibly bring in 200 or more. Yet the fall of the rate has been mistaken for a tendency of interest to disappear. It really indicates a tendency of interest to increase."

On the other hand, the very next page contains a passage perfectly clear, which may be quoted as a good example of the style of our authors when at their best:—

"The more you degrade the workers, robbing them of all artistic enjoyment, and all chance of respect and admiration from their fellows, the more you throw them back, reckless, on the one pleasure and the one human tie left to them—the gratification of their instinct for producing fresh supplies of men. You will applaud this instinct as divine until at last the excessive supply becomes a nuisance: there comes a plague of men; and you suddenly discover that the instinct is diabolic, and set up a cry of 'over population.' But your slaves are beyond caring for your cries: they breed like rabbits; and their poverty breeds filth, ugliness, dishonesty, disease, obscenity, drunkenness, and murder. In the midst of the riches which their labour piles up for you, their misery rises up too and stifles you. You withdraw in disgust to the other end of the town from them; you appoint special carriages on your railways and special seats in your churches and theatres for them; you set your life apart from theirs by every class barrier you can devise; and yet they swarm about you still: your face gets stamped with your habitual loathing and suspicion of them: your ears get so filled with the language of the vilest of them that you break into it when you lose your self-control."

There is another passage, at p. 138, which we have failed to understand, through the use of the words "the present homestead law." What this law may be we do not know. The phrase is used in Canada and in the United States; but there is no reference to the American continent in the passage, and if it alludes to one of the laws of Europe we do not know to which. At p. 25 there is a certain exaggeration in the statement that it is from among the fugitives from the individualism of Western Europe who have peopled the United States and the colonies that has come the recent revival of the cry for nationalization of the land. No doubt Mr. Henry George has come to us from America, but it is in Great Britain, and not in America, that he has made converts, and while neither in the United States, nor in any colony, nor in the United Kingdom are those who would nationalize the land anywhere as yet in a majority, they appear to form a larger minority in Great Britain, certainly a larger minority in Scotland, than they do in any colony or than they do in the United States. Mr. Henry George has himself declared, with a frankness that does him honour, that he has invented nothing, and has only repeated what many others have written at various times during the last hundred years, and the land nationalization views of America and of the colonies have themselves been exported from Western Europe. The style of some of the essays needs chastening, and mixed metaphors abound in them. In one passage "historic fossils" are "left at large," are not "excluded" from certain places, but are "powerless" "against the stream of tendencies," and, though sometimes apparently "victorious," are carried down a "current which they believe themselves to be resisting." In another passage it is said that at the first sign of opposition to "the Liberal shepherd of the moment the whole flock of party sheep will be in full cry upon our track." We had thought that it was generally the wolves who were in full cry upon the track, and not the sheep. Readers who have no socialistic leanings will, nevertheless, find the volume both interesting and amusing, and this passage by Mr. Graham Wallas has a certain literary interest which justifies us in quoting it:—

"If the Whig landlords who are responsible for most of the details of our glorious constitution had been also authors and inventors for profit, we should probably have had the strictest rights of perpetual property or even of entail in ideas; and there would now have been a Duke of Shakspeare to whom we should all have had to pay two or three pounds for the privilege of reading his ancestor's works, provided that we returned the copy uninjured at the end of a fortnight."

One of the most humorous portions of the work is to be found in an unexpected place, namely, in the index, which we imagine has been humorously treated purposely by the writers to make it more interesting than is often the case with index pages. "Angels, constitution and status of," is a decidedly startling entry; as is "Capitalism: its origin in piracy and slave-trading." This is even beaten by "Protection: advocated by the Manchester School." As we are on the index we may find a line to grumble at the entry "A. C. H. C. de Tocqueville," for the forgotten fact that Tocqueville's parents christened him not only Alexis but also Charles Henri before his names of Clerel de Tocqueville was hardly worth reviving, and gives reasonable cause of complaint to Sir William Harcourt, who has not been called "W. G. G. V. V. Harcourt" in this index, but only "W. V."

WE have received from Messrs. Bell & Sons a translation by Mr. George Duncan of Gustav Freytag's The Crown Prince and the German Imperial Crown, a work which is more interesting to Germans than it is likely to be to inhabitants of other countries. On the first page the Emperor Frederick appears as a "winged angel, hovering high above the earth." Sulz, after the battle of Worth, is described as "a frightened little place, with disaffected, suffering people, with some fanatical Frenchmen among them. One of these was seized in the act of shooting at our soldiers, and was fusiladed next morning; his wife lay the whole day in her yard, tearing her hair." The battle is "one of the bloodiest and most glorious we have lived to see.....Storm and ruin everywhere, with terrible loss." The two most interesting things in the volume, which is a little "thin," we shall proceed to name. The one is Herr Freytag's very clear statement of the excellent views which he held at the beginning of the war, but unfortunately failed to impress on those with whom he was thrown: that if Alsace were annexed "it would be impossible to get on a tolerable footing with France again; because, further, in the inevitable settlement of accounts with young Russia, an alliance between France and Russia would place us between the devil and the deep sea; and, lastly, because we have insecure frontier-countries enough." The other point of interest is Freytag's analysis of the principles of the constitution of the Prussian Order of St. John, the weak points of which he thoroughly exposes, ending with the distinct statement that of the two the Freemasons have the better foundation. At p. 39 there is a mistake. The Englishman who was with Dr. Russell was not the Duke of Sutherland.

MR. JOHN ASHTON'S Curious Creatures in Zoology (Nimmo) for the most part belong not to zoology, but to legend and fancy. The book is chiefly composed of extracts from Topsell, Olaus Magnus (in the seventeenth century translations), Sir John Maundeville, and other dealers in the marvellous; and the quotations relate either to fabulous animals or to the fabulous qualities and powers ascribed to real animals. The illustrations are copies, very well executed, of engravings contained in old books of natural history. Mr. Ashton gives his readers little of his own; but this is not greatly to be regretted, as he seems to be unable to write two consecutive sentences without an anacoluthon worthy of Thucydides. The book is undeniably amusing, and in saying this we are probably giving the author as much praise as he either expects or desires.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD have sent us Nos. IV., V., and VI. of the third series of Tales from Blackwood. They are quite up to the average of magazine tales. There is nothing violently exciting about them. 'A Magnetic Mystery,' the story of a "double-ganger"; 'Who were They?' a Maltese ghost story contributed by Lord Lorne; and 'The Dragon-tree of Telde,' founded on a tradition of Grand Canary, are more or less eerie tales of the supernatural. 'Pentock,' by Miss E. Bradley, is a pretty and pathetic story of the west coast of England. 'A Singular Case,' though a little overloaded with the elaborate American dialect of "Chloride Bill," is not unworthy the 'Diary of a late Physician.' 'The Last Words of Joseph Barrable' amusingly relate some particular instances of discomfort and loss brought upon the working classes by recent philanthropic legislation.

The Photographic Quarterly, October, 1889, and January, 1890 (Hazell, Watson & Viney), seems likely to prove of great use to photographers, especially to amateurs. The articles are clearly written, terse, and on subjects of the day. Chemistry, art, micro-photography, and such matters are all treated in its turn. The frontispiece to the second number, 'Harmony,' by J. E. Austin, is one of the most perfect pictures we have yet seen produced by photography. The tone and sentiment are alike admirable. There is a future for this new quarterly if the standard of the first numbers be maintained.—It is almost unnecessary to praise again the well-known British Journal Photographic Almanack (H. Greenwood & Co.). The same amazing number of short articles, the same astounding mass of advertisements to which we have been used in the past, are given again this year. Nearly nine hundred pages for one shilling! Who can complain of the price, or fail to find something to reward him for the labour of glancing through the numberless titles of the articles? The most noticeable feature of photography for the year is the increasing favour with which hand or detective cameras are viewed; the most useful, the widespread combination of the camera with the microscope and telescope, and the consequent ease with which records of the work done with those instruments are obtained.—The rival publication, The Year-Book of Photography (Piper & Carter), cannot compete with the 'Almanack' in bulk, but in interest it is not far behind. Perhaps the most interesting paper is that by the editor on 'Photography in Natural Colours,' which he (somewhat sanguinely, we think) appears to consider a not improbable achievement. Orthochromatic photography is fully dealt with, and there is a sensible suggestion by Mr. H. P. Robinson that professional photographers should modify their detestable practice of 'retouching' a portrait until it seems to be worked in wax. The 'Year-Book' is quite equal to its predecessors.

THE new volumes (II. to IV.) of Blackie's Modern Cyclopedia (Blackie & Son) confirm the opinion we have already expressed of its suitability for readers whose time and money are alike limited. The articles are numerous and concise, and furnish a good deal of information usually trustworthy, and the illustrations are most of them useful. The printing is clear. The maps are a mistake; they are too small and are inaccurate. Luxembourg is represented as a portion of the German empire! Sometimes, in the effort to be concise, the chief point is missed. For instance, undoubtedly the most striking point in Lord Hardinge's career was his conduct at Albuera; but this is not mentioned by Dr. Annandale. In the same way, speaking of the "Grand Company," nothing is said of their conquest of Greece, an omission perhaps due to close following of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.' Of downright mistakes there are a few. Charles V., for example, did not abolish the Cortes of Castile, however he treated it. The scientific articles are sound. The general article on chemistry is a wonderfully good summary considering its brevity.

THE charming account of Chaucer's times which Mr. John Saunders contributed to 'Knight's Weekly Volumes' was, like Mr. Dennis's 'Cid,' one of the delights of many a boy who was growing up in the forties. To some it served as an introduction to a poet who has remained a lifelong favourite. Some have gone no further than Mr. Saunders guided them, yet find that they really know more about Chaucer, thanks to their mentor, than people who profess to have read 'The Canterbury Tales' right through. It is pleasant to see an old favourite reappear, and this is due to an inquiry from Mr. Churton Collins which appeared in our columns. Mr. Saunders has himself superintended the new reprint, which Messrs. Dent have issued—Chaucer's Canterbury Tales Annotated and Accented. It has been revised and brought up to date, full advantage having been taken of the additional knowledge acquired through the aid of the Chaucer Society.—Another reprint highly to be commended is a handsome edition of Mr. Maxwell Lyte's interesting History of Eton College, which Messrs. Macmillan have brought out, a delightful book for the general public as well as the antiquary. The same publishers send a new edition, in two volumes, of Prof. Bryce's valuable treatise on The American Commonwealth, a sixpenny edition of Aiton Locke, and a well-printed volume of pleasant Scientific Lectures and Essays by Kingsley.—From Messrs. Allen comes the sixth and concluding volume of the revised edition of the History of the Indian Mutiny, by Sir J. Kaye and Col. Mangleson, accompanied by a copious index.—Mr. Stott has added Emerson's Essays to the pretty little series he has baptized with his own name.

THE School Calendar of Messrs. Bell & Sons is well printed, and a sensible preface by Mr. Storr adds to the value of this year's issue. The lack of either index or table of contents is a drawback, and it is not quite easy to follow its arrangement. More detailed accounts of the scholarships at University College, Gower Street, might be given with advantage. On p. 105 a notice is given of scholarships offered by Mrs. Reid's trustees, but otherwise apparently colleges for women are ignored.

WE have on our table Hampstead Hill, by J. L. Lobley (Roper & Drowley).—Trying to Find Europe, by Jimmy Brown, edited by W. L. Alden (Low).—The Beachcombers, by G. Bishop (Ward & Downey).—Memoirs and Proceedings of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, Vol. II., Fourth Series (Manchester, 36, George Street).—Guns and Gun Material, by G. Ashworth, 2 vols. (Clowes & Sons), and The Newspaper Readers' Index of Reference (Bolton, Axon).

LINES BY POPE.

Central Free Library, Bristol, Jan. 27, 1890.

HAVING just bought a copy of the third edition of Merry England, January, 1890, I open on a paper entitled 'Two Unpublished Poems by Pope,' in which the writer speaks of the "ecstatic emotion produced" by his assumed discovery of some "hitherto unpublished lines" in "description of love." As I happen to have had those very lines in memory for at least a quarter of a century, and have never seen them in MS., I have no hesitation in saying that they do not now appear for the first time in print. I append the lines in question, and may add that they are to be found word for word in Bysshe's 'Art of Poetry,' eighth edition, 1737, vol. ii. p. 18, and are there assigned to Lord Rochester, in whose works I thus find them:—

Love, the most generous passion of the mind,
 The softest refuge innocence can find;
 The safe director of unguided youth,
 Fraught with kind wishes, and secur'd by Truth;
 That cordial drop Heaven in our cup has thrown,
 To make the nauseous draught of life go down;
 On which one only blessing God might raise,
 In lands of atheists, subsidies of praise:
 For none did e'er so dull and stupid prove,
 But felt a God, and bless'd his power, in love.
 From 'A Letter from Artemisia in the Town to Chloë in the Country.'

'DOMESDAY STUDIES.'

As it is understood that the second volume of these "Studies"—which has already been the subject of a correspondence in your columns—is at length to be published, I would venture to suggest that its value, as a work of reference for students, would be considerably increased by the addition to its bibliographical section of references to those papers supplementing its contents which have appeared, since its publication, in the Athenæum, the Antiquary, the Archæological Review, &c.

The necessity for such addition is shown by the case of the "Study" contributed by Mr. Pell—far the longest in the volume. This essay, of which all the gist had already been published in the Transactions of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, was, by an unfortunate error of judgment, given a place in 'Domesday Studies,' at great expense, although not entitled to admission, not having been written for, or read at, the Domesday Commemoration. But the serious part of the business is that subsequent criticism has proved the paper in question to be based on delusion, and supported by "proofs" which do not bear investigation. Nothing can undo the mischief caused by embalming its errors in 'Domesday Studies'; but the time and labour of future students may at least be saved by referring them, in the forthcoming volume, to the papers in which those errors are exposed.

THE LYON KING OF ARMS.

EDINBURGH society, Scottish domestic history, and the noble science of heraldry have sustained a grievous loss within the last few days. Dr. G. Burnett, Lyon King of Arms, died on January 24th. All who are in any way interested in any of the various subjects mentioned above are aware of the serious import of this announcement.

Mr. Burnett was the son of John Burnett of Kennay, an Aberdeenshire family, and so was a descendant of that ancient stock from which was produced the famous Bishop of Salisbury of the same name. Mr. Burnett was called to the Scots bar in 1845. It was from no lack of ability—as his career has fully shown—that he made hardly the figure in the Scots courts that many a man of not half his capacity has displayed. He had not met with the work that was congenial to him; but he was in his proper place when, on the death of Lord Kinnoull in 1867, he was appointed Lyon King of Arms. He had already, in 1864, been appointed to the junior post of Lyon Clerk Depute. Thus made the head of the department of arms in Scotland, Mr. Burnett set himself with steady perseverance to exalt his office from a comparatively inferior position, to which it had fallen in popular estimation, and succeeded in raising it to what it had every right to be—a dignified office of the State. His first publication was a small volume, issued in 1865 anonymously, in which, in a light and amusing manner, he showed the vanity of spurious heraldry and imaginative genealogy. 'Pedigree Making' once for all rendered these fanciful arts obsolete and ridiculous.

Nothing could exceed the kindness shown to every one whose studies or inquiries led him to the Lyon Office in the time of Mr. Burnett. It seemed to be a pleasure to him and his subordinates to afford assistance from the stores at their command. It was, therefore, a singular circumstance that rendered another publication of Mr. Burnett's necessary, at all events in his mind. In 1881 he published 'The Red Book of Menteith Reviewed, in reply to Charges of Discourtesy,' &c. So far as the public were concerned, the issue was perfectly unnecessary. But a divergence of opinion on strictly professional matters existed—and doctors differ.

But the great work of Mr. Burnett's life—that which brings his name markedly forward in the field of letters—is his masterly series of the Scots Exchequer Rolls. This work was begun in 1878 by the late Dr. John Stuart; but he died before the first volume could be issued. These volumes are not for the general reader, seeing they are in the original monkish Latin, and of a highly technical nature. They consist, for the most part, of the accounts of the burghs of Scotland, the rentalia, or Rent Rolls of the Crown Land, and such-like matters. The series begins with the year 1264. Vol. i. embraces the period from that date till 1357. Usually each volume contains from 800 to 900 pages, including an index of some 160 pages in double columns, or thereabout. To the ordinary reader these noble volumes are sealed letters, except for the gracefully written and most interesting prefaces, which embody an abstract of the information given in each volume. The 'Index in Libros Responsionum,' which forms a part of this series, and indeed the entire series of fourteen volumes—the extent to which the work had run when, some six weeks ago, the last touch was given to the ponderous tome—may be described as a mine of the most valuable genealogical and topographical information, the importance of which to an historian of Scotland capable of using such materials it is difficult to over-estimate. It is only necessary to add, on this head, that these books are published by "authority of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury," and reflect the highest credit on the Government. At the time of the tercentenary of the University of Edinburgh that body conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. on Mr. Burnett, and he expressed, on his return from abroad, honest satisfaction at this mark of appreciation of the value of his life's work.

Dr. Burnett was a man of extremely delicate health, of a slight and fragile figure. It was evident to all that the labour, though self-imposed, of the Exchequer Rolls was almost too heavy for him. All his literary work was thoroughly well done; and it was the common opinion among those who knew him, that he was capable of much more had health permitted.

In private life he was gentle and genial. His knowledge of music was quite scientific. Indeed, I believe that for many years he acted as musical critic to one or more of the leading Edinburgh newspapers. Praise from him was praise indeed. I well remember a case in which his indignation was raised at what he considered the cruel judgment of a critic concerning the performance of a young beginner, his haste to put in writing an opinion that in every one's mind more than counterbalanced—except in the matter of publicity—the adverse and perhaps careless judgment that he knew to be next to death to an anxious débutant.

In public and in private the sense of loss is wide and deep. A. F.

THE FOLK-LORE SOCIETY.

THE works issued by the Folk-lore Society will in future be published by Mr. David Nutt, instead of, as heretofore, by Mr. Elliot Stock. The change of publishers is consequent upon the reorganization of the Society's journal, which will appear henceforth under the title Folk-lore: a Quarterly Review of Myth, Tradition, Institutions, and Custom, and will continue and incorporate the Archæological Review. It will be directed by an editorial committee of the Council of the Society, consisting of the Hon. John Abercromby, Mr. G. L. Gomme, Mr.

Joseph Jacobs, and Mr. Alfred Nutt, Mr. Jacobs acting as general editor. The first number, to be issued early in March, will comprise the following articles: Mr. Lang's Presidential Address for 1889; 'The Mythic Charms of the Finns,' translated and edited by the Hon. John Abercromby; 'Native Tales and Legends collected from the Torres Straits Islanders,' by Prof. Haddon, of Dublin; 'Early Trade Routes to Ireland,' by Prof. Ridgway, of Cork; 'Review of Recent Literature concerning Scandinavian Mythology,' by Prof. F. York-Powell; 'Review of Recent Literature concerning Celtic Myth and Saga,' by Mr. Alfred Nutt; Notes and Queries on Superstitions; full bibliography of English and foreign books during the past six months; summaries of periodicals, &c. The Society will issue immediately to its members for 1889 the Rev. D. MacInnes's 'Gaelic Folk and Hero Tales from Argyllshire,' with notes by Mr. Alfred Nutt; and to its members for 1890 Prof. Crane's annotated translation of the 'Exempla' of Jacques de Vitry. The Society hopes to issue to its 1891 members Mr. Elton's translation of the mythical portions of Saxo Grammaticus, with notes and introduction by Prof. York-Powell.

HENRY FIELDING.

The facts of Fielding's life have been so carefully investigated by his biographers that our knowledge of the subject will probably never be much increased; but the following details are not without interest.

Fielding died on the 8th of October, 1754, at Lisbon, and in the following month letters of administration were taken out; but it has not been noticed that Fielding left a will, without date, which is now in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. This will runs as follows:—

"In the name of God Amen. I Henry Fielding of the Parish of Ealing in the County of Middlesex do hereby give and bequeath unto Ralph Allen of Prior Park in the County of Somerset Esq. and to his heirs executors administrators and assigns for ever to the use of the said Ralph his heirs, &c., all my estate real and personal and whatsoever and do appoint him sole executor of this my last will Bequeathing him that the whole (except my share in the Register Office) may be sold and forthwith converted into money and annuities purchased thereout for the lives of my dear wife Mary and my daughters Harriet and Sophia and what proportions my said executor shall please to reserve to my sons William and Allen shall be paid them severally as they shall attain the age of twenty and three. And as for my shares in the Register or Universal Register Office I give ten thereof to my aforesaid wife seven to my daughter Harriet and three to my daughter Sophia my wife to be put in immediate possession of her shares and my daughters of theirs as they shall severally arrive at the age of twenty one the immediate profits to be then likewise paid to my two daughters by my executor who is desired to retain the same in his hands until that time. Witness my hand Henry Fielding. Signed and acknowledged as his last will and testament by the within named testator in the presence of Margaret Collier, Rich^d Boor, Isabella Ash."

On the 14th of November, 1754, administration (with the will annexed) of the goods, &c., of Henry Fielding, at Lisbon, deceased, was granted to John Fielding, Esq., uncle and guardian lawfully assigned to Harriet Fielding, spinster, a minor, and Sophia Fielding, an infant, for the use and benefit of the minor and infant until they were twenty-one; Ralph Allen, Esq., having renounced as well the execution of the will as administration of the goods, &c.; and Mary Fielding, the relict, having also renounced administration of the goods of the deceased.

Ralph Allen was an old friend of Fielding's, and is referred to in 'Joseph Andrews,' published in 1742. John (afterwards Sir John) Fielding was Fielding's half brother, and was blind. He was much interested in the "Universal Register Office," to which reference is made in the will. The mention of Fielding's son Allen, who was born in April, 1754, shows that the will was made shortly before his departure for Lisbon on the 1st of July. Harriet was Fielding's daughter by his first wife; Sophia was born in 1750. Another daughter, Louisa, born in 1752, was apparently dead by 1754. There is no mention in the will of Fielding's sister Sarah, the author of 'David Simple.'

I may, perhaps, add that among other preparations for meeting the rebellion of 1745-6 we are told, in the Bath Journal for February 3rd, 1746, that "Ralph Allen, Esq., of Widcomb near this City, intends to raise one hundred men, at his own charge, for the service of His Majesty and the nation"; sixty men had been already sworn before the mayor for the purpose. Their clothes were to be blue, turned up with red, and they were being drilled by a person of experience brought from London for the purpose. From the following number of the same paper we learn that there were great rejoicings at Bath on the 7th of February, when news was received of the retreat of the rebels from Stirling on the approach of the army under the Duke of Cumberland. "In the evening some curious fireworks were played off on the Parade, by order of Mr. Nash," the Beau Nash whose life was written by Goldsmith; and "Mr. Allen's house at Witcomb was finely illuminated; a large bonfire was made near it, and his men, lately raised, fired several volleys." Fielding often visited Allen, and there is a tradition that 'Tom Jones,' published in 1749, was written at Twerton, near Bath.

Fielding left behind him a posthumous play called 'The Fathers; or, the Good-Natured Man,' which was acted for the first time at Drury Lane Theatre on November 30th, 1778, and ran for nine nights. The following letter from Sir John Fielding to Dr. William Hunter, printed from the original in Mr. Baillie's possession, relates to the performance for the benefit of Fielding's widow. The writer, curiously enough, speaks of the play by its second title, a title now always associated with Goldsmith's comedy, which had been produced ten years earlier:—

"Sir John Fielding presents his compliments to Dr. Hunter, and acquaints him that the Comedy of 'The Good-natured Man' written by the late Mr. Henry Fielding will be performed at Drury Lane next Monday being the Author's Widow's night."

"He was your old and sincere friend. There are no other of his Works left unpublished. This is the last opportunity you will have of shewing any respect to his Memory as a Genius, so that I hope you will send all your Pupils, all your Patients, all your Friends, & everybody else to the Play that Night, by which Means you will indulge your benevolent feelings and your Sentiments of Friendship."

"Bow Street, Decr 4, 1778."

Fielding sent for his friend Dr. Hunter immediately before sailing for Lisbon, and was tapped by him on board the vessel. G. A. AITKEN.

THE ARABIC LIBRARY AT DAMASCUS.

A GREEK judge in Cyprus, M. Chri. Papadopoulos, has printed, as the forerunner of a treatise that has long lain by him unpublished on the Arabic Library at Damascus and its MSS., a really interesting short account of them in a Greek theological magazine called Σωτήρ. From it I extract such passages as seem worthy of a wider circulation.

The library was founded by the Ommayyads. The building is situate near the stately Djami which bears their name. It has a great stone vault supported upon four columns, and ornamented with mosaics. Not so long ago it was restored with much taste under the superintendence of the Governor of Syria, Achmet Hamdi Pasha, a favourite of the Sultan Abdul Hamid. There is no proper catalogue of this library, nor is it arranged. Several of the manuscripts are moth-eaten and much injured by damp. Still, there exist in it valuable papyri as well as manuscripts on parchment and paper. Among them, according to M. Papadopoulos, a conspicuous place is due to a history of Damascus in nineteen large volumes. A great deal that is new is to be found in them regarding the city and its walls as well as about the fine arts in Damascus. This codex is a jewel of Arabic literature and an inexhaustible source for the whole annals of the city.

The collection of old Arabic papyri is rich. There are several that throw light on obscure periods of Arabic history and poetry, or deal with the general history of Arabs and their literature. Some of these papyri are as late as the fifteenth century, and may be considered, says M. Papadopoulos, as copies of various monuments in stone. On papyrus rolls are to be found whole collections of poems by celebrated Arab authors, of whom Ibn Khaldoun is the most notable; others contain decrees of the Emirs of Damascus.

M. Papadopoulos mentions also a history on parchment of the Tartars by Abulghazi Bahadur, and a history and geography of Damascus and Palmyra by Abulfeda. Although M. Papadopoulos gives no details regarding these writings, one can identify the history of Abulghazi as that which was discovered by Swedish officers in captivity after the battle of Pultowa, 1709, and translated into German, and subsequently (1726) into French, and published in two volumes under the title of 'Histoire Générale des Tartars.' Regarding the work of Abulfeda one cannot, from the brief notice that M. Papadopoulos supplies, come to any certain conclusion, whether it be a portion of the 'Annales Moslemici' or an unpublished production of the celebrated Mohammedan prince and polyhistor.

Among the other treasures of the library are a treatise of Abul-Hassan, the Arabian astronomer of the thirteenth century; a roll of Abumazar, the astronomer (circa 855), on the observatories at Bagdad and Damascus; a medical treatise of the teacher of Avicenna, Abu-Sahaa; a meteorological bulletin relating to Damascus by Abul-Chaiz; papyrus rolls containing the Pentateuch, the Psalter, and the Gospels in Kufic characters; papyrus rolls and others, consisting of Plato's 'Laws' in Arabic, the 'Organon' of Aristotle, the work of Hippocrates 'De Aëre, Aquis, et Locis,' and one containing some portions of the 'Birds' of Aristophanes (in Arabic?), and presenting variants from the received text, and the Bible in Syriac.

But the great prize of the library, so far as one can judge from the inadequate description given of it, is a Greek manuscript of the Old and New Testament, comprising the Epistle of Barnabas and a portion of the Shepherd of Hermas. As the discovery of it is highly interesting, I give an exact translation of the passage referring to it:—

"One of the most important of the so-called uncial manuscripts which contain the whole of the New Testament complete is as follows.

"The manuscript is written on well-prepared parchment and is 12½ inches wide and 13½ inches tall. It consists of 380½ leaves, of which 200 contain the Old Testament (in the Septuagint version) incomplete; but 180 the whole of the New Testament, the Epistle of Barnabas, and a large portion of the Shepherd of Hermas. The manuscript is divided into four columns, and in each column there are fifty lines. This MS. may be regarded as similar to the Codex Sinaiticus, and consequently is worthy of a searching inquiry and investigation. The discovery of this gem is due to us."

Every reader will see that it is really a gem. Not only is the mere antiquity of the manuscript a point of importance, but also the fact that it contains a portion, and a considerable portion, of the Shepherd of Hermas, which has lately been seen in a new light, thanks to the researches and criticisms of scholars like Hilgenfeld and Harnack. It is well known that Hilgenfeld maintained that he had found the Greek conclusion, still missing, of Hermas, in a London publication of the well-known forger Constantine Simonides (Nutt, 1859). This supposed conclusion was, after the appearance, simultaneously with Prof. Hilgenfeld's conjecture, of the collation of the Athon Codex by Lambros accompanied by an introduction by Mr. Armitage

Robinson, utterly rejected by Prof. Harnack and declared to be a pure forgery of Simonides—an opinion in which I concur. Now comes the ancient MS. from Damascus as a new document. Does it contain the conclusion of the Shepherd? Unfortunately the meagre notice supplied by M. Papadopoulos neither throws light on this point nor affords us sufficient information, nor does it allow us to form any certain opinion on the whole question of the importance of the Damascene Codex and its similarity to the Sinaitic, which also contains besides the Testament a small portion of the Shepherd. I hope, however, to be soon in a position to give further intelligence on this important discovery. SPYR. P. LAMBROS.

MRS. PFEIFFER.

We greatly regret to hear of the death of Mrs. Emily Pfeiffer. A Welshwoman by birth, she married Mr. Pfeiffer, a German settled in England, who was a partner in a well-known firm in the City. Her first volume of verse, 'Gerard's Monument, and other Poems,' appeared in 1873. This was the beginning of a literary career in which the deceased lady showed much enthusiasm, high aspirations, and many accomplishments. Her poetical works attained to a considerable bulk, and she also published a volume of travels. Besides applying herself to literature, she exercised a large hospitality at her house near Putney. She was a kindly and graceful hostess, who had the art of putting her guests at their ease, and devoted herself to their entertainment. The death of her husband, to whom she was deeply attached, was a great blow to Mrs. Pfeiffer, and since then her health had been steadily declining, although she was able to see through the press another volume of her poems. She will be regretted by a wide circle as an able and in many respects remarkable woman, while her amiability and sincerity had endeared her to those who had the privilege of knowing her intimately.

Literary Gossip.

THE centenary of the foundation of the Royal Literary Fund occurs this year. So important an event in the history of the Fund will be celebrated in an exceptional manner. It is supposed that the Prince of Wales will be invited to preside at the banquet in May.

SOME obscurer passages of history relating to Bishop Fisher's attitude towards the Papal supremacy will be a subject of study by Mr. Gladstone during his stay at Oxford. In the second part of his article on 'Ellen Middleton,' which occupies nearly twenty pages of the February number of Merry England, Mr. Gladstone returns to the subject of confession with increased emphasis, and, writing to the editor of the magazine about some of the objections raised in newspapers against his first article, he says, "I think the criticisms which treat reference to the gravity of sin as smacking of Popery are little less than loathsome."

THE article on Haddon Hall in the current number of the Quarterly is said to be by the Duchess of Rutland.

MESSRS. SMITH & ELDER purpose issuing early in March a "People's Edition," at the price of one shilling, of 'Vanity Fair.' The whole of Thackeray's masterpiece will be comprised in one volume, large demy 8vo., and the book will contain several full-page illustrations.

MR. EGDMONT HAKE has for some time been engaged in editing the late General

Gordon's unpublished 'Journals in China.' The work, which will be issued by Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co., will be in two volumes, and will contain, among other features of interest, an etching of Mr. Val Prinsep's famous portrait of "Chinese Gordon" in his yellow jacket, and maps and letters which have not hitherto seen the light.

It seems that the valuable collection of shorthand systems made by the late Mr. Cornelius Walford was not in the fire which occurred recently at the house of Mrs. Walford near Sevenoaks, and consequently was not destroyed, as has been currently reported in some of the shorthand periodicals.

PROF. MAX MÜLLER will begin his second course of Gifford Lectures at Glasgow on Wednesday next. The subject will be 'Physical Religion.'

LORD RONALD GOWER—now at Naples on his way to Japan—has completed a monograph on the Maid of Orleans.

MR. J. M. BARRIE has undertaken to produce a serial story of Scottish life, which will appear in Good Words during next year.

DR. N. M. ADLER, Chief Rabbi of Great Britain and the Colonies, although he has died at the advanced age of eighty-seven, has left little mark in literature. Besides his sermons, only an edition from MSS. of a commentary on the Onkelos-Targum by an anonymous author of the fourteenth century, with his own commentary, appeared at Vilna, 1874, to which a learned preface is added on the authorship, the importance, &c., of this Targum. Indeed, it is a wonder that Dr. Adler's official duties left him time for this production. After he retired from office in 1879 he returned to his old love, and prepared a commentary on the Targum of the Prophets, which it is said he has left in a very advanced state, if not quite finished. Having had the advantage of the golden age of the Bodleian Library, when MSS. were still lent freely, the deceased was able to make use of MS. glosses on this Targum as well as of readings in MSS. containing the text of it. We hope that the rich Jewish community of London will honour their late Chief Rabbi by the publication of this posthumous work.

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT have now in the press, and will publish early in the month, a new novel, entitled 'Part of the Property,' by Miss Beatrice Whitby, author of 'The Awakening of Mary Fenwick.'

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have just ready for publication an edition for schools of the Greek text of St. Matthew's Gospel, by the Rev. A. Sloman, formerly master at Westminster, and now Head Master of Birkenhead School. The text is that of Drs. Westcott and Hort, and the notes and introductions are intended to supply the average schoolboy with the necessary help and materials for reading the text intelligently.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. will publish almost immediately a translation (from the second edition) of M. Victor Henry's 'Short Comparative Grammar of Greek and Latin for Schools and Colleges,' by Mr. R. T. Elliott, who has just been appointed Lecturer in Classics in Melbourne University. Prof. Henry Nettleship contributes an introductory preface.

THE deaths are announced of the Rev.

A. D. Crake, the author of many popular books for the young, and also for several years second master of All Saints' School, Bloxham; of Canon Aubrey Moore, a well-known tutor at Oxford and controversialist on the High Church side; and of Countess Wickenburg-Almasy, a Hungarian poetess, who, however, wrote in German.

OF the first two volumes of Prof. von Sybel's 'Begründung des Deutschen Reiches durch Wilhelm I.,' which appeared recently, fifty thousand copies are reported to have been disposed of already. Such a sale is certainly phenomenal for Germany. The third volume is expected to be published this month, and the two concluding ones in the course of next autumn. A sixth volume will be added by way of supplement.

AMALGAMATIONS of publishing houses are being attempted in Germany as well as England. The brothers Kröner—the successors of the famous house of Cotta—Hermann Schönlein Nachfolger, and W. Spemann, of Stuttgart, have entered into a union to be called "Union. Deutsche Verlagsgesellschaft."

MADAME M. STAAL, the daughter of the great Cobet, has just presented to the library of the University of Leyden the collection of books and manuscripts which he had left her. It includes a series of Greek classics in well-known editions, enriched with Prof. Cobet's marginal annotations, and MS. volumes containing his notes on and emendations of Greek codices in French and Italian libraries.

MR. BULLEN has now retired from the Museum, where his bibliographical knowledge will be greatly missed. On Wednesday his colleagues presented him with a silver tea service. Dr. Garnett, it is supposed, will be the new Keeper, but he is not yet appointed.

THE first edition of 1,600 copies of Sir Monier Williams's 'Buddhism,' published by Mr. Murray last February, was exhausted before the end of the year. The new edition will have the advantage of a full index, and a great part of the work has been revised.

MR. MUDDOCK is indignant that in our notice of his tale the other day we spoke of him "as an arm-chair traveller," and thinks we ignore his exploits, of which he sends us a list a great deal too lengthy to print. We were quite aware, too, that he was a traveller, for we have had the painful task of perusing his Swiss guide.

THE only Parliamentary Paper of importance this week is Pauperism, England and Wales, Paupers relieved on July 1st, 1889 (6d.).

SCIENCE

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

THE planet Mercury will attain its greatest western elongation on the evening of the 23rd inst., and may be visible about that time, in the constellation Capricornus, before sunrise. Venus will be in superior conjunction with the sun a little before noon on the 18th. Mars is in Libra, and rises not long before midnight throughout the month. Jupiter is in Capricornus, and rises about 5 o'clock in the morning. Saturn, therefore, which is in Leo and rises soon after sunset, is the only large planet visible during any part of the evening in the present month.

The volume of Greenwich Observations for 1887 has recently been published. It has several appendices, of which the first contains the reduction of the photographic records of the barometer from 1874 to 1876 and of the dry-bulb and wet-bulb thermometers from 1869 to 1876 (so that all the photographic meteorological records are now reduced up to the date of publication), and the second contains the long-expected 'Ten-Year Catalogue of Stars,' deduced from observations made from 1877 to 1886. The total number of stars observed (most of them a considerable number of times) is 4,059, and the places are reduced to the epoch January 1st, 1880, which is a more convenient date than the mean year of the catalogue. Although circumstances have delayed the appearance of this valuable catalogue, the places of the standard stars contained in it were circulated amongst astronomers more than a year ago, and it seems a pity that they have not yet been used in the Nautical Almanac, which in its last issue still used places brought up from the 'Nine-Year Catalogue' for 1872.

The Twenty-fourth Report of the Board of Visitors of the Melbourne Observatory was presented to the Houses of the Victorian Parliament on the 12th of September, together with the report of the Government Astronomer to the Board, which refers to the year ended on the 30th of June, 1889. No work could be done with the great telescope in consequence of the difficulties connected with the repolishing of the great mirror, and in accordance with Mr. Ellery's suggestion, the Board recommend that the expediency should be considered of substituting a refractor for the reflector. Limited use was made of the photoheliograph in consequence of experimental alterations in the telescope; but the transit-circle and the south equatorial continued to be regularly employed, the latter chiefly in the observation of comets.

The Forty-fourth Annual Report of the Director of the Astronomical Observatory of Harvard College (Prof. E. C. Pickering) was presented to the Visiting Committee on December 14th, and has been published. Besides active continuation of the photometric and photographic work of the observatory, several comets and other objects have been observed for position. Supported by further aid from Mrs. Draper and also from the Boyden Fund, an expedition has been sent to Peru, under the charge of Mr. S. I. Bailey, with the view of extending some of the most important investigations made at Harvard, so as to include the southern stars, thus embracing the whole stellar heavens in the researches. The station selected was a mountain about six thousand feet in height, situated about eight miles from Chosica; and nearly one-half of the entire programme has already been carried out. An expedition was also sent to Southern California, under the direction of Prof. W. H. Pickering. The total eclipse of January 1st, 1889, was successfully observed there, but it was not until May that the large 13-inch telescope was mounted on Wilson's Peak, since which it has been kept at work throughout every clear night. The objects photographed were selected from a list of 625 double stars, 143 clusters, and other celestial bodies, including the moon and planets. The results prove the advantages to be derived from the climatic conditions of the locality, as compared with the eastern United States, the difference being especially pronounced for such objects as the markings on Jupiter.

We have received the number of the Memorie della Società degli Spettroscopisti Italiani for November, 1889, containing Prof. Tacchini's account of the solar phenomena observed at the Collegio Romano during the third quarter of last year, and a continuation of the series of diagrams of the spectroscopical images of the sun's limb as observed at Rome and Palermo to the end of the year 1886. An increase in the number and frequency of the spots is shown in the last as compared with the previous quarter; also an augmentation in the number and height of the prominences.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Jan. 23.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'On a Photographic Method for determining Variability in Stars,' by Mr. I. Roberts, and 'Physical Properties of Nickel Steel,' by Dr. Hopkinson.

GEOLOGICAL.—Jan. 22.—Dr. W. T. Blanford, President, in the chair.—Messrs. E. T. Beard, W. Fairley, and L. M. Lamb were elected Fellows, and M. G. Dollfus, Paris, and Prof. A. von Könen, Göttingen, Foreign Correspondents of the Society.—The following communication was read: 'On the Crystalline Schists and their Relation to the Mesozoic Rocks in the Lepontine Alps,' by Prof. T. G. Bonney.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Jan. 23.—Dr. Evans, President, in the chair.—Rev. A. S. Porter read a paper descriptive of the seals of dignity, secreta, and seals ad causas of the Archbishops of York from 1114 to 1544. Mr. Porter's paper was illustrated by a fine series of casts.—Rev. W. Greenwell communicated the results of his most recent excavations of barrows in East Yorkshire. These had confirmed his previous theory that bodies were always buried with the face towards the sun, and he had also found examples of inhumation and cremation in the same barrow. In one case he had found the central burial encircled by a ring of stones within the mound; this he thought was to prevent the supposed exit of the spirit of the deceased. In one barrow a set of twenty conical jet buttons, probably for ornament only, were found lying down the front of the body. In another case four bronze axes were found of a make and condition far finer than any of this period yet discovered. But the most remarkable find was that of three round objects of carved chalk, found with the bones of a child of about six years old and a drinking-cup of the usual type. The chalk objects are 5½, 4½, and 4 inches in diameter respectively; their heights are severally about half an inch less. Each is covered with a series of patterns carved and incised, and has on one side a plain panel containing a very rudimentary representation of a human face. The tops are carved in imitation of lids, with circles and other devices. The meaning of these strange and perfectly unique objects has not yet been discovered. Pottery with the same rude face has been found at Hissarlik, and at Antiparos and other Greek islands, and it has been suggested some objects exported from there were copied on these chalk things. Possibly, too, the face may have some unknown religious meaning. These and the other objects found by Mr. Greenwell clearly belonged to the early Bronze Period.

STATISTICAL.—Jan. 21.—Mr. F. Hendriks, V.P., in the chair.—The paper read was 'On Popular Education in England and Wales since 1882,' by Mr. R. Hamilton. This paper is in continuation of one read in 1883 on popular education in England and Wales before and after the Elementary Education Act of 1870, and reverts to the conditions under which progress was made up to 1882. In the prospect of further controversy and legislation upon the subject, the writer's object was to show the nature of the work since carried on, as far as it can be deduced from the returns of the Education Department, and with reference to the "code" and "instructions" issued from it.—In the discussion that followed, the Chairman, Dr. J. G. Fitch, the Rev. J. J. Coxhead, Sir R. W. Rawson, Mr. T. H. Elliott, Mr. S. Bourne, Mr. A. E. Bateman, Major P. G. Craigie, and Sir J. Danvers took part.

LINNEAN.—Jan. 16.—Mr. J. G. Baker, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. S. Lithgow was elected and the following were admitted Fellows: Major A. R. Dorward, Messrs. C. W. Turner, J. T. T. Valentine, and W. Rome.—Mr. C. Reid exhibited and made remarks upon a collection of fruit of Trapa natans, from the Cromer forest bed at Mundesley.—Mr. J. G. Baker exhibited and described a collection of cryptogamic plants from New Guinea, upon which Mr. A. W. Bennett and Capt. Elwes made some critical remarks.—In the absence of the author, Mr. A. Barclay, a paper was read by Mr. B. D. Jackson on the life-history of a remarkable uredine on Jasminum grandiflora.—A discussion ensued, in which Mr. A. W. Bennett and Prof. M. Ward took part.—This was followed by a paper from Mr. E. E. Prince 'On certain Protective Provisions in some Larval British Teleostean.'

MICROSCOPICAL.—Jan. 8.—Rev. Dr. Dallinger, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. T. F. Smith exhibited by means of the oxyhydrogen lantern a series of photomicrographs of various diatoms taken with Zeiss's apochromatic objectives and projection eye-pieces giving powers of 1,000 to 7,500 diameters. At the conclusion of the exhibition Mr. Smith presented the series of slides, fifty-two in number, to the Society for future use and reference.—Mr. S. C. White exhibited a specimen of a parasite found in the cockroaches which infest sugar ships, also a slide containing bacilli in large numbers from a urinary deposit.—A paper by Dr. R. L. Maddox 'On a small Glass-rod Illuminator' was read.—Owing to the lateness of the hour the reading of papers by Mr. Michael and Dr. Czapski was postponed until the March meeting.

PHILOLOGICAL.—Jan. 24.—Rev. Prof. Skeat, V.P., in the chair.—Dr. R. de la Grasserie was elected a Member.—Dr. J. A. H. Murray made his yearly report on the progress of the Society's 'English Dictionary,' of which he is now editing vol. ii, while Mr. H. Bradley edits vol. iii. Dr. Murray first noticed part v., which he and his staff produced last year. It contained many very difficult words, of which one was cast, the longest verb yet treated. It, a Scandinavian word, had supplanted the A.-S. weorpan, warp; then throw almost took its place; and now chuck was replacing throw. Prof. Skeat believed that his E. Anglian cop would turn out chuck. The work had been so heavy, through some assistants being transferred to Mr. Bradley, that Dr. Murray got no holiday last year. The Dictionary wanted an endowment by Mr. Carnegie or some of his rich friends. Its debt to the Clarendon Press was sadly heavy. The death of Mr. Jacob was a great loss. Dr. Murray then gave the names of the sub-editors and chief readers for the Dictionary, and the department each took. Part vi. must go to Cot, and the next three parts to the end of D, the quotations for classical words being, alas! cut ruthlessly down. The words clean, cloth, clothe, were then discussed; and on nouns Dr. Murray said that the most important distinction between them had never been noticed: one class could take a before them and have a plural, like a table, tables; the other could not, like mud, leather, unless they took the secondary meaning of "a kind of" leather, &c. Dr. Murray then dealt with coal, cock, cocker, and explained the history and derivation of cockatrice.—The thanks of the meeting were voted to Dr. Murray for his report and his inestimable services to the Society's Dictionary, and resolutions were passed sympathizing with Mrs. Jacob on the loss of her husband, a most zealous and valued sub-editor of and worker for the Dictionary.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Jan. 27.—Mr. B. F. Cobb in the chair.—Dr. S. Thompson delivered the second of his course of Cantor Lectures 'On the Electro-Magnet.'

Jan. 28.—Mr. W. Crane in the chair.—A paper 'On the Relation of the Fine Arts to the Applied Arts' was read before the Applied Art Section by Mr. C. C. Robins.

Jan. 29.—Prof. Roberts-Austen in the chair.—A paper 'On the Utilization of Blast Furnace Slag' was read by Mr. G. Redgrave, and was followed by a discussion.

Science Gossip.

The medals and funds to be given at the anniversary meeting of the Geological Society on February 21st have been awarded by the Council as follows: the Wollaston Medal to Prof. William Crawford Williamson, LL.D., F.R.S.; the Murchison Medal to Prof. Edward Hull, LL.D., M.A., F.R.S.; and the Lyell Medal to Prof. Thomas Rupert Jones, F.R.S.; the balance of the Wollaston Fund to Mr. W. E. A. Ussher, of the Geological Survey of England; that of the Murchison Fund to Mr. Edward Wethered; that of the Lyell Fund to Mr. C. Davies Sherborn; and a portion of the Barlow-Jameson Fund to Mr. William Jerome Harrison.

The Council of the Royal Meteorological Society have arranged to hold at 25, Great George Street, in March next (18th to 21st), the eleventh exhibition of instruments and photographs illustrating the application of photography to meteorology. The committee will also be glad to show any new meteorological instruments or apparatus invented, or first constructed, since last March, as well as photographs and drawings possessing meteorological interest.

PROF. HICKS, the Principal of Firth College, Sheffield, has just completed a treatise on the 'Dynamics of Particles and Solids,' intended as an introduction to the subject for the use of students with no knowledge of the subject beyond the elements of algebra and pure geometry. It will thus, it is hoped, be found useful not only in colleges and schools, but also to that large class of mechanical engineers to whom a knowledge of dynamics is valuable, but whose acquaintance with mathematics is slight. Messrs. Macmillan & Co. will publish the book early in February.

MESSRS. STEVENS & SONS have in the press a 'Treatise on the Law of Letters Patent for Inventions,' by Mr. Lewis Edmunds, barrister-at-law. The author intends to take up every branch alike of the history and of the practice of English patent law.

FINE ARTS

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION.
 (Third Notice.—The Dutch Pictures and the Poussins.)

AMONG the Dutch pictures we have not yet noticed, Mr. Crews's Adoration of the Shepherds (No. 63), by C. Dietrich (or Dietrichy), deserves special mention as it illustrates the character and qualities of a branch of the great school that founded itself on Rembrandt's art. Besides, it is noticeable for the striking feature, common since Correggio's time, that the naked Christ as an infant radiant forms the chief source of light in the picture, and therefore a powerful element of the design as well as of the chiaroscuro and light and shade. The group of shepherds kneeling in adoration is a company of boors, without a touch of the sentiment that the Italian masters imparted to their naive looks and very human attitudes. Poetic invention had almost died out in the days of Dietrich, who laboured the draperies and polished the surfaces and textures of his pictures with dull toil and the metallic impasto of a Dutchman of the eighteenth century. He was the latest of the followers of Rembrandt (1712-74). His pictures are scarce in England; that before us was at Manchester in 1857. In a merely mechanical sense he owed not a little to Metsu, whose fine Old Woman Reading (64) comes from Bath House, and is signed with the name of the painter. It is Smith's No. 39, Supplement, and when described by him was in the collection of Madame Hoffman, of Haarlem. Waagen, 'Art Treasures,' ii. 104, speaks in praise of the "singularly harmonious depth of chiaroscuro, and of masterly treatment." This encomium is fully deserved because the picture is a thoroughly excellent example of the brilliant and accomplished painter, whose art is undervalued by those who rave about his exquisitely laboured silk and satin dresses, while they ignore the appropriateness of his expressions, the animation of his attitudes, his broad and simple yet powerful coloration and chiaroscuro. A thoroughly characteristic piece is this picture of an old woman reading a book which lies before her on the sill of a stone-built window, while Metsu's familiar bird-cage hangs at the side of the opening, and a pestle and mortar of brass stand at her elbow. Equally characteristic is Mr. James's Woman scouring a Kettle (94), likewise signed "G. Metsu." Near her are some pewter plates, the brass pestle and mortar, and a vine (another of his favourite subjects) clings to the top of the window. It is Smith's No. 87 and was mentioned by Descamps. In 1754 it was sold, with the collection of M. L. de Nieuville, for 18*l.*; in 1830 it belonged to M. Noe, and later to the Rev. J. Clowes, of Manchester. Lord Ashburton's famous Metsu is Lady Drawing a bust lying on a table (116). Her eyelids show the skill of the painter and his sympathy with his subject, and the position of her hands is most natural and appropriate, while the painting of her draperies received the praise of Waagen, who noted in them the light and soft manner of Metsu, and, in the whole picture, "the most refined truth of nature and the most perfect harmony." No. 116 is Smith's No. 41, and has long enjoyed a high reputation, being engraved in the Poullain Gallery by Pelletier and by Vaillant. In Descamps's time it belonged to the Marquis de Voyer. It possesses one of the longest pedigrees that any painting can claim. In 1754 it was sold at Amsterdam for 55*l.* with the collection of Heer Tonneman; it was successively sold with the pictures of M. L. de Nieuville, 1765, for 94*l.*; with those of M. de Poullain, 1780, for 200*l.*; with the Comte de Merle's, 1783, for 192*l.*; with Prince Galatin's, 1825, for 264*l.* M. De la Hante brought it to England and sold it for 400*l.*

Lord Ashburton has also lent a capital picture by A. Van Ostade, A Drinking Bout (67). Luminous and perfect in every touch, it is a first-rate instance of the painter's best time—that of the date it bears, 1663. It is Smith's No. 71, and was sold in 1779 for 148*l.*; in 1817, with the Duc d'Alberg's pictures, for 350 guineas. Admirable are the vigour of the design and the abundance of incident. A still finer piece of genre comes from the same collection, the famous Woman and Child (78). The beautiful and motherly expression on the woman's face proves the sympathetic insight of A. Van Ostade even more than the quaint humour of those boozing peasants and wizened old men we all associate with his pictures. There is real humour in the simple and wondering look of the baby. The light and shade are quite admirable, better even than Van Ostade's light and shade usually are, and his reputation as a colourist and artist in tone might safely rest on this little gem of 14×11 in. It is dated 1667 (ten years after his marriage to Anna Ingels, his second wife, and one year after her death), when he was fifty-seven years of age. Notwithstanding the date, which he observed and quoted (the picture has always been celebrated), Smith, who numbered it 66 (and Supp. 33), tells us that in 1654 Descamps noticed it in the collection of the Marquis de Voyer. It was sold in 1777 with the Prince de Conti's collection for 290*l.*—a great price for those days; the Duc de Praslin sold it in 1793 for 318*l.*; from the Choiseul-Praslin Gallery (where it was engraved) it went in 1808 for 201*l.* to M. de Sereville; next, in 1811, for 480*l.* to M. Dufresne, who in 1816 sold it to Talleyrand. It went for 500 guineas in 1817 to Messrs. Gray and Allnut. The former collector kept it till the late Mr. Baring gave, it is said, 500*l.* for it. See Buchanan, who gave the dimensions wrong, p. 331, vol. ii. Yet another A. Van Ostade comes from Bath House. It is called Interior of a cottage (111), and is a gem of the first water, warmer and richer in tone, and more solid, than the Queen's famous picture by the same master, No. 113, another Interior, which is very fine indeed. No. 111 is Smith's 64, and was engraved, as No. 14, with the Choiseul Gallery, when it was a companion of No. 78 in this exhibition. From that collection it passed in 1777 for 120*l.*; ten years later M. de Beaulieu sold it for the same sum. Mr. A. Baring lent it to the British Institution in 1819 as No. 96. It is but small, 14×12 in., yet its details are wonderful and its humour rare. Smith valued it at 450 guineas. The Queen's picture (113), signed and dated 1668, is Smith's 146. Formerly in the collection of M. Smeth van Alpen at Rotterdam, whence it passed for 450*l.*, it went to M. Schmidt, of Amsterdam; it next came to England, and in 1811 was sold to the Prince Regent from the La Fontaine Gallery for 1,000 guineas nominal. The Tric-Trac Players (117), lent by Mr. Lonsdale, completes the remarkable collection of the painter's works. It is dated 1670, and on that account may profitably be compared with the other pictures by him.

The River Scene (80), which Lord Carlisle has lent, is one of the best works of a cabinet size by A. Cuypp. Luminous, admirable for its clear, silvery tone, it charms us with its atmosphere extending to the grey, vaporous distance of the river, where the tacking barges wend slowly on their way. It appears to be Smith's 24, which was sold with the collection of M. Slingelandt in 1784 for 76*l.* 10*s.* He had many Cuypps. No. 86, Landscape and Figures, lent by Mr. Cator, is far from being a good Cuypp; it is, indeed, doubtful. Neither the figures nor the distance are worthy of the painter to whom it is ascribed. Lord Ashburton's Portrait of the Painter (91) is highly interesting and of a comparatively rare kind. It did not always bear this name, although its genuineness and merit were never doubted, and both Smith (whose 268 it is) and Waagen admitted it to be almost worthy of Rembrandt, which is, however, rather exaggerated praise. Some parts seem to have been retouched. Cuypp, or whoever the person represented may be, appears to be in deep mourning. He holds an empty locket in his right hand, and his face, enclosed by dark and bushy hair, is very sad. We should like this picture to be hung by the side of the portrait by Cuypp in the National Gallery. The next Cuypp is Lord Yarborough's renowned Scene on the Ice (96), a subject Dutchmen, from Breughel to the present generation, have delighted to paint. This masterpiece of harmony and serene beauty was No. 47 at the British Institution in 1832, and was here in 1875. It is Smith's No. 19, and, as he tells us, was sold with the Van Slingelandt Collection in 1785 for 153*l.* That was at that time a stupendous price for a Cuypp; before 1750 no picture by this master had fetched more than 3*l.*, and it was not till the Van Slingelandt sale, and the presence of English and French dealers in the Dutch market, had raised the prices of such works that they were thought worth more than to be "thrown in" by auctioneers desirous of stimulating tardy bidders. 'The Portrait of the Painter,' No. 91 before us, which had belonged to Sir C. P. Turner, was sold to Mr. Baring in 1815 for 75*l.* 12*s.* 'Cuypp drawing from Nature,' 10½×17½ in., was sold in 1872 for 1,249l. to the New York Museum, although in 1827 it was bought in for 598l., and in 1845, with Earl Granville's pictures, it went for 525l. In 1874 'Herdsman tending Cattle,' Smith's 136, fetched 3,150l. The highest price given for a Cuypp in England was, according to Mr. Redford's 'Art Sales,' 5,040l. in 1876, for 'A Landscape, early morning,' which is a little longer than that before us. At the same time 'A View on the Rhine,' 22x30 in., fetched 3,150l. Prices given in France for Cuypps have equalled the highest in England. The Duke of Wellington's Man holding a Grey Horse (114), an acceptable Cuypp, has not been exhibited here before now, and has not been registered in the lists of Cuypps.

There are two very fine Terburgs, which are always welcome, and two Maeses that are delightful to see, because they apply to simple domestic subjects art that is at once fine, subtle, and sympathetic. We fear that Mr. A. James's Terburg, An Officer writing a Despatch (75), has not escaped rubbing, especially the spirited figure of the patient trumpeter in the blue coat Terburg affected, with its black and silver ornaments. The subject, which was not likely to suggest itself to many, was a favourite with Terburg, whose gentlemen and ladies are as often concerned in the receipt and despatch of letters as Teniers's boors with drinking and dancing, Jan Steen's damsels in their doctors' visits, and Metsu's maidens with their guitars. There is a capital Terburg like that before us in the Dresden Gallery, which is one of a sequence of epistolary subjects long ago separated, and Smith mentions five versions of this particular incident, besides other cognate themes. Terburg's pictures were difficult to copy well enough to deceive experts, so it seems clear that he repeated his subjects himself. In that before us the light and shade are beautifully disposed, and the local colours aid the effect with all the painter's characteristic art, so that the chiaroscuro is delightfully broad and good. The faces could hardly be better or truer to nature.

The other Terburg is Lord Ashburton's beautiful Music Lesson (72), Smith's No. 2, a much better picture per se than the renowned 'Congress at Munster,' now in the National Gallery. Smith says that, although Descamps had mentioned it while in the well-known collection of M. L. Lormier at the Hague, it was sold in 1765 with the collection of M. L. de Neufville for not more than 89l.; even the fact of its belonging to Smith van Alpen, generally advantageous to pictures, did not, when it was sold in 1800, secure for it more than 180l. In 1811, with the Le Brun Gallery, it was sold for 494l. to Prince Talleyrand, at whose sale in 1817 Mr. A. Baring gave 750 guineas for it. Buchanan in describing it, 'Memoirs,' ii. 340, rose almost to poetry. Smith showed his taste in calling it "an example of unrivalled beauty and perfection." Could a picture dealer say more? It was No. 33, and called 'The Music Master,' at the British Institution in 1819; it is a better picture than the 'Guitar Lesson,' for which Sir R. Peel in 1826 gave M. de la Hante 920 guineas, and which is now No. 864 in the National Gallery. 'La Leçon de Musique,' which was in the San Donato Collection, is fresh in the memory of Terburg's admirers, and, although the design is different, the motives are analogous. For the intelligent and attentive face of the pupil the painter's lively half-sister Gesina may have sat. He need not have made her younger than she was, for she retained her fresh carnations and "bouche mignonne et vermeille" to a relatively late date. She was sixteen years younger than Gerard himself. Even among Terburgs this picture is remarkable for a beautiful disposition of the light and colours forming a perfect chiaroscuro. The master was at his best when he painted the lady's pale amber satin jacket, trimmed with white fur; her white satin petticoat only he could depict thus softly, with abundance of hues and light, and with supreme firmness, yet without a touch of that metallic quality towards which the satins of Metsu even, and still more strongly those of Netscher, Terburg's pupil, almost invariably tended. These satins show that he attained the utmost skill in textural imitation without forfeiting any of the higher qualities of painting. The extreme warmth and brilliancy which marks them is in fine apposition with the black head of the mandolin. The morbidity of the lady's plump and somewhat luscious flesh is technically as valuable as the spirited expression and the lids dropped over her eyes, which heedfully follow her well-rounded finger along the lines of the music, as if she waited to take up the note from the teacher and continue her part in the piece. Her expression indicates a little impatience and surprise because she has lost her place for a moment. This is one of a number of little touches of humour to be observed in Terburg's picture.

Among the examples of Dutch genre produced according to canons of design which, although applied to subjects of the humblest sort, are of the highest kind, are two by Nicholas Maes, one of Rembrandt's ablest and most accomplished pupils. So few pictures are attributed to him that Smith described only forty-five. No doubt this enumeration is but relatively complete, still the number is instructive when we remember that the compiler of the 'Catalogue Raisonné' reckoned the works of many inferior masters by the hundred. The National Gallery contains two specimens by this painter, and these are amongst the best of his works. Mr. S. S. Joseph's Interior (101) is a characteristic specimen of this fine and original artist. As is usual with Maes, the light is admitted by a lofty window. It pours down on the neck and bust of a young woman suckling her infant. Rembrandt-like, the artist has spread the light till it is lost on the blanket on which the child lies, thence it is reflected with the subtlest gradations from the edges of various objects until it is lost in the shadows of the room, which, dark as they may be, are never opaque, unbroken, or cold. The wealth of tones and broken, yet harmonious hues in the mass of dark shadow on the wall behind the figures proves the painter a worthy follower of Rembrandt. The tender expression of the mother's face is of the highest quality in design, while the serene satisfaction of the infant is equally natural and subtly expressed. The picture seems to be Smith's No. 2, which was sold with the Colonne Collection, March 25th, 1795, for 71 guineas. The second Maes now before us belongs to Lord Ashburton, and has long been one of the treasures of Bath House. It is called A Woman Sewing (104), and it is, if possible, even finer than its neighbour. The effect of light, shade, and tone is similar, but not identical. A lace maker (not the same as the matron in No. 101, for her hair is brown, not black, and she is younger) sits at work with a needle. Her deliberation is exquisitely expressed, and even her lips show the care with which she works. Her brick-red petticoat, black gown, white kerchief and cap illustrate the coloration Maes affected as frequently as De Hooche. The lace pillow the needlewoman has laid aside is a triumph of touch; the large map hanging on the wall, and half lost in the shadow, reminds us how often Vermeer, Ochtervelde, and Egdon Vander Neer put maps on the walls of their interiors, and thus illustrated the seafaring ways of their countrymen.

The Landscape (73), by Ruysdael and Berchem, is a capital example of its kind, and is the more interesting for being dated 1652. Ruysdael used to get help sometimes from Berchem, and at other times from Lingelbach, A. Van de Velde, or from the Wouwermans, with figures he could not paint. No doubt, although one of the measurements does not tally with those given by Smith for his No. 103, this is the picture he has so numbered. The date and details are in close agreement. No. 103 was sold in Paris in 1809, with the collection of M. Grand Pré, for 280l. It belonged to the Duchesse de Berri, and in 1834 was offered for sale for 480l. The shadows are rather blacker, yet warmer than usual. The execution of the tree trunks and foliage is what Crome successfully imitated. Berchem's Landscape (74), belonging to Lord Ashburton, is a famous example, known as 'Le Fagot,' because it comprises a man carrying a faggot on his back. It excited the admiration of Smith, whose No. 49 it is, and Waagen declared that few pictures evince a more poetic feeling and are, at the same time, so attractive for energy of colouring and precision of spirited touch. "Here we see what this master really could do." We confess we do not admire it so much as these authorities. Still, small as it is, it is remarkable for its softness and just and delicate aerial perspective. The effect of the deepening twilight is impressive. It passed from the collection of M. Blondel de Gagny, in 1776, for 162l.; from that of the Marquis de Pange, in 1778, for 240l.; from Prince Talleyrand's in 1820, when it was valued at 600l.

Nicolas Poussin's Landscape (62), lent by Lord Ashburton, is one of the ornaments of Gallery II. The exhibitions at Burlington House, excellent as they are, have not supplied many opportunities for studying the art of this fine and original master; indeed, only about twenty of his pictures have been seen here. We long for a collection of Poussins including 'St. John at Patmos,' 'The Bier of Phocion,' its companion 'The Athenian Acropolis,' 'Orion' (which belonged to Reynolds), 'Venus and Adonis,' and Lord Ashburnham's 'Pyramus and Thisbe,' all of which are in this country. Lord Ashburton owns the fine 'Jupiter and Io,' which has not darkened so much as the capital example now before us, which is so replete with Poussinesque dignity, classic reserve, and seriousness of sentiment that, although so small, it justifies the criticism of Sir Joshua that Poussin "seems to have lived and conversed with the fabled beings he so well represented." Few of us can doubt that, even more than on antique sculpture, of which he could not have known much, Keats formed his notions of ancient art upon Nicolas Poussin's designs. So much the deeper is our debt to the Norman, who in this canvas of 21 in. by 17 in. has produced a noble picture of herdsman and cattle reposing under lofty trees, with a river between cliff-like banks, and a sky so stately and serene that it seems made to hang over a world of peace and grand repose. Technically this specimen is rather heavier in touch, more monotonous in tone, harder and somewhat blacker in its shadows, than usual with the master.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

In the gallery of the Fine-Art Society may be seen more than a hundred drawings in water colours by Mr. Fulleylove. We have often admired his previous works, but these views in Cambridge and the Riviera surpass them in brilliancy. Mr. Fulleylove's touch is frank, firm, and searching; he displays a grace in foreshortening which is delightful to artistic eyes, and the most charming facility in representing weathered stones of many kinds, spaces of pure sunlight, and shadows as limpid as they are solid. Mr. J. Willis Clark has contributed a prefatory notice to the catalogue, in which he deplores, with only too great reason, the destruction that is going on of all that is historical and venerable in the university and town of Cambridge; for there "are forces at work which year by year change the aspects of the colleges, and destroy the old-world look which spoke of cloistral peace and a student's tranquil retreat." It is manifest that these forces, or those which, as it was sarcastically said, "teach, but do not educate," have been at work at Cambridge with a vengeance. "It is hardly too much to say," declares Mr. Clark, "that before long not a single ancient house will be left." The more is the pity, and the greater the need for an artist like Mr. Fulleylove to delineate with affectionate sympathy and true taste the architectural relics which are being vulgarized even more ruthlessly than they are being obliterated. It is a pleasure to praise such a brilliant study of light, exceptionally solid in handling, as The Great Court, Trinity (5); Entrance from the Backs, Clare (7), in which the noble gates are foreshortened with rare tact; and the warm, soft, and broad Hall, John's (14). The vanishing perspective of the portico and gravel walk as well as the fountain itself in the centre of Fountain Court, King's (14), are only just surpassed by the general sunniness and breadth, and the able treatment of the atmosphere in The Great Court, Trinity (16), where we have charming firmness without hardness. With these may be mentioned the delicate and solid Conduit, Great Court, Trinity (19), The Bridge of Sighs, John's (20), and Wren's Bridge and Trinity (26). To these let us add Trinity Library (48), John's Tower (60), The Gate of Honour, Caius (37), Jesus's Lock, Moonrise (66), and Peterhouse (68).

At Mr. McLean's gallery, in the Haymarket, may be seen 101 drawings of "Cathedral Towns and Picturesque Places in Germany and Italy," by Mr. E. H. Bearn, which, although not of the highest class—they are rather too mannered and deficient in solidity—are extremely clever. The artist has shown tact in choosing picturesque points of view and in the management of light and shade. If he aimed at more research, showed greater care in avoiding wooliness, and was more studious in reproducing the varying characters of different materials, so that, for instance, all his stonework was not of the same texture and nearly the same colour, Mr. Bearn would achieve a reputation. The best of the works before us are Cathedral, Amalfi (15), which is bright, warm, and soft; the very richly coloured and toned Pulpit, San Marco, Venice (17); the vigorous Fruit Market under the Ancient Palace of the Archives, Como (28); and, best of all, Rome (51). Mr. Bearn is least fortunate in such drawings as The House of Albert Dürer (41), which has all the trickiness and mechanical chic of S. Prout, with few of the graces of his tact and none of the fascinating simplicity of his motives. The almost uniform brownness of Mr. Bearn's shadows, which in nature differ as much in colour as her lights differ, betrays the lamp and impairs our pleasure in looking at his works.

NEW PRINTS.

THE one perfect expression of the original motive of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood that Rossetti produced is the 'Ecce Ancilla Domini' commonly called 'The Annunciation,' a small upright picture on panel, now No. 1210 in the National Gallery. It was begun in 1849 and finished in 1850 in a dismal studio (looking upon a mouldy timber yard) which Rossetti shared with another artist at what was then No. 7, Cleveland Street, Fitzroy Square. Chromatically speaking it is an exercise in varieties of white with darker hues of red, brown, and blue. The coloration and tonality lend themselves to translation by an engraver whose sensitiveness to delicate gradations of colour and subtle contrasts of tone is as fine as M. E. Gaujean's, the etcher of the beautiful 'Flamma Vestalis' of Mr. E. Burne Jones. The public is indebted to Messrs. Agnew & Son for both prints; an artist's proof of the Rossetti lies on our table, and is certainly worthy of both the artists whose work it is. The sole shortcoming of an engraving which is most successful in all other respects seems to be that there is less of the brooding tender girl in the Virgin's face, and more of the graver, if not sadder woman, than the picture shows. Still the difference between the versions is slight, while the difficulty of reproducing an expression so spiritual is immense. That the left hand of Gabriel is a little too large is no fault of the engraver, who has drawn the archangel's naked right arm and modelled all the very beautiful draperies with delightful firmness and research. Nor is it M. Gaujean's fault that the left foot of Rossetti's Gabriel is too low and large. The flames about the feet of the angelic harbinger tell in the etching as the painter intended they should, and aid as parts of the mystical character of the picture. The face of Mary is a likeness, with hardly any alteration, of the painter's younger sister Christina, now renowned as a poetess, who sat for it. The face of Gabriel was mostly founded on that of Mr. Woolner. Rossetti worked a long time on the draperies of both the figures. In Mary's dress he used a lead pencil to a considerable degree.

We have received from the Fine-Art Society an artist's proof—the remarque a lamb, as of Giotto's flock, and his shepherd's calabash—of a large and luminous etching by Mr. A. W. Remington of Giotto's 'Campanile, Florence,' with the open space in front, and the great church on our right. The artist has deftly projected the large shadow of another building upon the pavement and the base of the tower, so as to make the upper stages of the latter distinct in the lustrous upper air. The etcher has improved considerably since we admired a large plate from St. Gilles's at Arles, and he has wisely freed his work from all resemblance to that of Mr. Haig, which, admirable as it is, lacks something of the lighter and choicer elements of the Florentine plate before us. This does unusual justice to a most difficult subject, and is at once brilliant, soft, and massive.

A number of etchings signed "Wm Brown," but with no mark or publication line, lie before us, and represent architectural subjects, such as the ruins of Kelso and Melrose Abbeys, and scenes on Ormsby and Rothesby Broads. Some of the former group are drawn in a careful, firm, but somewhat heavy manner, e.g., the 'North Transept, Melrose Abbey,' of which the good drawing attests Mr. Brown's familiarity with his subject and knowledge of perspective. The brightest, clearest, and most lightly touched of these plates is 'Melrose Abbey, South Transept,' many parts of which remind us of Cui's masculine touch and somewhat stony and unsympathetic style. Of sentiment, without which studies of this kind are dull things, there is little in any of the drawings. The dignity, grace, and beauty of these themes have not inspired the draughtsman, whose water subjects, however, are not without prettiness.

THE ARUNDEL SOCIETY.

19, St. James's Street, Jan. 20, 1890.

IF it be a "notable" thing that the Council of the Arundel Society should point out to the subscribers what they consider a defect which has crept unobserved into one of the Society's publications, it certainly is not less notable that the art critic of so able and generally well-informed a paper as the Athenæum should "for thirty years and more" have repeated an allegation against that Society which has no foundation but in his own imagination. At no time has the Society allowed its copyists to "supply defaced heads, legs, hands, or even noses to their drawings of old masterpieces." It is true that the first copyist to whom the Council gave a commission, now more than thirty years ago, took liberties of this kind; but for that and other proofs of untrustworthy workmanship he was before long discarded from the employment of the Society, and has never again been recalled to it. It is a rule laid down from the first by the Council, and communicated to all their artists, including the copyist of the Lorenzo da Viterbo, that whenever any important part of a figure in an old painting has perished or been effaced it is not to be restored in the copy. The enforcement of that rule has sometimes been found difficult; for Italian copyists, like Italian architects and sculptors, think every work of art, however old, should look smart and tidy; and just as the architect polishes away the weather-stained surface of the ancient stone or marble, and the sculptor supplies arms and legs to the mutilated torso, so the copyist, if left to himself, fills up every void in the decayed fresco, to give it that superficial prettiness which is often the highest quality he knows in art. When, however, the Arundel Council have succeeded in getting what they believe to be a conscientious and satisfactory representation of any old painting, the first question is whether it is fitted for publication, or merely for exhibition in the general collection of water-colour drawings from ancient masters in the Society's gallery. This question depends, amongst other considerations, on the perfect or imperfect preservation of the subject as depicted in the original work. For however instructive and interesting a fragmentary or dilapidated painting may be, it is not, with a few exceptions which it would take too long here to define, but which speak for themselves as soon as seen, fitted for representation by such a process as chromo-lithography. Subject to such obvious exceptions, all the copies of frescoes produced for the Society by the chromo-lithographic process do certainly make the originals appear still perfect, at least in composition and design; but for the best of reasons, namely, because those originals (setting aside the one which has provoked the present discussion) are still perfect. No others are selected by the Council for publication. The reason why the chromo-lithograph from the Viterbo fresco is an exception to the rule is, that the drawing having been made several years ago, when no photographs from the fresco were to be had, and the copyist having since died, the Council did not discover in time that any of the original figures had perished, and accordingly placed the drawing in the chromo-lithographer's hands to reproduce in strict facsimile. When at length they found out the interpolation of some modern portions in the design, they thought it not "magnanimous," but simply natural, to point them out to the subscribers, who on their part have not testified the same "surprise" as your critic at being treated with candour.

I regret having to ask for space which must be valuable in your columns, especially on a matter which cannot be made altogether pleasant for reading. But as I am unwilling to attribute your continued disparagement of the Society's publications to any other cause than misapprehension, it may, I hope, be doing you a service if, after three decades of uncontradicted but unfounded censure, I prevent you from entering on a fourth (the last you will have in this century) with a repetition of what may in the end do less discredit to the Arundel Society than to the Athenæum.

THE TREASURER OF THE ARUNDEL SOCIETY.

* * A discussion of the question our correspondent raises would take much more space than we can afford. We cannot share the satisfaction he expresses in the chromo-lithographs of the Arundel Society.

First-Art Society.

THE sale by Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods of the engravings and other objects belonging to the late Mr. T. O. Barlow is appointed for the 20th, 21st, and 22nd of March.

MR. DUNTHORNE invites visitors to see "Pictures from a Home County," by Mr. F. W. W. Topham. The private view of the 19th Century Art Society's exhibition, Conduit Street, Regent Street, is appointed for to-day (Saturday). The public will be admitted on Monday next.

THE Trustees of the British Museum, having completely lighted with electricity the greater part of the upper and lower galleries in Great Russell Street, including those devoted to antique sculpture, the Bird Gallery, and Medieval Room, invited a number of visitors on Tuesday evening last to witness the result. The general opinion was that the lighting is perfectly successful, especially that of the Greek and Roman sculptures in the Elgin Room and the galleries leading to it. Both the sculpture as a whole and particular statues were exhibited in a way which is not less novel than beautiful. Much of this is due to the judicious placing of the lights themselves. It is wisely arranged that the illumination of the Bird Gallery shall differ in colour from that of the sculptures, the former being warm in colour and less intense than the latter. Very powerful lanterns, and few of them, hanging high in the galleries, afford the illumination which is best suited to statues and bas-reliefs, and except in a few, doubtless unavoidable, cases, where crossing shadows occur and are due to antagonistic lamps of nearly equal powers, suffice to display every work to great advantage. Some of the statues are seen better than by daylight. In the Medieval Room, where the Venetian glass, majolica, brass, and Hispano-Mauro ware are collected, the scene is worthy of Aladdin's palace. In the Bird Gallery multitudes of small lamps are placed close together and in two parallel lines enclosing the skylights. Accordingly the illumination is softer, less intense, and diffused so as to reduce the shadows throughout. The public will be admitted to these galleries this evening (Saturday) for the first time, and so on, on alternate weekday evenings, from 8 to 10 on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays to the Library, Ethnographical, Glass, Porcelain, Prints, Asiatic, and Medieval Collections; and on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays to the sculpture and other antiquities.

The Society of Lady Artists will hold its thirty-fifth exhibition of works of art, as hitherto, in the Drawing-Room Gallery at the Egyptian Hall. Paintings and etchings are to be sent in on March 4th and 5th; sculpture, March 11th.

The twenty-ninth annual exhibition of the Glasgow Institute of the Fine Arts will be opened to the public from Tuesday next, the 4th inst., and closed on the 28th of April.

AMONG recent additions to the Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities in the British Museum is a perfectly preserved seal of sard, a scaraboid mounted as a ring in a somewhat less ancient, but still very rare hoop of silver. It was found in Cyprus, and dates from the early part of the fourth century B.C. It is a whole-length standing figure of Athena turned in profile to our left. She is armed with a lance of about her own height, and rests her left hand upon her shield, which bears no cognizance. On her head is the usual helmet with the high and flowing crest; on her breast is a lorica set with what look like large studs (but may stand for the snakes), not covered with scales, as is frequent. At Athena's side her serpent, thrusting forth its tongue, rears itself in an S form. The proportions are characteristic, and the technical shortcomings are of no great importance. The special significance of this relic exists in the fact that in her right hand the goddess holds the stern ornament of a ship, the function of which seems to us to have been that of keeping the vessel's head to the wind when, during a gale, she was riding at anchor; without something of this kind, aided probably by the corresponding prow ornament (acrostolion), a trireme must have had a bad time of it in rough weather, and the rowers have been continuously at the oars to prevent her drifting into the trough of the sea. Mr. Murray suggests that the seal probably indicates a naval victory.

MR. DUNTHORNE will shortly publish a mezzotint engraving by Mr. F. Short after Mr. Watts's fine picture 'Diana and Endymion.'

The proposed destruction of the chancel of Chapel-en-le-Frith Church continues to excite opposition. The vicar, the Rev. S. H. Pink, originally consulted the Derbyshire Archaeological and Natural History Society, but is now going in the teeth of the advice given by the architect recommended by the council. The following communication was sent to the vicar from a special meeting of the council last week:—

"Our council has heard with the deepest regret of the proposed demolition of the chancel of the church at Chapel-en-le-Frith. This chancel, in the opinion of the most competent judges, is undeniably of great age and interest, and to pull it down is a course most strongly to be deprecated, if there is a possibility of retaining it as it is. We understand that a scheme has been proposed to you by which the chancel can be preserved intact and yet made perfectly safe and in good repair. In the name of our society we hope you will permit us to urge you most strongly to reconsider the decision which, we are informed, has been arrived at, and to determine carefully to preserve from destruction this interesting and valuable relic of the past."

JOHN BACON, the sculptor and R.A., author of many good works, such as the statue of the Thames in the quadrangle of Somerset House, Howard and Johnson in St. Paul's, Mrs. Draper at Bristol, and various examples in the colonies, was buried in 1799 at Whitefield's Chapel in Tottenham Court Road, a structure which has come to grief. What is going to be done with his tomb?

The annual meeting of the Cambrian Archaeological Association will take place next August at Holywell in Flintshire, under the presidency of Lord Mostyn. Mr. Gladstone has recently become a member of the Association.

ON Tuesday, the 17th inst., Messrs. Boussod, Valadon & Co. will open at the Goupil Gallery an exhibition comprising about thirty of the works of C. F. Daubigny, a fine landscape painter who is more talked about than known in this country. The private view is appointed for the 15th inst.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 27th ult. the following: T. Rowlandson, 'Tattersall's Horse Repository in 1800,' water-colour drawing, 17l. Twenty-six Etchings by J. M. Whistler, 50l. 'Mont St. Michel,' engraving by A. H. Haig, 22l.; and 'L'Angelus,' engraving after J. F. Millet, by C. Waltner, 33l.

THE outcome of the great artistic quarrel in Paris is likely to be memorable. A new Société Nationale des Beaux-Arts has been formed, comprehending artists of all kinds, who will, on the 15th of May next, open an exhibition in the Palais des Beaux-Arts on the Champ de Mars. It is expected that the end of this dispute will be the liberation of French artists from the sometimes vexatious patronage of the State, which, while it houses works of art in the Palais de l'Industrie, exacts a handsome rent in the form of free admissions to the exhibitions. If the end be the establishment of a selecting committee, determined to exclude from its Salons those acres of unmitigated trash which have degraded the great gathering in the Champs Elysées, it will be well for French art. In that case the fine masters whose abstinence from the Salons we have so often lamented will, we hope, return to their places and enable the world to see what French art really is. This will require the creation of an independent and self-reliant society, formed by the leading members of both the societies, and having a gallery of their own. Of the pecuniary success of such a gallery there cannot be a moment's doubt.

M. PROTAS, the well-known battle painter, is dead. He was originally in the Post Office; he went to the Crimea under the auspices of General Bosquet, and in 1859 to Italy.

MR. HENRY BLACKBURN writes:—

"Excepting that the columns of the Athenæum are referred to for a record of facts, I should not trouble you with a reply to Mr. Pennell's letter. 'L'Autographe au Salon,' the work he apparently refers to, was issued in Paris in 1864, and for two or three years after. It was oblong quarto in form, and contained lithographed reproductions of sketches by various artists exhibiting in the Salon; a charming souvenir of the exhibitions, with facsimiles of sketches and notes by Rousseau, Corot, Daubigny, Millet, Cabanel, Gérôme, Meissonier, and other artists of the day. Several instances of sale catalogues, éditions de luxe, with sketches or indications of pictures, are known to connoisseurs, both in this country and on the Continent, and even in Japan. But if any good purpose were to be served by tracing a similarity to Academy Notes in any previous book, Mr. Pennell should rather have quoted a little handbook to the National Gallery by Sir Henry Cole (Felix Summerly) with woodcut illustrations by J. Linnell, published many years ago by George Bell & Sons, London. It is much to be regretted that any random assertions should be made in Mr. Pennell's beautiful book on 'Pen Drawing.' His error in his note in last week's Athenæum is excusable, as he could scarcely have been on the scene when the pioneers of the new methods of reproducing pen drawings, in relief to print with type, were experimenting in London, Paris, and New York, and laying the foundation of a system of illustration which has since spread over the world. As a 'last word' on this subject, let me point out that even in Paris opinions seem to differ considerably as to the origin of illustrated catalogues of picture exhibitions, for a M. Dumas, who commenced the Salon Catalogue in 1879, calls it in his preface mon idée."

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—London Symphony Concerts. Sir Charles Halle's Concerts.

WHILE hoping for the establishment of Mr. Henschel's Symphony Concerts on a sure foundation, we have never hesitated to point out the shortcomings which from time to time have characterized his efforts as a conductor. To do so is a positive duty, as it is becoming increasingly manifest that the public will no longer give its support to any musical undertakings save those in which superlative excellence is attained. There has been an amazing increase in the study and practice of orchestral music in London during the past few years among amateurs, who formerly if they wished to enjoy a symphony were compelled to attend a public concert. Large, fully equipped societies and musical clubs have sprung up in all directions, and these must necessarily draw away an ever-increasing portion of the public from performances in St. James's Hall, excepting those in which merit of an exceptional character is apparent. These will probably meet with more and more support, while the chances of success for mediocrity are yearly becoming more remote. The present is a suitable opportunity for reflections of this nature, for Mr. Henschel's concert on Thursday last week was one of the most successful he has yet given. Objection must be taken to certain points of detail—such, for example, as the hurried close in the Overture to 'Tannhäuser,' which deprived what should be a dignified climax of much of its proper effect. But for crispness, precision, and general intelligence the rendering of this, as of the Prelude to the third act of 'Die Meistersinger,' the Overture to 'Ruy Blas,' Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, left little to be desired. Concerning Mr. Ferdinand Praeger's Symphonic Poem in F we have little to add to what was said when the work was performed at the Crystal Palace on November 27th, 1886. It was then called a Fantasia; but the change of title is immaterial. The composer has urged that a symphonic work should be an organic whole, yet he has only given us a fortuitous concourse of atoms. True, one theme permeates the score from beginning to end; but the details are confused, and after the second section incoherent. The pessimistic "programme" adopted by the composer is, of course, the reason of the generally unsatisfactory impression left by the work, but this does not furnish him with an excuse. There are subjects which are not suited for musical treatment, and if a composer selects one of these he has only himself to blame if the result is an artistic failure.

When the Berlioz fever raged some eight or nine years ago the whole of the French master's works, with the exception of his operas, were presented in turn to the public, but his 'Faust' alone succeeded in making an enduring impression. The 'Roméo et Juliette' has not been heard in its entirety in London since 1881, and the last performance in England, if our memory serves rightly, was at the Bristol Festival in 1888. Sir Charles Halle takes a warm interest in the music of Berlioz; but he can scarcely have expected that the instrumental portion of the work just named would constitute a strong attraction for the public at his third concert on Friday last week. The 'Roméo et Juliette' has been so fully dealt with on former occasions that it would be superfluous to criticize or describe the movement illustrating the feast of the Capulets, the Scène d'Amour, or the Queen Mab scherso, and we shall only record a splendid performance by the well-trained Manchester orchestra. In the first part of the programme Madame Néruda gave a perfect rendering of Spohr's Violin Concerto, No. 8 (scena cantante); and the remaining items were Weber's 'Buryanthe' Overture, Grieg's 'Spring' melody for strings, and the daintily scored intermezzo from Svendsen's Symphony in B flat, No. 2.

Musical Gossip.

THERE is a good deal of interest in the announcements of the Philharmonic Society for the forthcoming season, though we think too much prominence is given to foreign composers. Dvorák will conduct a new symphony, Moezowski a new orchestral suite, M. Benoit a selection from his 'Charlotte Corday,' Signor Mancinelli his suite 'Scene Veneziane,' M. Widor a new 'Fantaisie' for piano and orchestra, Sir Arthur Sullivan his Overture to 'Macbeth,' and Dr. Mackenzie his 'Pibroch' Suite. English music will be further represented by a new orchestral work by Mr. Frederic Cliffe; and among the novelties are Gade's overture 'Nordische Sennfahrt,' and a suite by Grétry. The solo performers already engaged include M. Sapellnikoff, Signor Buonamici, Mr. Borwick (a pupil of Madame Schumann), M. Ysaÿe, and Herr Ondricek. Mr. F. H. Cowen remains the general conductor of the Society. The dates of the concerts are March 13th and 27th, April 24th, May 8th and 22nd, and June 5th and 28th.

FOLLOWING the example of Leeds, Handel's 'Messiah' will not be included in the scheme of the Norwich Festival, which will be held on October 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th next. The arrangements are as follows:—Tuesday evening, 'Judas Maccabæus.' Wednesday morning, a new cantata by Dr. Hubert Parry, to which a title has not yet been given, and Rossini's 'Stabat Mater'; evening, a miscellaneous concert, including a symphony. Thursday morning, 'The Martyr of Antioch' and 'The Last Judgment'; evening, Mr. Hamish MacCunn's new cantata 'Queen Hynde of Caledon,' &c. Friday morning, 'Elijah'; and evening, the second act of Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman,' &c. This scheme is unquestionably superior to that of the last festival, and we hope that the committee will exercise a larger amount of discretion in the selection of the chorus, and also maintain a reasonable amount of supervision over the rehearsals. It was obvious at the festival of 1887 that the works had not been fully prepared, and as this is a matter easy of rectification it should be looked to before it is too late.

SCHUBERT'S Octet was repeated at last Saturday's Popular Concert, and Rubinstein's Sonata in D, for piano and violoncello, Op. 18, was also in the programme. Mlle. Janotha appeared in place of Madame Haas as the pianist, and Miss Florence Hoskins was the vocalist.

ON Monday Herr Stavenhagen made his second appearance, and gave his singularly delicate and fanciful interpretation of Schumann's 'Papillons,' Op. 2, to which we have already called attention. It is difficult to say, however, why two numbers should have been omitted and the minuet from Schubert's Sonata in C substituted. Herr Stavenhagen has all the attributes of a really great pianist, but he must guard against eccentricities. The rest of Monday's programme consisted of Schumann's Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, and Beethoven's Septet. Miss Marguerite Hall was acceptable in songs by Schubert, Henschel, and Brahms.

THE Queen and the Princess of Wales have consented to allow their names to appear as patronesses of the concert kindly undertaken by Mlle. Janotha in aid of the fund now being raised for the benefit of Madame Arabella Goddard. The performance, which will take place at St. James's Hall on March 11th, will include Beethoven's Triple Concerto, to be played by Mlle. Janotha, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti; and among those who will take part are Mrs. Mary Davies, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Sims Reeves, and the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society.

THE Clapham Philharmonic Concert on Thursday last week consisted of a recital of pianoforte and violoncello music by Mr. Tobias Matthay and Mr. W. C. Whitehouse. The principal items in the programme were Grieg's Sonata in A minor, Op. 36, and Rubinstein's in D, Op. 18.

CONCERTS in commemoration of the birthday of Robert Burns were given by Mr. Ambrose Austin in St. James's Hall and by Mr. William Carter in the Albert Hall on Saturday last.

WALLACE's best opera, 'Lurline,' was revived on an elaborate scale by the Carl Rosa Opera Company at Liverpool on Wednesday last week. The principal characters are impersonated by Madame Georgina Burns, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Leslie Crotty. The performance is as highly praised as that of Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette' the week previously.

THE programme of Sir Charles Halle's Manchester concert on Thursday contained Schumann's Symphony in B flat, No. 1; a Scherzo in D minor, by Lalo, for the first time; and the overtures to 'King Stephen' and 'Jean de Paris.' The vocalist was Madame A. de Swiatlowsky, a contralto from the Imperial Opera at Moscow.

A DETERMINED effort is being made in Bristol to revive the Monday Popular Concerts, which were carried on for several years by Mr. Riseley at a serious personal loss. Last week the Mayor presided at an influential meeting, and it was resolved to form a guarantee fund and to give six concerts at once and twelve next season. We wish the undertaking the success it will surely deserve, for Mr. Riseley will again be the conductor.

THE notices we have received from New York relative to the production of Gilbert and Sullivan's new opera 'The Gondoliers' are, on the whole, exceedingly unfavourable. The company sent out by Mr. D'Oyley Carte is universally condemned as below the standard required in a high-class American theatre, and, with the exception of the quartet "In a contemplative fashion," the music is generally regarded as trivial. The tone of the criticism is, for the most part, highly intelligent, but the work is regarded from too high a standpoint. The Gilbert and Sullivan operas are infinitely superior in artistic qualities to opéra-bouffe, but they should not be judged as examples of the highest form of lyric drama.

HERR HANS VON BÜLOW has just celebrated his sixtieth birthday by conducting a concert at Hamburg. As a memento of the occasion Brahms presented him with the original score of his Symphony in F, No. 3, and a sum of 500l. was subscribed, which the gifted musician desired should be handed over to local charities.

ALTHOUGH the French press rarely mentions the name of Wagner except in terms of reproach, it is evident from the programmes of the principal concerts in Paris that his music has become as attractive to the public as it is in London. Last Sunday, for example, M. Colonne's programme contained the Prayer from 'Rienzi' and the Siegfried Idyl; and that of M. Lamoureux the Overture to 'Rienzi,' the Prelude to 'Lohengrin,' the Siegfried Idyl, and the Funeral March from 'Götterdämmerung.'

HANDEL'S 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' was performed at the Paris Conservatoire concert last Sunday, with Madame Melba and M. Engel as the soloists.

THE total receipts of twenty-one performances by Messrs. Abbey and Gran's opera company with Madame Patti at the new Auditorium in Chicago amounted to more than 46,000l. It must be remembered, however, that the building holds eight thousand persons.

THE Dutch journals mention the first performance at Rotterdam of an unpublished opera entitled 'Norma,' by a composer named Rijken. The libretto follows the lines of Bellini's work, and the music is warmly praised, the composer's temerity being justified by the excellence of his score.

THE Milan Gazzetta Musicale denies in pointed terms that 'Die Meistersinger' is such a fiasco as the anti-Wagnerian journals assert, and ridicules the assertion that Verdi's 'Ballo in Maschera' was substituted for it. The facts were simply that on one occasion 'Simon Boccanegra' could not be played, and 'Un Ballo' was performed in its place.

History of the American Theatre before the Revolution.—History of the American Theatre during the Revolution and After. By George O. Seilhamer. (Philadelphia, Globe Printing House.)

In this country very moderate interest is felt in the history of the American stage. Americans themselves cannot find stimulating the records of a stage that at the outset was necessarily provincial, and a drama that has even now no strong national characteristic. Everything from the first fought against the theatres in America. At the establishment of the theatrical companies in the United States the entire English population was not in excess of one million, and this was spread over an immense area. In the few centres of civilized existence the antagonism to theatrical amusements had an intensity such as since the Restoration has been unknown in this country. Buildings suitable to dramatic entertainments were hard to find, and the costly necessity of erecting a theatre together with the corresponding difficulty of obtaining a licence not seldom confronted the travelling manager when he entered a new town. Newspapers took little cognizance of the stage, what is called dramatic criticism was unknown, and the social status of the actor appears to have been immeasurably lower in America than in the mother country.

As regards the drama, meanwhile, the case is worse. Previous to the Revolution, which brought with it a suspension of histrionic performances, nothing approximate to a drama exists. For this circumstance alone are to blame. While, however, the development of revolutionary ideas in France can be read by the light of dramatic literature, scarcely a sign of discontent is traceable in America. The country had, in fact, no theatrical literature.

Uninteresting as it enforcedly is, the American stage has arrested a fair amount of attention. William Dunlap, a prolific dramatist, a poor artist, and an unsuccessful manager, published in his old age a 'History of the American Stage,' which for nearly half a century remained the only authority. Slovenliness and inaccuracy distinguish this as most other stage compilations. It is, however, not without interest. In late years critical attention has been bestowed on the subject, and works of serious purpose and genuine value have seen the light. Among recently published works of importance Ireland's 'Records of the New York Stage' occupies a foremost position. Now, however, Mr. Seilhamer seems disposed to give a full history of the rise and progress of dramatic entertainments in America. Should the work be completed on the scale on which it is begun, America will be able to boast a history such as we fancy no European country can claim.

That the matter is not more attractive is no fault of the historian. At the outset the stage was English, and such it was bound to remain. Beside the records of Bath, York, Bristol, or Norwich, those of Philadelphia, New York, and Williamsburg are colourless. The English counties constituted in the last century a nursing ground for actors who found their way to London, and whose names now shine in the front of stage chronicle. No such opportunity was afforded the colonial actors, whose reputation succeeding writers have fanned into a faint imitation of celebrity. A regularly organized company played in New York in 1732. Whether it consisted of professionals or amateurs is unknown. The same doubt prevails as to succeeding companies, concerning whom next to nothing is preserved. On March 5th, 1750, Thomas Kean, of Murray and Kean's company, played in New York Richard III., the repertory of the company including 'The Beggar's Opera,' 'The Beaux' Stratagem,' 'The Busybody,' 'The Spanish Friar,' 'Love for Love,' and various comedies or farces of Dryden, Farquhar, Cibber, Centlivre, Fielding, and other writers. William Hallam—to whom Mr. Seilhamer grudges the title of "the father of the American stage," bestowed on him by Dunlap—was the first "backer" who sent a company to travel in America. From this time forward the name Hallam is, during the period with which Mr. Seilhamer's two volumes deal, of frequent occurrence in American annals. Other names become more or less conspicuous. There is a family of Storers who attain some position. A Mr. Abington, a dancer, is said to be "not impossible the man who afterward gave his name to the celebrated Mrs. Abington." Strong effort is made to prove that a Mr. Palmer, who appeared in Philadelphia as Romeo, was the famous John Palmer, the original Joseph Surface. A gleam of welcome light is given when in Mrs. Harman, who died May 27th, 1773, was a good actress in comedy, and played also some parts in tragedy, we find the granddaughter of Colley Cibber, the daughter of the famous Charlotte Clarke. Miss Chear, a clever actress, who played the lead in both tragedy and comedy, is said to have married in Maryland Lord Rosehill, the son and heir of the sixth Earl of Northesk. Supposing this to be correct, it adds one more instance, not generally known in England, of titled actresses. Lord Rosehill did not live to succeed to the earldom.

In order to preserve any specially American atmosphere, Mr. Seilhamer has, besides supplying prologues and epilogues, which have at times some local colour, to give headings such as "The First American Comedy accepted for Production," "The First American Comedy ever Produced," and so forth. Some attention is also bestowed upon the theatres gradually erected in different parts of America. The highest point of interest is reached, however, in the description of the keen antagonism always produced in Philadelphia by the appearance of the actors. In Boston the citizens were unalterably opposed to theatrical entertainments; and the first experience the Bostonians had of these was when, in 1775, during the Rebellion, the garrison, much to the disgust of sober citizens, gave frequent representations of plays. In other places the devices practised by the minor London houses, especially the Haymarket under Foote, to avoid the prosecution of the Patent Houses, are seen. In Providence, by a convenient euphemism, the theatre erected by Douglass is described as the School-house; and in Newport 'The Fair Penitent' and 'Damon and Phillida' are sandwiched between the parts of a concert, and are given "gratis." Very curious indeed is a Newport playbill, in which 'Othello' is described as a "Series of Moral Dialogues in Five Parts, Depicting the Evil Effects of Jealousy and other Bad Passions, and Proving that Happiness can only Spring from the Pursuit of Virtue." In this wonderful production the characters are announced after the following fashion:

"Mr. Hallam will delineate a young and thoughtless officer who is traduced by Mr. Allyn, and, getting drunk, loses his situation and his general's esteem. All young men, whatsoever, take example from Cassio.

The ill effects of drinking would you see?
Be warned and keep from evil company."

New York newspapers inserted letters against the stage, charging for their insertion as advertisements.

As one explanation of the unpopularity, amounting almost to odium, which attached to actors, it must be advanced that "being English they were looked upon as sympathizing with British aggression." So early as 1764 this feeling took offensive shape in wrecking the theatre in Chapel Street, which Douglass had built in 1761.

Mr. Seilhamer's books repay perusal. His system is satisfactory, and he brings within easy reach much information. It is to be hoped that he will continue his labours. The date in his first volume is easily understood. The second volume ends in 1792, when, according to our author's assumption, begins a new era, that in which English actors who had distinguished themselves on the English boards went to America. Of this period also we shall be glad of an account that will pleasantly supplement English records. Mr. Seilhamer has had many difficulties against which to contend, and his work displays much research. His two volumes are handsomely printed with wide margins. It is to be wished he would turn these to account, and give us the year on every page. It would be a great comfort as regards reference.

THE WEEK.

CRITERION.—Revival of 'Cyril's Success,' a Comedy in Five Acts. By Henry J. Byron.

IF not dead, Byron's comedies are moribund. The best and most effective of them all, that on which Byron elected to take his stand and challenge criticism, has been revived and will not serve. A brilliantly clever man, he supplied the stage with an unending succession of plays, none of which wholly failed or wholly succeeded. His method in art was hopelessly wrong; but he was incapable of a better. The success of 'Caste,' by his old friend and associate Robertson, stung him to strenuous effort, the result being 'Cyril's Success,' his masterpiece, if the word can be used in connexion with his work. In this there are some traces of direct imitation of his model, a rare thing in Byron, who, whatever his shortcomings, was no plagiarist. The scene in the last act in which Major Treherne, who is believed dead, comes back, and, entering an attic, interrupts in their task of eating those who take him for a ghost, has a very strong resemblance to a well-remembered scene in the last act of 'Caste.' It is, however, as much weaker in construction as it is in pathos. While fresher and less extravagant than other plays of Byron, 'Cyril's Success' has the radical defects of his dramatic work, and, though Byron took with it as much pains as he was capable of bestowing, conveys the idea of being scamped.

As was justly remarked on the night of its revival, its very basis is wrong, an idea appertaining only to farcical comedy being used to support a play of serious interest. A wife tormented by baseless jealousy finds on the floor a tender letter addressed by a woman to a man. She assumes it is intended for her husband, and forthwith quits his house. An action so idiotic as this may furnish a conceivable basis for farce, but for nothing more serious. The characters are well sketched, but are untrue to themselves. Sorrow is, of course, a divine, albeit a stern teacher, but it does not immediately revolutionize every character whose education it begins. A man such as Major Treherne is not won to penitence and to nobility of life by a pistol-wound which shatters an arm, nor does an old bear such as Matther Pincher develop into a lamb because his publishers fail, or something of the kind, and he is out of work. The best thing in the play is its dialogue; yet here even it can be seen how the joke is led up to, and how, to find means for its introduction, probability is violated and a stop is put to the action of the play. The work, in short, throughout is clever but insincere. At the time of its production Byron all but persuaded the world that it was a good play. When now revived at the Criterion, however, whatever glamour once invested it has disappeared. It is true that the interpretation was indifferent. Mr. Leonard Boyne was strong in one or two scenes as the hero, but his acting was ill graduated. Miss Olga Brandon extracted from Mrs. Cuthbert more charm than pathos, and the grumpiness of Matthew Pincher was scarcely conveyed by Mr. David James. Recent experiences in serious comedy inspire an increasing desire to see the Criterion company in the more effervescent style of piece in which it used to be seen.

Dramatic Gossip.

A DISAPPOINTMENT awaited those who flocked on Tuesday to the St. James's Theatre to see 'As You Like It.' A notice appeared on the doors that Mrs. Langtry was unwell and no performance would take place.

The last weeks of 'La Tosca' have been reached. The piece can scarcely be said to be failing in attraction, but the expenses of production, which are double the average, prohibit its performance except to overflowing audiences.

The revival at the Globe of 'The Taming of the Shrew' was interesting as spectacle. The acting, however, was amateurish and boisterous. 'DEARER THAN LIFE' is the latest of Mr. Toole's revivals in connexion with his farewell representations.

A DUTCH version of 'The Middleman' of Mr. Henry A. Jones has been produced with success at the Municipal Theatre, Amsterdam, with Heer Bouwmeester in the part of Cyrus Blenkarn, first played by Mr. Willard.

A FOUR-ACT drama by Mr. Sydney Grundy will be one of the next novelties at the Haymarket Theatre.

GOETHE'S 'Egmont,' translated by Adolph Aderer, is to be played for twelve nights at the Odéon Theatre in Paris. It has never hitherto been performed in France, and is to be given without abbreviation, and with Beethoven's music.

THE Grillparzer-Gesellschaft, to the foundation of which we recently alluded, was formally instituted on January 22nd at Vienna, when Hofrath Zimmermann delivered a spirited address on Grillparzer as a dramatist. The distinguished critic expressed the opinion that the recognition of Austro-German literature in Germany proper was due to the author of 'Sappho.'

A NEW BOOK BY SIR CHARLES DILKE, BART.

PROBLEMS OF GREATER BRITAIN.

By the Right Hon. Sir CHARLES DILKE, Bart.

With Maps. 2 vols. 8vo. 36s.

“This is in no sense a new edition of the well-known ‘Greater Britain.’ That was a record of travel which, though still in demand, is necessarily in some points antiquated. Not seeing his way to incorporate new facts or correct old statements in such a way as to produce a satisfactory result, Sir Charles Dilke thought it best to produce an entirely new book upon the same subjects as those treated in the original work, but dealt with from the point of view of political and social observation and comparison, rather than from that of descriptive sight-seeing. The new book, therefore, is not a book of travel, but a treatise on the present position of Greater Britain, in which special attention has been given to the relation of the English-speaking countries with one another, and to comparative politics of the countries under British government.”

The Quarterly Review says:—“This is a charming example of the biographer's art. Not every son can be trusted to produce a fair delineation of a parent's life, or is able to inspire his readers with confidence in the discrimination or judgment brought by him to the execution of so delicate an undertaking. But in regard to the volumes before us, if it is at first approached with the distrust which experience has taught, we are sure that it will gradually fade away as the reader advances, and before the end is reached will be replaced by its opposite. The result is a portrait of the man in his sparkling and combative prime, which for brightness and charm must be allowed to rank high amongst the most successful specimens of psychological delineation.”

A Historical Sketch of the Conflicts between Jesuits and Seculars in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. With a Reprint of Christopher Bagshaw's 'True Relation of the Faction begun at Wisbech' and Illustrative Documents. By Thomas Graves Law, Librarian, Signet Library. (Nutt.)

WHATEVER Mr. Law undertakes he carries through in so exhaustive a manner that his readers cannot fail to learn a great deal from him, whatever may be their prejudices or their assumptions at starting. This volume is certainly a valuable monograph on a hitherto neglected chapter of English history, and one which, in so far as it has been studied at all, has been treated with a strange timidity, partisans on one side or the other finding so much they would fain hide that they have preferred keeping silence to speaking out. Mr. Law's introduction is, in effect, an attempt to tell the story of a conflict which went on during more than thirty years between two parties in England of whose very existence many fairly educated Englishmen have never heard, or if they have heard of them, they have heard and little more. Yet it is a fact that during at least the last thirty years of Queen Elizabeth's reign there were among the Roman Catholics in this country two parties whose differences were continually growing more and more pronounced, whose antagonism became ever more fierce and bitter, and whose reconciliation has, up to the present time, been little more than a gratia male sarta, the old soreness still existing, and the old scars still betraying the irritation that is apt to be felt below the surface.

During the last twenty years or so there have been almost more than enough of revelations from the Jesuits and their advocates. Father Morris, by his attractive style and the judicious selection of narratives which contained quite a fund of romantic incident, has succeeded to a great extent in casting a glamour upon the stubborn and cruelly used recusants, male and female, who were more or less under the influence of the fathers of the Society of Jesus. Mr. Foley by his extraordinary industry and perseverance has collected an immense mass of information about the personal history of the English Jesuits, and in many cases about the gentry who supported them and made great sacrifices in so doing. But as to the far larger number of conscientious and not a whit less devoted adherents of the old ritual and the old form of faith, who loved the Mass and hated the Prayer Book, clung to the old priests and flouted the new parsons, but neither knew nor cared what the Jesuit fathers were aiming at, and took the side against them when they began to understand some part of their plan of campaign, no one has told much, and it was full time that some one should throw light on the subject.

For the first twelve years of Elizabeth's reign "the history of the Roman Catholic Church in England," says Mr. Law, "is a blank. Never had a church so completely gone down before the first blow of opposition." Nevertheless, there were malcontents among the conforming clergy, and how much secret celebration there may have been according to the old ritual, side by side with the outward conformity, we shall never know. Moreover, there were hundreds of priests who never conformed at all, and who were the centres of disaffection and discontent, scattered all over the face of the land.

Not fewer than four hundred of them were to be found in England when the queen was excommunicated and sentenced to deposition by Pope Pius V. in 1570. The Bull was perfectly harmless to the queen; but its effect upon the English Catholics was eminently disastrous. It must soon have been felt to be an immense mistake, although the adherents of the Pope could never be brought to confess that it was one. Be it as it may, from this year the Catholics began to lose heart, and the English priests began to lose ground. It was clear that something must be done; and Dr. Allen in 1574 determined to found his famous College at Douai. It started well. Allen's reputation and his attractive manners, his earnestness and personal influence, drew round him a staff of teachers who would have graced any Oxford common room. His enthusiasm was contagious; in ten years he had sent at least a hundred secular priests into England, though as a rule they were not eminent for learning or ability, and few of them belonged to the gentry. Fierce Protestants grumbled; spies and informers did their work, and claimed their rewards; but the laws, which were pitiless and cruel enough to have deterred any but the most furious fanatics, were hardly put in force except here and there, and the secular priests, young and old, were evidently making little or no way. Meanwhile the college had been driven out from Douai (March, 1578), and had taken refuge at Rheims, where the Guises contributed liberally to its support. But why should not the best of the students be provided for at Rome? Gregory XIII. was Pope by this time; an old foundation was utilized, and the ancient hostel which Ina, the King of the West Saxons, was said to have founded and endowed as far back as 721, and which, after going through various changes of fortune, had dwindled almost to nothing—though some of its endowments still remained—was revived, or transformed, or reorganized, the Pope adding largely to its resources; and this ancient foundation was turned into an English College, supplementary to that which, under Cardinal Allen, had done such good work elsewhere. From the first the Roman College was no house of peace. The inmates lived in a chronic state of rebellion and feud. In eighteen years there were no fewer than eight rectors. The cause of quarrel was that the Jesuits, with Father Parsons as their scourge—for he was never loved, never honoured, and never raised to the highest rank among them—the Jesuits were for ever trying to get the whole direction of the college into their hands, and to force upon the students the acceptance of the Jesuit programme.

Then came the famous Jesuit mission to England in 1580. Campion perished on the scaffold. Parsons slipped away to live the life of a stormy petrel for another thirty years. The Jesuit mission of 1580 was a second blunder, and in its effects upon the luckless secular priests in England incomparably more disastrous than the other blunder of the excommunication. Perhaps from this time, too, Allen commenced throwing his influence on the Jesuit side. His college, at any rate, began to suffer. Some of the first fervour had begun to cool down among the students. Allen himself was often absent, his coadjutors had no longer the original solidarity, and the tidings that came from the Roman College were not likely to be without their effect upon the young men at Rheims.

A third enormous blunder was the dispatch of the Spanish Armada in 1588. In England the annihilation of the invading fleet was a terrible blow to the Catholics. It was in vain for them now to shut their eyes to the fact that henceforth the issue was a plain one. It was a question between formularies and patriotism—formularies, not religion; creeds, not convictions—patriotism, not mere declarations of allegiance—the claims which fatherland put forth upon men's hearts, or the claims which Rome persisted in urging upon their obedience. The next year after the Armada, Parsons, the man who "learned no lesson and who lost no hope," was in Spain at King Philip's right hand, building new seminaries—there should be no doubt about their object this time—building as if he had been a modern Endowed School Commissioner who believed in the supreme power of bricks and mortar to attract a host of gifted youths passionately enamoured of the new propagandism.

All this was going on outside England across the sea. But what was going on at home? When news came in 1579 that there was preparing a new and strange invasion of England, and that the Jesuits were coming to vanquish the hearts and consciences of Englishmen by weapons not carnal, but theological—by teaching and preaching and argument—the very novelty of the thing scared even sober men. Was the whole nation to be bewitched?

Cedant arma togæ, concedat laurea linguæ was proclaimed by the new crusaders. "Then," said the queen's ministers, "we will shut up the dangerous talkers." Eight or ten of them were shut up accordingly in Wisbech Castle that same year. As time went on, others were sent to the same stronghold. Some of them were men of means, some men of learning; all were liberally supplied with funds from outside. They lived only too well, their durance was by no means dreadful. Gray, the keeper of Wisbech Castle, found them extremely profitable, and was only sad because they were too few. Gray's daughter Ursula loved them far too well; they converted her. About the year 1587 two remarkable men were sent to Wisbech: William Weston was one, Dr. Christopher Bagshaw was the other. Weston was a Jesuit, a man of learning and subtlety, an ascetic, a pietist who could not bear them that were evil, severe to himself and intolerant of laxity in others, passing his days and nights in efforts after rapture and fighting the demons that gibbered at him in his prayers. He was shocked at the worldliness of these "confessors in chains." He would have them mend their ways. The majority laughed at him, a chosen few joined themselves to him. Under his direction they formed themselves into a sort of brotherhood, who here—even here within the prison walls—would live a life of praise and prayer; they separated themselves from the rest. Dr. Bagshaw, on the other hand, was a man of gentle birth and proud of it, more proud of being an Englishman. He had been Fellow of Balliol when Parsons was expelled. The two Balliol men entertained an intense repulsion to each other. Bagshaw was a good hater, and he hated the Jesuits, if only because Parsons was one of them. But he was a very able man, and from all that appears he had lived a blameless life, had made great sacrifices for his religious conviction—an earnest, conscientious man, learned, fearless, and not averse to try a fall with this or that opponent. For some years the pietists went their own way, and none molested them. The probability is that Bagshaw respected Weston's devotion and sincerity, and gave him credit for what was his due. But Cardinal Allen died in 1594, and his death was the signal for new complications, and there were whisperings and rumours and anxious questionings. The old secular priests were dying off, the supply was falling short, the persecution was going on. The love of many had waxed cold. The secular priests cried out, "Give us bishops; we want them, we have no discipline, each man doing that which seemeth right in his own eyes. How can these things go on?"

Another astounding blunder, the blunder of some mysterious infatuation. The Popes would not have bishops in England till England should be "reconciled," repentant and humbled in the dust. At Wisbech in the winter of 1594-5 things came to a crisis. Father Weston received authority to exercise a sort of jurisdiction over eighteen of the imprisoned priests, now forming a majority, and as for the minority, fourteen or fifteen of them, they were to consider themselves somehow in disgrace. The arrangement could not possibly answer; but both sides rushed into print, and there were no more secrets kept. As for the truth, "The truth lies somewhere, if we knew but where." The Protestant public were exceedingly edified. Cecil looked on grimly silent. Was his game ever better played?

The luckless secular priests while all this was going on were in very evil case. Their numbers were clearly diminishing. In 1585 seventy-two of them were shipped off across the Channel and landed who knows where? Many of them came back, but there could hardly have been four hundred of them to be found in the country now; and yet, even so, this left an average of ten for every county in England—so unequally distributed that there were whole districts in which they swarmed. How could they but be vehemently disturbed by all this Wisbech madness? Nevertheless the Pope would have no bishops, come what might.

Parsons received a sudden inspiration one day. He saw his way to a compromise, and bethought him that there were bishops and archbishops, deacons and archdeacons. Why not priests and archpriests? Nay, there had even been arch-presbyters in the primitive times. Why not now? Let but the Pope lend himself to the plan, and his Holiness might still preserve his consistency, and the seculars might still get the thing they needed, though the name of the thing would be denied them! And then, too, there was something to be gained for his friends the Jesuits, for with Parsons it was the Society of Jesus first and everything else afterwards. And so it came to pass. There was one George Blackwell—he, too, an Oxford man who had thrown up his fellowship at Trinity College and joined the band of scholars and enthusiasts at Douai—a very capable person, and apt—a little too apt—to rule. For his own reasons he had never joined the Jesuits, but his heart was with them—almost all his heart. For years he had been in England, at least once he was in prison; he had lived with his life in his hand; of his firmness and force there could be no doubt. In March, 1598, he received from Rome "the title and authority of an archpriest over all the secular priests in England," with faculties such as, some said, had never been heard of before; but with his credentials came, too, his instructions, commanding him "in all grave affairs to take counsel with the superior of the Jesuits." Who was that "superior"? None other than that Henry Garnet whose name is not unknown—he who was at least seriously suspected of complicity in the Gunpowder Plot, he who was brutally butchered in St. Paul's Churchyard, he of the miraculous straw.

Parsons's crafty device for utilizing the misfortunes of the unhappy secular priests to increase the power and influence of his own order did not and could not answer. It led to new dissensions, and increased the existing rift that had already become too wide. It was the final blunder of a series which were all contributing to bring about the same end. The end was exactly that which Pope and Jesuit and priest and recusant least aimed at and most fervently desired not to bring about—to wit, the absolutely final and irrevocable revolt of England and Englishmen from Rome and Romanism.

The details of the long quarrel which ensued upon the appointment of the Archpriest, the ugly story of the first appeal to Rome and its unscrupulous treatment by Parsons and his supporters, the slanders and the calumnies, the marvellous folly exhibited by such men as Blackwell and many another of his set, the final defeat of Parsons and the Jesuits, and all the ins and outs of that intricate tangle may be read in Mr. Law's volume. It is a melancholy history, and not the less so because it is full of lessons which optimists will not read with pleasure, and bigots, whatever their proclivities, may find it a little dangerous to point to lest it should go to prove too much.

As we have hinted above, there are calumnies which bear their own refutation upon the surface; there are unsavoury slanders which no sensible man will accept as anything but gross exaggerations at the least. The language employed is brutal and coarse. The spirit shown by both sides is scandalous. If in Mr. Law's introduction there is any fault to find, it is that in trying to be severely impartial he leans rather to the side of credulity than to the reverse, and that he seems almost carried away by the force of passionate ferocity of assertion when it rises to the highest pitch of insensate reviling. One insinuation of this learned writer we cannot let pass without protest. That from mere cowardice poor old Bishop Goldwell shrank from joining Campion and his band in crossing to England we do not believe; but this is not the place to discuss a question of the kind. For the book as a whole, and for the exceeding care with which all available sources have been utilized—especially that invaluable collection only lately unearthed, the Petyt MSS.—students of English history owe Mr. Law a debt of gratitude. The labour of such a task as this need hardly be undertaken, even by the specialist, again. So far as Mr. Law has gone, his work may be considered for all practical purposes to have been done, and done once for all.

Sylvanus Redivivus (the Rev. John Mitford).
With a Short Memoir of his Friend and Fellow Naturalist, Edward Jesse. By
M. Houstoun. (Sampson Low & Co.)

This volume is rather disappointing. We hoped that it would contain a good deal of information about the Rev. John Mitford, whose pseudonym forms part of the title of Mrs. Houstoun's work. This expectation has not been fully realized, but we learn a few details not generally known about Mr. Mitford's pursuits and occupations in private life, and there is some interesting gossip about his friends Mr. Edward Jesse, the naturalist (Mrs. Houstoun's father), Mr. John Wilson Croker, the poet Rogers, and other well-known contemporaries. It is pleasant also to find a mention of the old "Toy" Club at Hampton Court, a convivial society—famous in its day, but long since broken up—of which the standard pleasures were whist at half-crown points, and marrow puddings. The club met once a month at the Toy tavern (now pulled down) under the presidency of the Duke of Clarence, and among the members were Mr. Jesse, Mr. Croker, and several of the duke's old naval friends. The duke was fond of the club, and took especial delight, Mrs. Houstoun informs us, in the conversation of a certain rough old captain of the merchant service, "before whose after-dinner eulogies those employed by the bo'sun whom Mr. Marryat has immortalized, would have paled their ineffectual fires." Some of the members of the "Toy" Club received much kindness from the Duke of Clarence after he succeeded to the throne, but Mr. Jesse, then Deputy Surveyor of Royal Parks and Palaces, had been unfortunate enough to offend the prince by objecting to his order for the destruction of some old elm trees on the road between Hampton Court and Kingston. In fact, Mr. Jesse, who in private life was one of the most amiable and kind-hearted of men, appears to have more than once incurred the royal displeasure by the too zealous discharge of his official duties. The First Commissioner of Works, on a report made by Mr. Jesse, stopped some alterations at Windsor Castle undertaken by order of the Prince Consort, and showed the report to the Queen. Shortly afterwards Mr. Jesse received an intimation that it was Her Majesty's desire that he should not again enter the castle. The loss of favour, however, appears to have had no prejudicial effect on the zealous Deputy Surveyor. An enthusiastic naturalist, he found in his favourite pursuit an unfailing source of delight and a consolation in his troubles. His life was a long one, and singularly happy.

A different career in many respects was that of his friend, the Rev. John Mitford, though they had many tastes in common. Brought up at Oriel College, where Copleston was his tutor, Mr. Mitford, after completing his university course, took holy orders, and eventually became associated with the group of literary men of which Mr. Wentworth Dilke, Mr. Croker, Mr. Thoms, and afterwards the Rev. Whitwell Elwin, who happily still survives, were the leading members. One of the special objects of their research was eighteenth century literature, and the result of their labours can only be properly appreciated by those who have worked in the same fields. Mr. Mitford's method was slow, as he mentions himself in a letter to Mr. Dyce, but he was persevering and industrious, and got through a large amount of work. For some years he was editor of the Gentleman's Magazine, and he brought out many of the English poets and several volumes of Mason's correspondence. His best-known production is probably his edition of Milton with life and notes, which, though carelessly printed, is of considerable value to students. As an editor Mr. Mitford, like too many of his contemporaries, was terribly inaccurate, though his knowledge was varied and extensive. He was a classical scholar, and well acquainted with French, German, and Italian. Above all things he was a man of letters, somewhat, perhaps, in the school of the elder D'Israeli, and with that higher interest in literature which enables a student to love knowledge for its own sake without hope of fame or reward. In those days books of reference were less numerous and accessible than at present, and much of Mr. Mitford's information was obtained at first hand. Seventeen of his commonplace books, full of curious notes, written in his minute but extremely beautiful handwriting, are now in the British Museum.

In private life Mitford had many attached friends. "There were few persons," wrote Mr. Dyce, "whom Rogers used to welcome more heartily in St. James's Place than John Mitford; and for my part I must always remember him as the familiar friend whose intimacy with me (which commenced when I might still be reckoned young) materially gladdened my life during many a year, our tastes and pursuits being exactly similar."

Mitford had other occupations besides his literary work. He was fond of art; he was a skilful ornithologist and an enthusiastic cricketer. He was a steady frequenter of the second-hand bookshops, and one or two of the old booksellers still remember him, and tell curious stories of the unclerical vigour of his language; but these occasional fits of irritability were soon over. He was fond of his library, and most of his books contained annotations in his neat writing. We cannot refrain from relating an amusing trait of weakness in Mr. Mitford's character as a bibliophile. He had "that last infirmity" of book collectors, the pride of exclusive possession. We have often heard one of his friends tell the story of a certain Pope pamphlet of which Mr. Mitford had the only known copy of the first edition. At length another copy came into the market, and strenuous efforts were made by several of Mr. Mitford's friends to secure the prize; but they were too late. The pamphlet had already been disposed of, and it was afterwards ascertained that Mr. Mitford himself was the purchaser; and to the indignation of his brother collectors, he refused to part with it. But if he was a jealous book-hunter he made a good use of his acquisitions, and was liberal in imparting the knowledge which they contained. Mr. Mitford's last illness was a painful one. He was suddenly struck down by paralysis, and his mind was before long seriously affected. He died in April, 1859, in his seventy-ninth year.

Mrs. Houston's work contains much that is interesting; but she has not been careful enough in correcting printers' errors, and there are a few passages which require explanation. We read in a note of a portrait by Reynolds of Lady Morris, which "was bought a few years ago by Mr. Beaumont, M.P., for the large sum of 50,050l." There was a picture by Sir Joshua, of which the subject was described as Mrs. Morris, bought by Mr. Beaumont in 1873 at Christie's rooms for 3,622l. 10s.; but perhaps Mrs. Houston refers to another transaction.

There is one statement in this volume against which we must enter a decided protest. Mention is made of Dr. Ford, for many years vicar (not rector, as here described) of Melton Mowbray, and Mrs. Houston writes:—

"It was reported of Dr. Ford that he made the hours of his occasional Church Services subservient to those of the 'meets,' and that often, when engaged in marrying a couple at the altar, or in consigning to the grave the remains of a deceased parishioner, there might be detected beneath the sacerdotal garment either the sheen of the well-polished hunting-spurs, or a betraying strip of enlivening scarlet."

Mrs. Houston has been strangely misinformed. There are still a few aged parishioners at Melton who knew and well remember Dr. Ford, and who declare that he never hunted in his life. Dr. Ford was rather eccentric, but he was an earnest and conscientious clergyman. If he ever hunted at all, it must have been in very early life, and the amusement was soon given up. But the assertion that he was in the habit of making the church services subservient to the hours of the "meets" could only have come from one who had no knowledge of the matter. The statement, moreover, bears its own refutation. Even the most sporting parsons do not hunt in scarlet; and when Mrs. Houston speaks of detecting beneath the sacerdotal garment the sheen of well-polished hunting-spurs, we are inclined to think that she is unaware where that part of a hunter's equipment is usually worn. Mrs. Houston falls into further error in describing the author of the 'Handbook to Spain' as Dr. Ford's son, but this is of slight importance.

Sardinia and the Sardes. By Charles Edwardes. (Bentley & Son.)

THE papers here collected in a volume have already appeared, as the author candidly informs us, in the Saturday Review, the Pall Mall Gazette, the Cornhill, the Graphic, the Field, and other unnamed periodicals; reprinted they make very pleasant reading for a wet afternoon in the holidays, but they do not pretend to impart any real solid information. Mr. Edwardes's former volumes have proved that he is an intelligent observer with an eye for the picturesque; but why does he not give his readers a map, if only in the feeblest outline? His publishers, forty years ago, provided Mr. Tyndale's three volumes with a good map; but the introduction of the railway lines has made this obsolete, and the reader has not always Murray or Baedeker to refer to. Why, also, are we not favoured with any dates? And, again, why has no index been appended to the book?

Sardinia was apparently an unknown land in Florence when Mr. Edwardes set out on his brief trip to the "eccentric island," where, he was informed, he would find marble palaces to be sold for a song; and yet, after all, he discovered on landing in the Golfo Aranci that the mysterious Ichnusa and Sandaleotis of the ancients was uncommonly like County Kerry, and that there was not much to remind him that he was in Sardinia:—

"Not much; but something. For whether we are in the woods, or going dryshod through a swamp, or groaning up to a new watershed, every now and then we pass a building like a Martello tower, or a windmill shorn of its top. The traveller who had not beforehand studied the subject would be mortally perplexed by the things. They are all dilapidated, lichened, and with a tangle of various scrub at their bases, or overgrown with ivy to the summit. For the most part they stand quite remote from villages or inhabited houses. Often they cap rocky knolls, or rise like a beacon-pile at the edge of a bluff. Or they may be set singly in the plain with modern cinctures of meadow-land or grain-fields. These of course are the famous nuraghe of Sardinia, about which I shall add more by-and-by. For the present it may suffice to say that they were ever with us during the twelve hours we were in the train. Where the railway at its highest point rises some two thousand feet above the level, the adjacent mountain steeps are crowned with nuraghe. And, again, when we are speeding across the parched prairies of the south, where for miles on both sides of us there is no tree to cast a shadow, and the long white roads tire the eyes—here also the nuraghe stand forth from the bronzed grass. Safe in Cagliari at the end of the day, one is for the while prone to think of the nuraghe, and little else."

Decidedly these wonderful nuraghe are the most characteristic features of the country, and the archaeological student looks forward to finding an exhaustive discussion of their construction and origin; but, unfortunately, Mr. Edwardes paid only a cursory visit to one at Armungia, famous among other nurhags for its height—some forty feet or so—yet not until he reaches the nurhags of Goni, higher up towards the sources of the Flumendosa river, does he take the opportunity of telling his readers what he has learnt on the subject of nurhags in general.

Mr. Edwardes's final conclusions as to the object of the nurhags agree with and support the opinions advanced by a writer in the Athenæum some seventeen years ago, who argued against the theory of a tower of silence, upheld by the late Mr. Fergusson in his well-known 'Rude Stone Monuments.' Mr. Edwardes remarks:—

"What is the first purpose of a building? Surely to serve as a secure place of abode. This, then, is what the nuraghe were. They may be regarded as the oldest houses in the world, built in an era when the architect had no other model than the shepherd's tent of skins and sticks. Perhaps they were not places of constant habitation. Only when danger threatened maybe did the people resort to the nuraghe; but once within the tower they were completely safe. No mechanical force of those days could break down these walls, nor were they inflammable. If the enemy approached the nuraghe, they could be attacked from the flat summit. And if the nuraghe were used as a refuge only, chambers, staircase and summit alike were available for the storage of human beings. A hundred persons might be assembled in each nuraghe on an average. Let us assume that a few milleniums[sic] ago there were ten times as many nuraghe in Sardinia as in 1889. They would then be able to accommodate, in emergency, a population of no less than four million people. It is not likely that Sardinia ever had so many inhabitants at one time, but the estimate shows to what extent the buildings might have been serviceable."

Accessible from Mamajuda, on the northern slopes of Gennargentu, there are some more relics of pagan Sardinia, which may even date from the era of the nurhags. Unfortunately, Mr. Edwardes does not seem to have visited these so-called perdas longas. Nor did he take the opportunity of diverging from the road at Macomer to visit the "Giants' graves" at Borore, or the remarkable conical pillars of Tamuli in the same neighbourhood. These remarkable objects, which have already been described and figured in the Athenæum, were undoubtedly connected with religious symbols, not necessarily of a revolting character. Very likely Mr. Hogarth and Dr. Guillemard, on their way to or from Cyprus, may be able to discover that they have been used for merely domestic and economic purposes. If we are not mistaken, Mr. Henry Bohn has made good use of his residence in Sardinia to investigate the ancient remains of the island. What is wanted is careful measurement, with details of plan and elevation, of all such monuments. Mere word-pictures are not sufficient.

Mr. Edwardes discourses pleasantly about the cork forests, which densely clothe the mountain sides up to at least two thousand feet, and about the mining districts, where a considerable amount of British capital has been sunk; and, of course, there is a vivid description of a tunny fishery during the excitement of the periodical matanza, or slaughter of the fish. We are also told of the execrable habit of the mining Sardes, who angle for freshwater fish with dynamite. Throughout we hear of the wine-bibbing propensities of the natives.

"It may be thought from this that the Sardes are a drunken race. But in truth they are not. They use wine liberally, and their wrinkled countenances relax under its influences as at no other time. But they are certainly a drinking people."

Indeed, Sir Wilfrid Lawson would hardly approve of some of the incidents witnessed by Mr. Edwardes among the festive and unsophisticated inhabitants of this Mediterranean island.

A History of the Later Roman Empire, from Arcadius to Irene (395 A.D. to 800 A.D.).
By J. B. Bury. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE title of this scholarly and vigorous work is itself an indication that the portion of history to which it relates is regarded by the author from a point of view which has not been adopted, or at least has not been consistently adhered to, by previous historians. Mr. Bury follows Mr. Freeman in maintaining "that the Roman Empire endured, one and undivided, however changed and dismembered, from the first century B.C. to the fifteenth century A.D." Accordingly he refuses to recognize the existence of an "Eastern" and a "Western" Roman Empire at any period before A.D. 800; while such designations as "Byzantine," "Greek," or "Græco-Roman" empire, which former historians have found it convenient to apply to the dominion which had its seat at Constantinople, are entirely excluded from his pages. To say that the "Western Empire" fell in A.D. 476 is, he considers, to give an altogether fictitious importance to an event which was in fact of mostly subordinate consequence—which, indeed, scarcely deserves to be regarded even as an especially significant incident in the history of the disintegration of the Roman Empire. In the fifth century, as at various earlier times, it had two chiefs, each ruling over a distinct portion of its territory; but, however practically independent, or even hostile, the two emperors may have been, according to the constitutional theory the empire always remained one.

It must be admitted that this method of presenting the facts has much to justify it, and that it is especially valuable as a correction to a great deal of widespread misunderstanding. But it does not, we think, embody the whole truth. Whenever we have to deal with the history of an institution which has undergone continuous change through an existence of many centuries, we are always confronted with questions of nomenclature which are more satisfactorily solved by a method of compromise than by a rigorous adherence to the one or the other of the possible alternatives. In the present case we cannot refuse to the empire even of the Palæologi its proper name of "Roman," which marks its historical continuity with the empire of Octavius. At the same time there is surely some awkwardness in speaking, without qualification, of a "Roman" empire to which Italy was a foreign country, and to which all that was distinctively "Latin" was an object of violent aversion. Even with regard to the fifth century, while it is right to recognize the theoretical unity of the empire, and to acknowledge that the constitutional theory was to a greater extent practically operative than some historians have observed, there are nevertheless occasions on which the distinction between the "Eastern" and the "Western" empire has its value as expressing the actual state of the facts. The current fashion of speaking of "the fall of the Western Empire" may, no doubt, be misleading to those who are the slaves of words; still there is a point of view from which even this abused phrase may rightly be considered to have a real historical appropriateness. Until the deposition of Romulus Augustulus there had always been a successor of Augustus who had a claim that could not wholly be rejected to rule Western Europe in the name of Rome. The emperor might reside at Constantinople or Nicomedia, but it was as "Cæsar of Rome" that he was regarded by the Western barbarians as having a theoretical right to their allegiance. So long as there remained a Roman emperor whose seat was in Italy, it was always conceivable that his supremacy over the kings of the West might some time or other be practically revived. No doubt it might be said, in accordance with the often-quoted words of Marcellinus Comes, that the fall of the Western Empire—that is to say, the end of the actual control of the empire over the Western world—took place de facto at the death of Aëtius. But the change which made the distant Eastern city the sole administrative capital of the Roman Empire may justly be regarded as having set a formal seal upon the accomplished fact; and the validity of this mode of viewing the matter would remain unaffected even if it could be shown that the "unity of the empire" was as clearly understood in Gaul and Spain as at Constantinople and Ravenna.

On the whole, Mr. Bury's historical exposition gains far more than it loses by his rigorous adherence to the theoretically correct view of the constitution of the Roman Empire. The point on which he has insisted is the one which is most commonly overlooked, and it will therefore well bear to be emphasized even a little beyond its just proportion. In one respect, however, the author's fidelity to his principles has involved some practical inconvenience. In his chronological tables the names of the Roman emperors are placed all together in a single column, without so much as a difference of type or a distinctive letter to show whether they reigned in the East or in the West. It is hard to see on what grounds this proceeding can be justified. Even on the severest view of the unity of the Roman Empire, it is surely not a matter of trifling consequence whether a particular emperor ruled at Rome or at Constantinople.

The first volume opens with chapters on "Christianity and Paganism" and on "The Influence of Christianity on Society." The general attitude adopted in these chapters has a strong resemblance to that of Gibbon, whose style is now and then unconsciously imitated. Mr. Bury rightly perceives the importance to the historian of the speculations of the Neoplatonists. Although the theories of philosophers have little influence on the course of history, they are profoundly significant as symptoms of the spirit and tendencies of the age to which they belong; and this is especially true with regard to periods of great social and political change such as that treated of in the present work. The succeeding chapters deal with the causes of the disintegration of the Roman Empire, with the system of imperial administration, and with the topography of Constantinople. Mr. Bury then sketches in rapid outline the history of the period between the death of Theodosius and the accession of Justinian, which forms the proper beginning of his subject. The chapter on "Life and Manners in the Fifth Century" contains, among other interesting matter that will be new to most readers, a translation of the little-known narrative by Mark the Deacon of the visit paid by the bishop Porphyrius of Gaza to Constantinople, which furnishes a curious and valuable picture of Byzantine court life under Arcadius. Mr. Bury also translates, nearly in full, the remarkable account given by the historian Priscus of his experiences at the court of Attila, which has already in part been made familiar to English readers by Mr. Hodgkin.

In dealing with the reign of Justinian Mr. Bury, like all students of this period, finds himself baffled in the attempt to apprehend the "elusive personality" of the sovereign who so powerfully impressed his mark on the history of his own and succeeding ages. There is no historical personage of equal greatness of achievement whose personal character and the motives of whose public conduct are so hopelessly enigmatical. Mr. Bury remarks, strikingly and perhaps truly, that a distinct decline of power is observable in Justinian's statesmanship after the great plague of 542. In his history of the reign the author passes lightly over the ground already occupied by Mr. Hodgkin—the romantic story of the reconquest of Italy—and gives, for the first time, a detailed account of the Persian and Lazic wars. It cannot be said that he has succeeded in making these campaigns particularly interesting, but this is not from any want of skill on his own part, and the chapters relating to them are, if not the most attractive, certainly not the least valuable portions of the volumes. The account of the legal works of Justinian is, considering the importance of the subject, somewhat slight and perfunctory. We are glad to see that Mr. Bury brings some powerful arguments against the genuineness of the 'Secret History' purporting to be written by Procopius. From the historical point of view the question has less importance than has sometimes been ascribed to it, for on the one hand there can be no reasonable doubt that the monstrous statements contained in this work are grossly exaggerated, and on the other hand, as Mr. Bury himself urges, such charges would hardly have been propounded by a contemporary writer if they had not possessed just enough of foundation in fact to render them prima facie credible. But it is a real gain to be spared the necessity of ascribing to a great writer—the greatest historian, indeed, since classical times—the authorship of this unspeakably silly as well as venomous production. So far as the Empress Theodora is concerned, Mr. Bury concludes that, whatever her early life may have been, there is no ground for supposing that in her character as empress she in any degree deserved the terrible reputation which she has obtained. If we set aside the allegations of the 'Secret History' and one or two unproved suspicions, she appears not as "a tigress or a malicious demon in woman's form," but as "a bold and able woman with enough of the diablaesse in her to explain how she might be betrayed." That she was greedy of power and inspired by fierce sectarian zeal is certain; but, on the other hand, there is credible evidence of her kind-heartedness and charity, and her readiness to sympathize with the victims of oppression.

With reference to the period from Justin II. to Irene, the reader who is familiar with the works of Gibbon and Finlay will not find any startling novelty in Mr. Bury's views with regard to the main events of the history, or in his estimate of the characters of the individual sovereigns. The most striking difference between Finlay's treatment of the subject and that of Mr. Bury has been already indicated, and is decidedly to the advantage of the later writer. Although the author may, as we think he does, go to an unreasonable extreme in refusing altogether to speak of the empire which had its seat at Constantinople as "Byzantine," it is better to do this than to adopt the date A.D. 717 as the terminal point of the "Roman" and the beginning of the "Byzantine" empire. The accession of Leo III. was, no doubt, in some sort the beginning of a new order of things; but the reign of Leo was in certain respects not less but more "Roman" in character than some of the preceding reigns. Mr. Bury is careful to lay stress on all that indicates the continuity of the later with the earlier Roman Empire. He points out, for instance, that throughout the seventh and eighth centuries the kings of the West never ceased to regard the emperor as the political head of Christendom, and as their own superior in rank. Nothing is in this respect more instructive than the fact, which was only imperfectly recognized when Finlay wrote, that the Frankish Charles, in assuming the title of emperor, considered himself as the successor of the deposed Constantine VI. The foundation of the "Holy Roman" Empire was originally regarded simply as a bringing back of the imperial dignity from Constantinople to its earlier seat at Rome. The subsequent necessity of recognizing the successors of Irene of course modified this view of the matter; nevertheless the Western theory in the ninth century seems to have been not that a new empire had been established or a long extinct empire revived, but that the one historical Roman Empire had branched into two. While presenting in their full strength the facts which justify the claim of the Eastern Empire to the name of Roman, Mr. Bury does not maintain the paradoxical view recently advocated by Mr. Freeman, that Pope Stephen, in bestowing the title of patricius on Pippin, acted as the delegate of the emperor. His explanation of the matter is that the Pope "took an old familiar name—a title which had always belonged to the exarch—placed it in a new combination, and gave it almost a new sense." That is to say, the title "Patricius Romanorum" was intended to mean the protector and patron of the people of Rome. It seems probable, notwithstanding Mr. Freeman's ingenious arguments, that this conclusion will hold its place in general acceptance.

An important feature of the present work is the careful attention which the author has given to the relations between the empire and the Slavonic and Turanian peoples. The history of the wars with the Avars in the time of Maurice is for the first time related in detail. A suggestion which deserves consideration is that the modifications in the Roman land system, observable in the agricultural legislation of the Isaurian dynasty, are in part to be ascribed to the influence of the Slavonic element in the population of the empire. On the question of the alleged Slavonic origin of the present inhabitants of the Greek mainland Mr. Bury speaks guardedly, and is evidently disinclined to accept the extreme conclusion on either side.

Although Mr. Bury makes no attempt to conceal the darker features of Byzantine rule, he is far from sympathizing with the view expressed in the words he quotes from Mr. Lecky, that the Byzantine Empire "constitutes the most thoroughly base and despicable form that civilization has yet assumed." To those who hold this opinion may be recommended a perusal of the concluding chapter of the book, which contains an eloquent and powerful vindication of the services which the "later Roman Empire" has rendered to European civilization.

Mr. Bury's style is lucid and animated, though now and then disfigured by attempts at epigrammatic point, and by the too frequent recurrence of one or two favourite turns of expression. We read, for instance, that some one "out-Hunited the Huns," that Cassiodorus sometimes "out-Cassiodores Cassiodorus," and the same formula recurs in two or three other places. A word of cordial praise must be given to the chapters on manners and society, and on literature, as well as to the interesting essay on Byzantine art contributed by the author's wife. The chapter on "The Language of the Romaioi in the Sixth Century" is too brief, but contains several valuable remarks. Mr. Bury is well known as an acute, if somewhat adventurous philologist, and many interesting etymological notes are scattered through these volumes. We may mention the explanation (not new, though independently rediscovered by Mr. Bury) of the verb μαχαρίζω, "to turn Mussulman," which is shown to be from the participle of a Syriac verb derived from the proper name Hagar; and the plausible conjecture that Spalato may be ἡ παλάτιον, a name of the same pattern as Setinieh and Stamboul. On Teutonic ground Mr. Bury's philology is not quite so good: the name Ataulfus is certainly not to be identified with "Adolphus," nor the Lombard Aidouγγος with "Edwin"; and it is most unlikely that Ilphredas, for which Mr. Bury boldly substitutes "Wilfred" in his text, can represent any dialectal form of the Germanic Wilfrithus.

Sur le Seuil. Par Léon de Tinseau. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

To say that Mr. Hall Caine wrote 'The Bondman' with even more pleasure and appreciation than his readers are likely to feel in its perusal may be considered a left-handed compliment; but, if it implies that the story is marked here and there by imperfection, it recognizes the poetic feeling and impassioned instinct of the author. This new saga is a story of Iceland and Man ninety years ago. It is woven on the woof of a Northern legend which tells how a man took a fairy for his wife, and then, finding she was no more than a woman after all, left her, and presently espied another fairy, lovely to look on, and singing a sweet song. He followed and caught her, and turning her face to his that he might kiss her, he found that she was his wife. On this legend is based a romance which combines the simplicity and the tragical complexity which are wont to stand out in contrast side by side amongst the untutored races of the North. Mr. Hall Caine shows considerable power in dealing with his materials; but the story would have made a deeper impression if he had employed somewhat less of the mere machinery of the novelist, and had relied exclusively on natural cause and effect. The few improbabilities, however, in three volumes of crowded incidents are not serious blemishes, and 'The Bondman' is a worthy pendant to 'The Deemster.' The development of the plot and motive in the third volume is the ablest portion of an able work.

The scene of 'Mrs. Bob' is laid in a garrison town; but we are thankful to say that this time Mrs. Stannard is sparing of stage officers, their ridiculous conversation and unreal behaviour. The heroine is a "garrison hack," but the hero is an Australian who, with his sister and the latter's husband, also Australian, is connected with a great swindling and burglary association. The precious trio are described as charming, and the hero's eyes are spoken of as truthful. Yet these good-hearted, gentleman-like men, and this soft, sympathetic, sweet little woman profit by the hospitality they receive in order to facilitate the crimes of their rascally association. They suffer from no remorse or compunction, and seem to think it quite natural, reasonable, and proper that they should prey on society in general and their friends in particular! The characters are unnatural, almost impossible indeed, and we cannot congratulate Mrs. Stannard on the new line which she has marked out for herself. Even silly, swaggering, lipping Dragoon officers are preferable to well-mannered Australian swindlers.

Mr. Haggard is never at a loss for something new to write or publish about the well-known Allan Quatermain who helped to discover King Solomon's mines. 'Allan's Wife, and other Tales,' consists of four stories, the first of which has not been previously published. All deal with incidents in Allan's life, and all are told with the skilful method of introduction which makes Mr. Haggard's stories appear comfortably like the truth, and his usual vigour when fighting or anything else of a desperate nature is to be described. Those whose power of feeling interested in Allan Quatermain is limited may now think that they have had enough of him, or, at all events, will in future be satisfied with a passing allusion to their old friend. The present volume is made attractive by some good illustrations. Mr. Maurice Greiffenhagen, who has supplied most of them, is one of the few book illustrators in England whose work can be put into comparison with that of the best French and American artists in this style.

'A Little Journey in the World' is a successful enough attempt in a difficult kind of work. It is a novel having the object of bringing into discussion the principal questions and problems of modern American life, or a series of conversations upon those topics held together by the framework of a novel. The novel suffers a good deal by the contrivance, or again, putting the case the other way about, the collection of discussions does not make a very interesting story. Still the story does hold together, and it is undeniable that the matter of the book is cleverly dealt with. The style is not too funny and not too self-conscious. It is satirical and humorous in a cultivated literary way, not exclusively national. There is a brightness and a lightness of hand in Mr. Warner's manner that prevents his smart sayings from being too sententious, and he nearly always hits the nail on the head.

'Tasma's' pretty and pathetic, but at the same time morbid and inconclusive stories display much the same qualities in their relation as 'Uncle Piper of Piper's Hill.' They are easy, straightforward, simple as a rule, the humour is rather strained, and there is a distinct dash of cynicism. 'How a Claim was nearly Jumped' is the most natural and the best of the five stories—possibly because it is one of the shortest; for 'Tasma' has not mastered the art of construction, as her first and longest novel sufficiently proved. 'Uncle Piper,' nevertheless, found an appreciative welcome; and these simple tales of Australian life and character make a fair bid for favour.

'The Despot of Broomsedge Cove' is an American novel of a commoner kind than Mr. Warner's. It is a story of the great smoky mountains, and recalls some of the author's previous work, besides making one think of and wish for Mr. Bret Harte. The book is too long; there is too much of the mining dialect, and too much of that rather clumsy mixture of faith and grotesque realization in religion which appears to have a fascination for a number of Mr. Warner's countrymen.

It is long since we found so good a novel as the new volume by the author of 'Bouche Close' and of 'Ma Cousine Pot-au-Feu.' The persons of M. de Tinseau's plot are commonplace—the good young man, the good young lady, and the bad woman who tries to separate them—but the old story is told with real poetic feeling, and excites sentimental interest in the most hardened reader. An Irish waiting lady, Mrs. Crowe, is almost the equal in sterling qualities of the Mrs. O'Dowd of 'Vanity Fair.'

L'Empire des Tsars et les Russes. Par Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu. — Tome III. La Religion. (Paris, Hachette & Co.)

It is a symptom of the times that M. Leroy-Beaulieu, writing in French for a French public, should feel constrained to preface his book with an apology for treating of so archaic a subject as religion in the nineteenth century, and he goes on to say, what is perfectly true, that most educated Russians have no religion at all. He does not blurt this out brutally, but leads the reader by gradual stages to see how small a part real religion plays in the lives of the Russian educated classes. M. Beaulieu complains that the spiritual life of the orthodox Church, never of a high order, seems now to be extinct; and he ascribes this to the fact that the Church of Russia has been made subservient to the will of the emperor and the necessities of the State. Writing from the point of view of a country which probably still calls itself Catholic, M. Leroy-Beaulieu sees in the Papal authority a safeguard against the undue encroachments of the temporal power in the domain of the Church.

There are two other causes, however, which M. Beaulieu mentions, to which we are inclined to assign a greater importance. The one is the vexed question of the two classes of clergy—the Black and the White, as they are called; and the other the very low state of culture and material well-being enjoyed by the clergy generally and the White clergy in particular. Perhaps M. Beaulieu has not clearly pointed out the exact position which the White clergy hold with regard to the Black, and leaves something to conjecture. This is, of course, a minor detail. The White clergy, or parochial priests, are practically compelled to marry before they are ordained, but are not allowed to marry a second time. The upper ranks of the Russian hierarchy can only be filled by unmarried ecclesiastics. This does not prevent widowers from attaining to the mitre, and the fact that most of the Church preferment is given to the monastic or Black clergy does not prove that the White are ineligible; it only shows the superior influence of the regular clergy. The reason of this is the low state of culture of the parochial clergy. The cause of their degradation is most fully explained in 'L'Empire des Tsars.' We are shown how the priesthood formed a caste of their own in the days of serfdom, how the nobility refused to renounce their worldly position to assume the sacerdotal office, and how the peasants, being serfs, could not recruit the ranks of the priesthood. Hence the White clergy have become a narrow caste, handing down their profession—for it was not a vocation—to their sons and their sons' sons, and thus narrowing their views and social sympathies with every successive generation. Indeed, until within the last twenty-five years, no other career was open to their male descendants. No reference to Mr. Herbert Spencer's 'Social Statics' is requisite to convince one of the baneful consequences of such a system. The priests, despised by the nobility, and dreaded by the peasants, were foredoomed to degradation. There was yet another circumstance which contributed to their decline in social importance: the State had made them the parasites of society by making compulsory certain religious rites and sacraments, and leaving the people to remunerate their priests with such fees as each individual might consider adequate. Although the system of tithes exists in Russia, the main source of revenue of the priesthood is derived from church fees, and these are frequently sadly inadequate. The income of the village priest being thus left largely to the piety of his congregation, he is tempted to fawn on the noble, and to wink at the peccadilloes of the peasant. The confessional, in the hands of a weak, poverty-stricken priest, becomes a matter of form; to all questions put to him the penitent answers, meekly, but vaguely, "I am a sinner," and receives absolution in return for the modest oblation which he deposits in the plate.

On the other hand, the Black clergy are many of them highly educated gentlemen, polite scholars, men of the world, eloquent and refined. There are amongst them retired naval officers, like the late Bishop Léonide, and noblemen who have sought refuge from the cares and troubles of the world; but Church preferment is generally bestowed upon those who have been specially prepared in the seminaries of the Church for their sacred vocation. If some of them are bigoted and narrow-minded, their private characters at least are above reproach, and the respect they enjoy in society is very different from the almost open contempt that is felt for the White clergy. This contempt is happily illustrated by M. Leroy-Beaulieu. In Russia it is customary for all laymen, the emperor himself included, to show their outward respect for the Church by kissing the hands of its ministers. On one occasion it is related that a village priest, receiving a grand duke at his church door, and having no experience of such exalted personages, hesitated to offer him his hand; the grand duke, getting impatient, is reported to have exclaimed, "Stretch out your paw, you fool!" Homage of so perfunctory a character is little likely to raise the clergy in the esteem of their flocks.

In describing the monastic life of Russia M. Leroy-Beaulieu shows a wise discretion, and does not give any details of the lives of the men who inhabit the monasteries. Some of them are not such anchorites as their religious garb would lead one to expect, nor are they compelled to remain immured for life. Novices may return to a secular life, and after a time become novices again.

It is impossible to speak too highly of the solemnity and noble symbolism of the Greek Church service. The appearance of the priests in their flowing robes, waving beards, and long hair is itself imposing, but the marvellous chanting of the choir has invariably fascinated foreign visitors, especially as the human voice is unaided by any instrumental music. To the Russian mind it would be impious to worship God by machinery. The organ is, in the eyes of Russians, simply a machine for producing sound, and they admire it enough to have one in every popular restaurant; but its introduction into a church would savour to them of sacrilege.

The theory of religious toleration as enunciated by M. Pobedonostzev, according to whom Russia allows perfect freedom to all religions, but forbids proselytism to any except the orthodox, is dwelt upon at length by M. Leroy-Beaulieu, who very rightly regards it as partaking of the nature of an Irish bull. The treatment meted out to the Jews does not seem quite to harmonize with M. Pobedonostzev's theory. One act of toleration, which M. Leroy-Beaulieu seems to have lost sight of, does distinguish the Russian Government, however, in its relations to the chosen people. Although there can be no doubt that compulsory military service presses heavily on Jews, who seem to have none of the privileges of citizenship and all its burdens, yet their musical gifts have secured them a comparative immunity, inasmuch as they are generally drafted into the band. It is rather curious that the captive Israelites should be made to play to their Gentile rulers as they march down the streets of the Philistines.

M. Leroy-Beaulieu has done Western Europe a service by explaining in popular and entertaining language the religious beliefs of the great nation who inhabit the eastern portion of the Continent, and perhaps a greater service still to England by showing people how hopeless and how impracticable is the dream entertained by many excellent persons of uniting the Anglican and Greek Catholic Churches in one loving community.

SCHOOL-BOOKS.

Plutarch's Life of Timoleon. Edited with Notes by H. A. Holden, LL.D. (Cambridge, Pitt Press.)—Nobody who turns over the leaves of this book can fail to note the scholarship, learning, and industry which are everywhere displayed, but it attempts to combine too much within one cover. Here is a little Greek biography, which in large print, and with summaries included, only covers 47 pages, furnished forth with 87 pages of introduction and 237 of notes, appendices, and glossary. Yet the text is not seriously faulty, the Greek is not often hard, and no grave historical difficulties are involved. The size of the book is due to Dr. Holden's desire to omit nothing which may be useful to the fourth-form boy on the one hand or to Prof. Mayor on the other. It begins with a disquisition on the ancient historians of Sicily, and attempts to prove that, of these, Timæus was Plutarch's chief authority. Then follows a chronological table of events, not merely in Sicily, but everywhere else, "from the beginning of Greek colonization to the death of Timoleon." The text comes next, and then the notes, which are partly of a most elementary character, such as "τὸν βίον, my life," "ἐν παιδείᾳ sc. ὄντα," and partly very learned indeed, involving numerous corrections of Liddell and Scott, supported by an adequate apparatus of parallel passages. A most elaborate appendix on the text follows, then an index of matters, a list of authors cited by Plutarch, a grammatical index, and lastly a lexicon, which professes to be complete. Large as the book is, a cursory perusal can detect some omissions. In c. vii. there ought to be a note on the date, for Timoleon's twenty years of retirement are barely credible, and are unknown to Diodorus; c. ix. 4, ἀθλα occurs, but is not in the lexicon; c. xvii. 5, ἐξελίττεω is explained as "to wheel" in the note, but as "to deploy" in the lexicon; a good many words in the lexicon are not translated at all, such as ἀδημονεῖν, ἀήρ, ἀναστραφεῖν. We pick these little holes on purpose because Dr. Holden has chosen to smother his good work with a mass of trumpery stuff which he does not do very well, and ought not to do at all.

Clarendon Press Series.—An Introduction to Latin Syntax. By W. S. Gibson, M.A. (Oxford, University Press.)—This little book appears to aim at teaching the syntax of the 'Public Schools Primer' by explaining and illustrating the rules before they are learnt by heart. The method seems to involve the learning by heart of sentences and their translations which illustrate a rule or rules of syntax before, instead of after, the learning of the rule or rules. The author imagines that his method requires "less supplementing by oral explanation than is necessary with an ordinary memorial syntax." It is difficult to see what difference it can make whether the rule or the illustration be learnt first. Under a competent master the effect of a lesson in syntax is that the rule and its illustration must seem to have been learnt together. If, then, this particular book has any title to existence, it is based on incompetency of teachers and phenomenal density of learners.

Macmillan's Greek Reader.—Stories and Legends: a First Greek Reader. With Notes, Vocabulary, and Exercises by F. H. Colson, M.A. (Macmillan & Co.)—This 'Reader' appears to be compiled with more care than is usually bestowed upon such books. Mr. Colson has aimed at giving as far as possible genuine specimens of Greek which "describe something of the thoughts and the actions of the people who spoke that language." From the third story and the vocabulary we learn that eagles have hands. On pp. 182, 183, we observe δηλος, δηλῶ, δεινός ἦ οὐ, δια-φθαρῖσθαι, slight errors which suggest that the vocabulary might have been revised a little more attentively. The selection of subjects is, on the whole, judicious, though it seems unnecessary to anticipate the usual period at which schoolboys learn the story of Œdipus.

Andocides de Mysteriis and de Reditu. Edited by E. C. Marchant, B.A. (Rivingtons.)—By preparing a students' edition of the two most interesting speeches of Andocides, Mr. Marchant has supplied an obvious want. No pains have been spared in the execution of this useful design, and the book supplies abundant evidence of sound scholarship and independent work and thought. Mr. Marchant frequently differs, and generally with good reason, from previous workers in the same field, such as Blass and Leipsius. The life of the orator in the introduction contains some interesting remarks on his political views. It is argued (p. 3) that his sympathies remained oligarchic up to B.C. 410, when he "was constrained to reappear as a democrat." It would be difficult to speak too highly of Mr. Marchant's commentary or of the whole volume.

College Series of Latin Authors.—M. Tullii Ciceronis Brutus, seu de Claris Oratoribus. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by Martin Kellogg. (Ginn & Co.)—This valuable contribution from the University of California towards the study of Cicero's oratorical works will open British eyes to the development of classical studies in America. It is quite worthy to rank with Prof. Wilkins's 'De Oratore' and Dr. Sandys's 'Orator.' The text is sound and clearly printed, the only mistake we have noticed being "Periolem" for Periclem (p. 14). The excellent commentary is in foot-notes. In the list illustrating "the breaking of closely jointed phrases" (p. 5) it is surprising not to see "in parentis eum loco" from § 1. Here and there, perhaps, a note has been omitted where one is clearly wanted. For instance, in "vim in Galba fuisse" (§ 89) it is easy to render "vim," which here means "impressiveness," so as to exclude the idea of pathos. In § 96 "verborum comprehensio" seems to mean "a periodic style," not merely "the period." However, Prof. Kellogg's commentary, we repeat, is excellent.

The Republic of Plato, Book X. Edited as an Introduction to the Study of Plato's Philosophy by B. D. Turner, M.A. (Rivingtons).—Mr. Turner is too modest in thinking that the publication of this highly useful volume requires any justification. Fragmentary editing can seldom be so thoroughly justified as in the case of this book, for according to Dr. Henry Jackson, whom Mr. Turner follows without reserve, we have here a simple outline of Plato's "Ideal Theory" in its original form. Consequently no portion of Plato's extant works can constitute a better introduction to the study of his philosophy. Mr. Turner has given us a clear text, a good commentary, an appendix (due to Mr. Archer Hind) on some difficulties in the psychology of Plato, and a capital sketch of the course of philosophic development in Greece from Thales to Plato inclusive.

Classical Series.—The Ion of Euripides. With an Introduction and Notes by M. A. Bayfield, M.A. (Macmillan & Co.).—There is much excellent work in this useful edition of a most interesting drama. Mr. Bayfield has availed himself of recent work, as, for instance, of Prof. Middleton's paper on Delphi in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, vol. ix., and of the textual conjectures of Nauck, Dr. Verrall, and others, to which he adds some original suggestions. Perhaps it would have been better if the new lights had proved less attractive. For instance, what sober-minded writer can believe that, v. 1099, we are to read δέκνται γάρ [sic] δδὲ Διὸς εἰς | παῖδων, understanding by "one of the children of Zeus" "a man," as opposed to "a woman"? Perhaps the MS. ὁ Διὸς ἐκ is for Αἰόλιος οὐ, as Euripides (v. 63) makes Xuthos son of Æolus. The changes ἀγαθὸν for ἀγαθόν, v. 98, and ἰδίας for ἰδίας, v. 101, are not sufficiently certain to be admitted to the text, while the scansion of the latter should be indicated to guard against misapprehension. Again, as to v. 118 ff., δρόσοι παγὰν ἐκπρὸς αἰσιν μυρσίνας is rendered "waters sending forth their stream from among the myrtle shrubs," which must mean that drippings from the myrtles formed a stream. Of course a rock can send forth a παγὰν, but δρόσοι cannot. The passage ἵνα δρόσοι τέγγοντο ἱερὰ | —τὰν ἀέανον παγὰν | ἐκπρὸς αἰσιν | μυρσίνας ἱερὰν φόβαν needs slight alteration of the two middle lines, namely, to ἐκ τὰν ἀέανον παγὰν | ἐκπρὸς αἰσιν. Mr. Bayfield's commas after ἱερὰ and μυρσίνας disfigure the text. It should be explained how —μὴν τ' εἰσβολὰς, v. 677, can answer metrically to γεγωνήσομεν, v. 696. Musgrave's unfortunate substitution of κορεόμενοι for χορευόμενοι, "are set a-dancing" (by Σελάνα), v. 1084, is adopted, and rendered "spend their maidenhood," though many of the Nereids were mothers; while the defence that κόραν "echoes it in the next line" involves a serious reflection on Pluto. By the way, in the note on v. 492 Mr. Bayfield gives the Nereids only one foot apiece, though Prof. Jebb in his note on the passage quoted, 'Æd. Col.' 717, rightly distributes the hundred feet amongst only fifty nymphs. We are getting tired of teaching schoolmasters that the extended use of the dative of the remote object, as in 'Ion,' 1186, ἔχοντι δέ, is not "ethic dat." Mr. Bayfield well remarks on v. 354, σοὶ ταῦτόν ηβης, εἴπερ ἦν, εἴχ' ἂν μέτρον: "The line is a clear disproof of the constant assertion of the grammars that sentences couched in this form imply a belief on the part of the speaker that the condition is unfulfilled. Whether the child still lives or not is just what Kreousa has come to ask. The truth is that if the speaker, in conditional sentences, referring to present or past time, does believe the condition to be unfulfilled, he then uses in Greek the imperfect or aorist indicative in protasis and apodosis, in Latin the imperfect or pluperfect subjunctive. The moods and tenses of themselves, however, imply nothing as to the speaker's opinion; the hearer is guided to this, if guided at all, by some independent knowledge." It is to be hoped that some exact parallels to the construction in question will be collected to substantiate this obviously sound principle.

Practical Latin Composition. By William C. Collar, A.M. (Ginn & Co.).—Mr. Collar has grappled successfully with the difficult problem of adapting to modern requirements Ascham's incomparable system of teaching Latin. Some British compilers have made praiseworthy efforts in the same direction, but have not carried out the idea so satisfactorily. The publication of the work before us ought to inaugurate a revolution in the teaching of junior Latin classes and in the readers and exercise books of the future. At the end of the book, not counting the admirable vocabulary, is a reader ranging from easy biographies of the kings of Rome through Nepos and Cæsar to Cicero against Catiline. The exercises consist of "Latine Dicenda," or sentences to be turned into Latin vis à voce, after the corresponding portion of the reader has been read and translated, and "Latine Scribenda," or passages of English (embodying the general sense of the corresponding parts of the reader and the "Latine Dicenda") to be translated on paper into Latin prose. Useful notes and grammatical references (to Allen and Greenough and to Harkness) are given. Though not generally favourable to paternal government, we should like to see the use of this royal road to the mastery of Latin in all fourth and fifth forms made compulsory. Our readers ought to judge for themselves of a work which, unpromising as its subject is, has surprised us into an enthusiasm which does not abate on reflection.

Blackwood's English Grammar and Analysis. 6 parts. (Blackwood & Sons).—These six little books treat of grammar and analysis according to the requirements of the Code of Education. They are very cheap, and are carefully and well arranged, and contain much readily available information. A less sparing use of marks indicating the length of syllables in Latin and Greek prefixes, suffixes, and roots would have increased the usefulness of the more advanced books.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

A Southern Planter (Murray), by Mrs. Smedes, is a highly interesting narrative not now published for the first time. It gives a vivid picture of a Southern planter of a somewhat stern type, and possessing strong religious faith, who strove to fulfil the duties of his position, devoted to his family, firm, but kind in his treatment of his negroes. He disapproved of secession; but when his state joined the movement, he made every sacrifice he could. After the civil war, in which he was too old to take much personal part, he refused to become bankrupt, and by fourteen years of unremitting economy and labour he contrived to pay his creditors in full. The volume is well worth reading.

MR. DUFFIELD'S Recollections of Travels Abroad (Remington) is the book of a clever, if somewhat eccentric man, who has travelled widely and speaks Spanish fluently. His book suffers from the insertion of lengthy conversations and the sweeping character of many of the author's remarks. He could have, in fact, written a better volume had he been less discursive and also less dogmatic. Mr. Duffield's judgments are often sound, but they are pronounced in too peremptory a manner.

THE newly republished numbers of Messrs. Blackwood's Tales of Travel, Adventure, and Sport are interesting reading. Lieut. Palander's account of the Swedish expedition of 1879 through the "North-East Passage" heads the list of chronicles of patience and daring. It is ably and modestly written, and not only gives a high idea of the admirable organization of the explorers, but is full of interesting detail as to the inhabitants of the Arctic coast, even to their language. Murgin and turgin for "mine" and "yours," out-out, "wood," and a few other terms, are the only words which have apparently any Aryan analogy among the specimens given. Admiral Sherard Osborn's 'Cruise up the Yangtze' will interest lovers of our naval history. 'The Valley of the Shadow of Death,' by Andrew Wilson, a wonderful story of Himalayan travel, and 'A Night's Peril' in a yacht off Mauritius are good specimens of exciting adventures well told; while the romance derived from the days of the Peninsular War, and the 'Escape of the Republican Exiles' from Cayenne, have the additional merit of historical interest.

THE wide circulation attained by such books as 'Enquire Within upon Everything' shows that they supply a want felt by a large section of the public. The last volume of the kind that has come before us is Ready Reference: the Universal Cyclopædia (Griffith & Farran), by Mr. W. R. Balch. It contains a good deal of useful information, but Mr. Balch should have omitted 'Matters of Religious Interest' if he does not know better than to print such a gross forgery as the sentence passed by Pontius Pilate, and to give a list of Church councils which omits Trent.

Two books reach us from Calmann Lévy's, of Paris, almost at the same time; both concern the history of the same family, but the members portrayed are of very different types: Henry IV., whose amours are recounted by M. de la Ferrière in Henri IV., le Roi, l'Amoureux, and the Duc d'Orléans, eldest son of King Louis Philip, whose Récits de Campagne in Algeria are given to the world by his sons, the Comte de Paris and the Duc de Chartres. The Orleans princes prefix to their father's letters an excellent preface, but the letters themselves are of little interest. The most amusing of them, from a cynical point of view, is one which asks for the promotion of Morny, who had accompanied the Duke to Algeria, but most of the letters are devoted to the glorification of a now forgotten marshal of France who preceded Bugeaud in the Algiers command.

DR. WILHELM BUSCH, of Leipzig, has followed up his former tracts on Henry VIII.'s divorce in the Historisches Taschenbuch with an article on the fall of Cardinal Wolsey, in which the whole story is carefully worked out from the three separate calendars in the Rolls Series which contain evidences on the subject. Dr. Busch's view in the main agrees with that of Brewer, though he takes exception in a footnote to the theory that the "bill of articles" brought against Wolsey in the House of Commons was not a bill of attainder, but only one to disable him from being restored to his dignities. Those interested in the subject of Wolsey's policy and the causes of his fall ought certainly to refer to Dr. Busch's papers, which we presume he will one day publish as a connected work.

The Life of Laurence, Bishop of Hólar in Iceland (Laurentius Saga). By Einar Hafidason. Translated from the Icelandic by Oliver Elton. (Rivingtons).—This translation of the 'Laurentius Saga' is, we believe, the only English version of any of the Icelandic ecclesiastical biographies yet published. Bishop Laurentius, or Lafranz, died in 1331, and the memoir, written by his intimate friend and disciple the Deacon Einar, affords a vivid picture of the early church life of Iceland, which is but little known even to many who have a fair degree of acquaintance with the secular literature of the island. Mr. Elton states that his translation has had the advantage of a thorough revision by Mr. York Powell. We do not know in what proportions the praise due to the work is to be divided between the two collaborators, but they have, at all events, produced one of the very best English renderings of an Icelandic saga that have ever appeared. Without the slightest affectation of archaic diction, the manner of the original has, on the whole, been admirably reproduced, though here and there the naïveté of tone has, perhaps, been a little exaggerated. The annalistic digressions, which interfere with the continuity of the narrative, have judiciously been printed in small type. There are one or two trifling misprints in the accentuation of proper names, and the map, being an imitation of the style of sixteenth century cartography, is not very serviceable. In other respects we have nothing but praise for this tasteful little book. A translation of the whole of the 'Biskupa Sögur' in the same style would be welcome.

THE famous traveller in Yemen, Herr Eduard Glaser, who has visited that country three times, and is now preparing for a fourth journey, has just issued the first fasciculus of his startling results concerning the pre-Mohammedan history of Arabia, with the title of Skizze der Geschichte Arabiens von den ältesten Zeiten bis zum Propheten Muhammad (Munich, Straub). The learned author tries to prove from inscriptions brought from Arabian countries by him and Prof. Euting, of Strasbourg, that the Minean (of Ma'in) rulers can be traced nearly to the year 2000 B.C., and that their inscriptions, which are in Phœnician characters, are of not much later date. The Mineans were conquered by the Sabæan dynasty, of whom we possess the Himyaritic inscriptions. The history of this second dynasty will be the subject of a second fasciculus, together with the old geography of Arabia in relation to the Biblical data, and more especially devoted to Ophir, the description of Sabæan monuments, and the history of the Jews in Arabia. The competence of Herr Glaser in matters concerning Yemen cannot be doubted, but he damages himself by his constant attacks on older scholars who have pursued this branch of studies, viz., Prof. D. H. Müller, of Vienna, and Dr. Mordtmann, who had not the advantage of perusing the latest discovered inscriptions. They made mistakes, but that will happen to our explorer also, if it has not happened already.

THE reports are on our table of the Free Libraries at Aberdeen, Belfast, Cheltenham, and Leamington, all of which speak of the prosperity of those institutions. We have received an excellent Catalogue of the Kensal Town Library, a branch of the Chelsea public libraries (Bemrose), and one of the Reference Department of the South Shields Library (Gateshead, Kelly). The Bollettino delle Pubblicazioni Italiane for January 31st (Florence, Le Monnier) has also reached us; and so has a third edition of the Newspaper Readers' Index of Reference (Bolton, Axon), a highly useful publication. In speaking a fortnight ago of the facsimiles issued by Messrs. Bradshaw of their early guides, we assigned one by an oversight to 1840. Both belong to 1839.

WE have on our table Memoirs of Henry Richard, by L. Appleton (Trübner),—Through Atolls and Islands in the Great South Sea, by F. J. THE LATE SIR HENRY YULE, C.B.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to us:—

"In March last I received from Sir Henry Yule a copy of the following lines, addressed to him in 1884 by Mr. Colborne Baber, now our consul at Chefoo, and I should like to make them more generally known to the readers of Sir Henry's noble edition of the 'Travels of Ser Marco Polo' by their publication in the Athenæum:—

Until you raised dead monarchs from the mould
And built again the domes of Xanadu,
I lay in evil case, and never knew
The glamour of that ancient story told

By good Ser Marco in his prison-hold.
But now I sit upon a throne and view
The Orient at my feet, and take of you
And Marco tribute from the realms of old.

If I am joyous deem me not o'erbold;
If I am grateful deem me not untrue;
For you have given me beauties to behold,
Delight to win, and fancies to pursue,
Fairer than all the jewelry and gold
Of Kublai on his throne in Cambalu.

THE ROYALIST COMPOSITION PAPERS.

It is probable that previously to the publication of the first volumes of the new Calendar of the proceedings of certain Commonwealth Committees few of us actually realized the vast bulk of the Interregnum State Papers. In addition to the regular series of domestic correspondence already calendared, more than 2,500 pages of closely printed matter have been issued by the indefatigable editor, representing a literary labour almost as astonishing as that of the original scribe. We are yet, however, far from the end of this new undertaking, for one Committee only has been completely described, and we are told that the present volume, which deals with the general proceedings of a second Committee, "will be followed by others containing particulars of the individual cases brought before the Committee for Compounding; and these volumes by another which will contain indexes of names and places, &c., comprising the entire of the Composition Papers."

Of course this unusual wealth of material can be accounted for partly by the financial exigencies of the times, and still more by the destruction or abeyance of the ancient fiscal machinery of the Crown. Therefore what we have lost in the shape of parchment rolls we have to some extent recovered in the guise of State Papers, neatly bound, for the most part, in vellum covers as an additional means of preservation. There are for this Committee alone no fewer than 284 volumes and bundles, of which the two series of Royalist Composition Papers are already well known, though these, like the rest of the class, have hitherto been more frequently consulted for genealogical than for historical purposes, except by a modern historian whose industry few European manuscripts bearing upon this period have escaped. When it is added that only twenty-four of these volumes are dealt with in the present instalment of 825 pages, enough will have been said to indicate the magnitude of this official work.

In September of 1643 the leaders of the Great Rebellion in England, though honestly impressed with the necessity for "the speedy bringing in of our brethren of Scotland into this realm for our assistance," were quite unprepared to defray the enormous cost of this fraternal succour out of existing sources of revenue. There were, indeed, three armies to be provided for, that under the Earl of Essex—whose allowance of 10,000*l.* as lord general was alone a serious drain upon the resources of Parliament—and the two Scotch armies in England and Ireland. To meet these additional expenses it was necessary, since the loans upon the Public Faith and other extraordinary assessments were barely sufficient for present wants, to devise some new and more profitable means of supply. It was under these circumstances that the Committee for Compounding was called into existence, for the purpose of raising money by loans as well as for administering the sequestered estates of delinquents or recusants in such manner that a large supply of ready money might be instantly forthcoming for the service of the war. Assignments on this revenue were forthwith made to the Scotch allies, by whom, indeed, immediate advances were impatiently demanded, and who henceforth assumed a proprietary right in this quarter.

The principle of composition in lieu of administration, which a year later began to be applied to all sequestrations, possessed several undoubted advantages apart from the obvious one of hastening the collection of fines and rents. By offering a reasonable composition of two years' income, or a tenth of the full value of the land at twenty years' purchase, the de facto government induced many Royalists to acknowledge it, and it was also desirable to deprive the local committees and their agents of endless opportunities for corruption and petty tyranny in the disposal of freeholds and leases.

At first the Committee for Compounding, which sat at Goldsmiths' Hall from November, 1643, dealt only with those estates which had been already adjudicated by the Commissioners for Sequestrations. At this time it had the title of the Committee for Scottish Affairs, to which it ostensibly devoted itself down to the treaty of Newcastle in 1646. Almost from the beginning, however, the attention of the Committee was equally directed to the requirements of the English army, and a large part of the funds derived from compositions was applied to this purpose in spite of the frequent remonstrances of the Scotch leaders. In fact, it is not difficult to trace even in these purely financial negotiations the steady progress of an estrangement between the great body of English Puritans and their Scotch allies, which culminated in the second civil war. The latter distinguished themselves but little either in the English or Irish campaigns, and yet their arrogance and importunities were increased rather than abated by their failure. It is scarcely to be wondered at if a general want of zeal is evident in the operations of the county committees for collecting the Scotch assignments, or if after the battle of Naseby there was a greater disposition to favour the army of Fairfax in the matter of warlike supplies.

It is true that the Scotch still jealously maintained their claim to the full discharge of their assignments, and that the Presbyterian majority in Parliament was at length roused to some sense of its own critical position in the face of the victorious army of the Independents. None the less money came in slowly, and it was only when the Scotch army was prepared to withdraw from England on certain terms that a genuine effort was made to furnish the sum required in discharge of all arrears. In April of 1644 we read of the contumacy of certain assessors who refused to assist in the collection of subsidies for the Scotch army, while at the same time stringent orders were issued that "the sequestration money may not be diverted to any other use, upon any pretence whatever." In September following, although lavish provision of "bolls of oatmeal" and other food, with clothing and shoes, had been made for the allied army, the House of Commons directed the Goldsmiths' Hall Committee to "peruse the treaty" with a view to avoiding, if possible, the obligation of providing arms, 500*l.* worth of which had just before been forwarded to the English army under Lord Manchester. Following this, powers were at length given to the Committee for subsidizing the English army equally with the Scotch. These proceedings a month later called forth a strong protest on the part of the Scotch Commissioners, charging the financial committee with wilful evasion of the stipulated assignment. In December the Committee addressed a rebuke to the sequestrators for Northamptonshire, who were charged with gross obstruction, and similar complaints are recorded in the case of other counties. This evidence of lukewarmness on the part of the Independent rank and file receives still further confirmation after the battle of Naseby. Hitherto the Scotch army had been regarded as a necessary evil, but henceforth it was both despised and suspected. The whole activity of the Committee for Compounding was now directed towards the supply of money and provisions for the English troops, and the title of the sub-committee for Scottish affairs almost disappears from the books. The Presbyterian Parliament at Westminster, however, had still a voice in the matter, for just as it had been nervously solicitous for the contentment of its foreign masters, so it was by no means disposed to strengthen the hands of the Independent party by favouring a military demonstration. The rapid march of events deprived this intrigue of any real importance; therefore, after applying itself, with the assistance of all parties, to the task of discharging the arrears of the Scotch subsidy as agreed on by the treaty at Newcastle, Parliament was forced to be content with sundry efforts to disband the English regiments in several counties, which were mostly rendered ineffectual from want of money.

Meanwhile the work of sequestration had been rapidly pushed on as the fortune of war deserted the Royalist arms. The 1st of May, 1646, was fixed as the limit of time for the usual indulgence of compounding to be extended to those delinquents who were prepared at the same time to take the required oaths. Most of these, however, were disappointed at finding that after leaving Goldsmiths' Hall with a large proportion of their estates in hand, they were conducted thence to Haberdashers' Hall, and mulcted of a further contribution as new adherents to the Parliament. This sharp practice, it is alleged, deterred many from presenting themselves, whilst still more continued to cling to the vain hope of a restoration of the royal power. A large portion of the entries in this Calendar are devoted to the reports of the county committees concerning the administration of sequestered estates, and here ample evidence is forthcoming of the corruption prevalent among the provincial agents. There is a certain excuse to be made for those guilty of malpractices, that the remuneration for their arduous services was both scanty and irregular. Much anxiety was expressed on this score by the London committee, which seems to have been honestly desirous of reforming these abuses by obtaining a grant of sufficient salaries for its members and officers. It would appear that the establishments thus sanctioned were on a more liberal scale than had hitherto been customary, and the results of this liberality are very evident in contrast to the peculations of the underpaid provincials. There are numerous petitions in this volume addressed to Goldsmiths' Hall by the county committees on the subject of their unpaid allowances. In one case a poor widow in Shrewsbury was ruined by letting part of her house to the local commissioners, who were not in a position to discharge the rent agreed upon. The result of this gross neglect of the welfare of the servants of the State can be easily imagined. One is charged with having pocketed the proceeds of sequestered estates and with taking bribes, and general misconduct. Another was tried upon a charge of having secretly accepted 500*l.* from a certain delinquent to procure his discharge. Thereupon the witnesses for the State were intimidated, and one of them imprisoned on a wrongful accusation, and the delinquent, being thus acquitted, suffered judgment to go against him by default in a sham action for the recovery of a debt of 500*l.* Much obstruction was also caused by the pardonable artifices of delinquents who confided their estates to a diplomatic trustee, and even more by the audacity of Royalist partisans. One of the latter was actually a member of the central committee, by which he was brought to trial on various charges, such as associating with Papists "at taverns late at night, with music"; being a leveller; asking "who made this (Barebones) a Parliament?" and steadily declining to sit on the committee more than an hour and a half, or to sign any warrants unless it was made worth his while to do so. It is scarcely to be wondered at then that in 1655, after having been several times fruitlessly remodelled, the Committee for Compounding, with all its local branches, was ordered to transfer its accounts into the Exchequer. It reappeared in its old form, however, after the Royalist insurrection of 1659, and continued to transact business till within a month or two of the Restoration. It is due to Mrs. Green's accurate and untiring labours and to her singular historical perspicuity that the unwieldy mass of its official records has been made to yield an abundant harvest of information upon the financial expedients of the Interregnum.

THACKERAY'S 'PARIS SKETCH-BOOK' AND 'THE CORSAIR.'

In the Athenæum of August 7th, 1886, an interesting letter, signed "T. H. L.," appeared, tracing in general terms the first appearance of part of Thackeray's 'Paris Sketch-Book' to the American periodical the Corsair. After much seeking I have at last obtained a copy of the Corsair, which is, in England at all events, perhaps the scarcest of all Thackerayana, and I am able to supplement the information given by "T. H. L."

The introduction of Thackeray to the Corsair is told in the following interesting letter of one of the editors, Mr. N. P. Willis, which was written from London, and appeared in the issue of August 24th, 1839:—

"I have been delighted to find that the authors of the two best periodical series of papers that have appeared for twenty years are one and the same person. One of my first enquiries in London was touching the authorship of 'The Yellowplush Papers,' next the 'Reminiscences of Major Gahagan'—the only things in periodical literature, except the 'Pickwick Papers,' for which I looked with any interest or eagerness. The author, Mr. Thackeray, breakfasted with me yesterday, and the readers of the Corsair will be delighted, I am sure, to hear that I have engaged this cleverest and most gifted of the magazine writers of London to become a regular correspondent of the Corsair. He left London for Paris the day after, and having resided in that city for many years, his letters from thence will be pictures of life in France, done with a bolder and more trenchant pen than has yet attempted the subject. He will present a long letter every week, and you will agree with me that he is no common acquisition."

"Thackeray is a tall, athletic man of about thirty-five with a look of talent that could never be mistaken. He has taken to literature after having spent a very large inheritance, but in throwing away the gifts of fortune, he had cultivated his natural talents very highly, and is one of the most accomplished draughtsmen in England, as well as the cleverest and most brilliant of periodical writers. He has been the principal critic for the Times, and writes for Fraser and Blackwood. You will hear from him by the first steamer after his arrival in Paris, and thenceforward regularly."

Is it the fact, as above stated, that Thackeray wrote for Blackwood's Magazine? No contribution of his to it is known.

Then in the Corsair followed eight letters from Thackeray, which are reprinted with slight alterations in 'The Students' Quarter,' seven of them, considerably altered, having been reprinted by their author in 'The Paris Sketch-Book' in 1840.

The first letter appeared in the Corsair on the 24th of August, 1839, and is, generally speaking, the same as the article in 'The Paris Sketch-Book' called 'An Invasion of France,' and in 'The Students' Quarter' 'Off to France.'

The two following letters appeared on the 14th and 21st of September, 1839, and are substantially reprinted in 'The Paris Sketch-Book' under the title of 'Madame Sand and the New Apocalypse,' and in 'The Students' Quarter' as 'French Fiction' and 'The Story of Spiridon.'

The fourth letter appeared on October 5th, 1839, and was reprinted, with an altered finish, in 'The Paris Sketch-Book' under the title of 'The Fêtes of July,' and in 'The Students' Quarter' as 'A Week of Fêtes.'

The fifth letter is headed 'Cartouche.' It appeared on the 19th of October in the Corsair, and in the same month in Fraser's Magazine, with another story, 'Poinsetin.' The two stories were reprinted in 'The Paris Sketch-Book,' and the first, under the title of 'A French Jack Sheppard,' in 'The Students' Quarter.'

The sixth letter appeared on the 26th of October. It was not reprinted in 'The Paris Sketch-Book,' and can, so far as I know, only be found in 'The Students' Quarter,' where it is called 'More Aspects of Paris Life.'

The seventh and eighth letters appeared on the 28th of December, 1839, and the 18th of January, 1840, respectively, under the title of 'A Ramble in the Picture Galleries.' They were reprinted in 'The Paris Sketch-Book' as 'On the French School of Painting,' and in 'The Students' Quarter' under their original title.

All the letters, with the exception of the last, were signed "T. T.," a signature used by Thackeray in the Gentleman and the Constitutional; the last was signed "M. A. T."

Before I leave the Corsair I must point out that on the 28th of September, 1839, it published 'Captain Rook and Mr. Pigeon,' by William Thackeray, which had just appeared in 'Heads of the People'; and on the 7th of March, 1840, reprinted 'Epistles to the Literati,' which was first issued in Fraser's Magazine for January, and was afterwards reprinted by the author in 'Comic Tales and Sketches.' It will thus be seen that the Corsair is a periodical of great interest, and is, indeed, essential to the bibliographer of Thackeray's writings. CHAS. P. JOHNSON.

P.S.—Since this was written I have heard on good authority that Thackeray never wrote anything for Blackwood's Magazine.

LINES BY POPE.

Walthamstow.

THESE fine lines on 'Love' are given in "Chalmers's Poets" (vol. viii. p. 242) as being by Rochester, in 'A Letter from Artemisa,' &c. They are embedded in a poem of some two hundred and fifty, or three hundred lines, many of which rise to quite equal excellence. Even to the height of that happy piece of wit of Canova's (if he did not quote from this), that Englishmen judge of sculpture with their ears, Rochester says that if some women should call Bovy a beauty,

— the rest to that degree

Affected are, that with their ears they see.

How any one could think that these clever lines, admirable as they are, could be Pope's it puzzles one to see. There is all the wit that Pope or anybody else could put into them, but absolutely none of the versification. Look at the hiatus in the rhythm of the aptly conceived, but awkwardly expressed fifth line,—

That cordial drop Heaven in our cup has thrown.

Two rhymes out of five in the ten lines are bad—thrown with down, prove with love. No; the verses are bright, but they seem to come from the pen of an accomplished prose writer or practised conversationalist rather than from such a master of versification as Pope was. There is nothing to justify "ecstatic emotion" here. C. A. WARD.

THE lines 'To Alethea Tempest' I have published in Merry England are undoubtedly Pope's, written with corrections and alterations in his own hand; but Mr. Taylor's reference shows that those which Pope entitles 'A Description of Love' are an extract from a much longer poem, attributed to Lord Rochester, and printed in Byshe's 'Art of Poetry,' which I overlooked. I did not find them in 'The Miscellaneous Works of the Earls of Rochester and Roscommon,' second edition, 1707, but possibly they appeared in some other form before that date. From the fact of their being in Pope's hand, and evidently written on the same occasion with his verses 'To Alethea Tempest,' I naturally concluded both to be his. JOSEPH GILLOW.

MR. STANLEY'S BOOK.

IN view of a variety of misleading announcements regarding the issue of Mr. H. M. Stanley's forthcoming work in America, I have the pleasure to inform the public through you that Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, of New York, will be the publishers of the author's sole work on the recent Emin Pasha Expedition in that country. E. MARSTON.

Literary Gossip.

LORD TENNYSON has sent to Mr. Yeld, of Nottingham, the following letter upon the subject of the absurd paragraph that has been going the round of the papers:—

Farringford, Freshwater, Isle of Wight, Feb. 1, 1890.

SIR,—My father desires me to acknowledge the receipt of your apology. He was very much surprised at the liberty which you had taken in quoting certain MS. lines of his without either his leave or that of the Bradshaws. In answer to your letter, I am to inform you that the lines in question were a mere complimentary jeu d'esprit, and that there was no romance in the matter.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

HALLAM TENNYSON.

Rev. Charles Yeld.

THE third edition of Mr. Coventry Patmore's 'Unknown Eros,' which is going to appear presently, will be furnished with a new preface on catalectic metre.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. are going to publish a volume entitled 'Oliver Cromwell, the Protector: an Appreciation based on Contemporary Evidence,' by Mr. Reginald Palgrave, C.B., the Clerk of the House of Commons. It will be founded to some extent on the articles Mr. Palgrave contributed to the Historical Review, but will be to all intents and purposes a new book.

A COLLECTED edition of Philip Bourke Marston's poetical works will be before long published by his friend Mrs. Moulton. It will contain several important poems which have not yet seen the light.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co. are going to bring out an edition of Mr. Lewis Morris's poems in one volume, similar to that of Lord Tennyson's poetry issued by them some ten years ago.

THE third edition of Canon MacColl's book, which will be published in a day or two, has been revised throughout, and contains some additional matter. There is an appendix on creation out of nothing, in which the views of Profs. Balfour Stewart and Tait, as expounded in 'The Unseen Universe,' are shown to be in agreement with the teaching of St. Augustine, Origen, and Leibnitz. There is also a long preface containing contributions from Mr. Gladstone, Sir Lyon Playfair, and the late Bishop Lightfoot.

SIR GEORGE DUCKETT has, with his usual industry, translated the 'Visitations of English Cluniac Foundations in 47 Hen. III. (1262), 3 and 4 Edw. I. (1275-6), and 7 Edw. I. (1279),' from the original records in the National Library of France. From the same source he has added, in part, those of 27 Edw. I. (1298), 13 Ric. II. (1390), 6 Hen. IV. (1405), and he is going to publish them through Messrs. Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.

A NEW work by Ouida is in the press and nearly ready. It is to be issued in the usual three-volume form by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

THE new edition of Mr. Wilfrid Ward's 'William George Ward and the Oxford Movement,' to be published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., will contain an interesting addition to the last chapter. The author applies the principles contained in his father's 'Ideal of a Christian Church,' and in the last four University sermons by J. H. Newman, including the one on 'Wisdom contrasted with Faith and Bigotry,' to the fundamental problem of the modern agnostic controversy, and attempts to show that this controversy was in great measure anticipated by the Oxford School fifty years ago.

MESSRS. SMITH & ELDER are going to publish on the 26th inst., at the price of half-a-crown, an edition of Mrs. Humphry Ward's novel 'Robert Elsmere.'

PROF. SETH's work on 'Scottish Philosophy,' which has been for some time out of print, has been revised and enlarged by the author with a view to a second edition, which Messrs. Blackwood & Sons are going to publish.

THE next volume of Mr. W. D. Hamiltons' 'Calendar of Domestic State Papers of the Reign of Charles I.,' which is nearly ready for publication, will cover the important period between October, 1644, and June, 1645. Many details will come to light in it of the New Model army under Fairfax, and of the campaign resulting in the battle of Naseby, which virtually closed the first civil war. The quarrel between Cromwell and the Earl of Manchester will be illustrated by many documents not to be found in the Camden Society's volume on that subject. Another interesting feature of the work will be numerous hitherto unprinted letters of Henrietta Maria.

THE seventh volume of the 'Calendar of State Papers relating to England preserved in the Archives of Venice,' the materials for which were collected by the late Mr. Rawdon Brown, is also about to be issued. The documents described in it range in date between 1558 and 1580.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE & Co. will shortly publish a new story by Mr. George Manville Fenn.

A SCOTTISH BIBLIOGRAPHIC SOCIETY has been founded in Edinburgh under the presidency of Mr. Archibald Constable. The members, limited to sixty in number, are to meet every fortnight with the object of making known and exhibiting rarities, comparing notes, and accumulating materials for a complete Scottish bibliography. Meanwhile select papers, read and printed by them, will be issued to the sixty only.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON propose to publish a set of cheap classical texts for use in schools and colleges. The Latin texts will be issued at twopence, and the Greek at threepence, apiece.

A GENERAL meeting of the Société d'Ethnographie de Paris—the body from which originated the International Congresses of Orientalists—was held on Monday, at which it was resolved that the society associated itself with the views of Dr. Leitner, and, whilst thanking him and his British colleagues for first proposing Paris, considered that London was the suitable place for the next Congress.

It is much to be regretted that the difficulties inseparable from writing a contemporary biography like Sir Bartle Frere's should be increased by the avidity with which rumours of differences connected with its preparation are received and spread. It is well known that circumstances have led to the suspension of the work; but those circumstances have arisen neither from political differences nor from a rupture between the author and the family. They are such as might arise in the case of any contemporary life when a large family group retain their own keenly affectionate views of the subject of the biography from the family rather than from the public point of view. What action has been taken in the matter has been taken on the joint decision of Lady Frere's literary adviser, of her publisher, of her brother, and of the author, and these four gentlemen have acted in harmony from first to last. To spread rumours of differences merely intensifies the difficulties incident to the resumption of the work. Those difficulties are sufficiently great in the case of a man so recently deceased, and whose biography must touch at many points the reputation and sensibilities of those from whose views he differed seriously in public life. The silence which the family and the author have maintained is well considered from this point of view, and it ought to be respected.

As sale dinners have for some time past been getting fewer and fewer, the opportunities that the various members of the book-selling trade enjoy of meeting in social gatherings have much diminished, and it has occurred to several members of the trade that it would tend to promote social intercourse if a dinner were held, open to booksellers and those directly connected with literature. As the Booksellers' Provident Institution is the only representative society in the trade, its directors have taken upon themselves to initiate such a dinner. Their object is to promote good-fellowship among booksellers, and no subscription will be asked for the funds of the Institution. The dinner will be held on Saturday, March 8th, at 6 P.M. at the Holborn Restaurant. Mr. C. J. Longman has promised to preside.

In his article in the English Historical Review for October, 1889, called 'A Letter of Lord Chesterfield's on the Change of Ministry in 1746,' Mr. John Robinson gave an account of how he discovered the Delaval Papers, with the names of some few of the more important. The Historical MSS. Commissioners have asked leave to inspect these documents, and Mr. Robinson has decided to send the whole of the letters and historical documents to Rolls House to be examined.

M. BELIN, the Rector of the Académie of Aix, has been working at the old records of the university, which for a time were lost sight of, and is preparing a 'Histoire de l'Université d'Aix.'

THE death is announced of M. Rothan, who was in the French diplomatic service for several years, and after his retirement published some interesting books on the important episodes in continental politics that occurred in his time—'L'Affaire du Luxembourg,' 'La Politique Française en 1866,' 'L'Allemagne et l'Italie en 1870-1871,' &c. He was a collector of pictures, especially portraits by David, and had a large share in organizing several of the exhibitions at the École des Beaux-Arts. Four years ago the Germans expelled him from Alsace, where he used to spend the summer on his estates.

THE Basilian monk and savant Father Cozza, while engaged on his forthcoming edition of the New Testament from unpublished Vatican codices, with phototype facsimiles, has had occasion to consult some neglected leaves of Strabo in the Grotta Ferrata Library, in which he has found passages hitherto unknown. In one of these detached leaves, belonging to the Tenth Book, he has come upon a mention of the island of Claudia (Vulg., Cauda), of which mention is made in the Acts of the Apostles (xxvii. 16). The name is now for the first time known to occur in Strabo.

THE death is announced of Mr. Robert Carter, of the well-known publishing firm of Carter Brothers, of New York. He was by birth a Scotchman, and in early youth emigrated to America, where, in conjunction with his brothers, he commenced business as a publisher. Mr. Carter died at the age of eighty-two.

THE Public Libraries Acts were adopted in the parish of Stoke Newington on Wednesday by an enormous majority.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTSON, the head of the well-known wholesale bookselling business of George Robertson & Co. at Melbourne, is retiring from the concern, and his place is being taken by his son, Mr. Charles M. Robertson, who has been in the house many years. The business was originated by Mr. George Robertson thirty-seven years ago.

MESSES. FREDERICK WARNE & Co. are going to add to the 'Chandos Classics' an edition of Napier's 'Peninsular War' in six volumes.

THE Rangoon Gazette of the 10th of January brings the following intelligence:

"Dr. Forchhammer completed his twelfth year of service in Burma yesterday. The learned German's labours have been uninterrupted from the time he first landed in Rangoon. Dr. Forchhammer completed his work on the pagodas, monasteries, and ancient buildings of Arrakan yesterday, and handed it to the Chief Commissioner. It is a large illustrated volume, and has taken the professor four years to accomplish."

A POSTHUMOUS historical monograph by Freiherr Ernst von Stockmar, entitled 'Ludwig XVI. und Marie Antoinette auf der Flucht nach Montmédy im Jahre 1791,' has just been issued at Berlin under the editorship of Herr Emil Daniels.

THE death occurred at Stockholm, on the 31st of January, of Prof. Per Erik Bergfalk, the eminent Swedish historian. Had he lived four days longer he would have completed his ninety-second year, having been born on the 4th of February, 1798. He was Professor of History at Upsala from 1838 to 1861, when he retired, and for nearly thirty years has lived in a house on Södermalm, in the capital. His writings chiefly deal with Swedish history in the seventeenth century.

THE Parliamentary Papers of the week are Poor Law Relief, Index to Report of 1888 (1s. 4d.); New Guinea, Further Correspondence, Maps (4s. 3d.); and Pauperism, Statement for November (2d.).

SCIENCE

MEDICAL BOOKS.

Account of the Life and Works of Maister Peter Lowe. By James Finlayson, M.D. (Glasgow, MacLehose & Sons.)—Peter Lowe founded in 1599 the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, a body which, with varying repute, has survived to the present day. Its founder was a surgeon of the same literary attainments and professional character as the famous William Clowes, John Banester, and George Baker, who flourished in London in the reign of Elizabeth. Like them he had his secret remedies, and regarded their use as part of his stock-in-trade. Like them he denounces quacks with fury, and himself encroaches as far as he dares into the province of the physicians. Clowes writes in English and Lowe does so too, while the physicians of the time always wrote in Latin. Dr. Finlayson, whose edition and notes show much careful research, does not explain why Lowe did not write in Scotch, since he was inclined to follow the surgical custom of using the vernacular instead of a learned language. The place of his birth is undetermined, and this fact may, perhaps, deserve consideration in investigations to determine it. He practised in France, in London, and finally in Glasgow, where, since his death in 1612, his body has remained in a handsome tomb in the churchyard of the cathedral. The epitaph does honour to his disposition:—

Stay passenger and view this stone
For under it lies such a one
Who cured many whill he lived
Soe gracious he noe man grieved
Yea when his phisicks force oft failed
His pleasant purpose then prevailed
For of his God he got the grace
To live in mirth and die in peace
Heaven hes his soul his corps this stone
Sigh passenger and soe be gone.

Lowe was in France in the time of Ambrose Paré, served in the wars there, and returned to Scotland to practise and to write. His most famous book is 'A Discourse of the Whole Art of Chyrurgerie,' which was printed in 1597. It is written in the form of a dialogue, and contains many quaint accounts of cases, some of which are quoted by Dr. Finlayson. An aneurysm or morbid bulging out of an artery is occasionally mistaken at the present day for an abscess, but it is to be hoped that the accident which Lowe witnessed seldom occurs nowadays:—

"I remember in Paris in Anno 1590, there happened such a disease to a valiant Capitaine (my great friend Capitaine Bayle, who was one of the chiefest Capitaines amongst the Spaniards at Paris) on the right side of his cragge, for the which, I a Chyrurgion Maior to the regiment, was sent for, and found it to be an Aneurysme, so not to be touched; of the which opinion was my good friend Andrew Scot, who was a great Practitioner at Paris for y^e time, and wel exercised in the art of Chyrurgery, we did ordaine remedies to let the encrease of it, which receipt being sent to the Apothecary, who before had seene the sayd Capitaine, did thinke it no meete medicine for an Aposthume (as he termed it); so presently he sent for an ignorant Barbor like unto himselfe, who did swear unto the Capitaine that they had sawes and charmes for all sores, so without further tryall did open it with a Launce to auoide the matter (as they thought) which being done, the spirit and blood came forth with such violence, that the Capitaine dyed in fewe howers after. I doubt not but in these Countries diuers such errors are committed by ignorants."

Dr. Finlayson has added several useful notes, and discusses the meaning of the epithet "Arellian" which is applied to Lowe. It seems probable that it means native of Errol, a well-known town, where the surname occurs in 1569, and that he calls himself Peter Lowe, Arellian, on his title-pages just as a few years later Whistler, of Walthamstow, in Essex, styles himself "Anglo Saxonius Orientalis." Dr. Finlayson's carefully edited book makes all the existing knowledge of Lowe easily accessible, and it is to be hoped that the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow may be able under his guidance to issue an edition of the very rare surgical treatise of their founder. Its interest is not wholly surgical, for it contains scraps of history and many curious expressions.

Notes on Medical Education. By Sir James Sawyer, M.D. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)—This is a collection of addresses delivered in the Birmingham School of Medicine on various occasions. The motto of the first is a phrase from Lord Beaconsfield's 'Young Duke,' which conveys a truth for which more venerable authority might be found, "Knowledge must be gained by ourselves"; and that of the last is from a discourse of the late Roman Catholic Bishop of Birmingham, "Wisdom is the balsam that keeps science from corruption." An author who sets a high value on such empty phrases cannot be expected to show much thought in his own writings. It is melancholy that a physician should think science likely to produce corruption, and discreditable that one who claims to have discovered "the pathological process of laryngeal phthisis" should not know that balsam will not prevent corruption. The addresses contain no definite information of any kind, and are written in a style of English too common in medical journals, and unworthy of a fellow of the College of Physicians of London, a body generally remarkable for literary precision. Sir James Sawyer speaks of "owing a field to a syringe," of digitalis as "amongst the most reliable staples of our art," and, besides being inelegant in his phraseology, is sometimes inaccurate in his facts. Thus he states that therapeutics or treatment is ordered to be studied too early in the student's career by the examining bodies, while several of them now require a knowledge of the subject only at the final examination. His other remark on the same subject may be true of Birmingham, but is certainly untrue of Edinburgh and of London: "The art of treatment is now a neglected branch of medical instruction." There is, in reality, no part of medicine which has been more elaborated, especially as to those very important parts of it nursing and diet, in recent years than the treatment of the sick. The hundred and six pages of the book contain little but vague generalities pompously expressed, and to read them can profit no one.

The Human Foot: its Form and Structure, Functions and Clothing. By Thomas S. Ellis. (Churchill.)—Mr. Ellis, a surgeon in Gloucester, and a former pupil of Sir James Paget, has in this book collected a series of ingenious and often very interesting remarks about the human foot, its structure, its movements, and its distortions. The book is intended for general readers and for shoemakers, and contains much likely to be useful to both classes. It is illustrated by excellent diagrams and drawings.

An Essay on Asphyxia (Apnea). By George Johnson, M.D. Lond., F.R.S. (Churchill.)—Whatever Dr. George Johnson undertakes, he usually does well; and the 'Essay on Asphyxia' is no exception to the rule, while it is a valuable contribution to the elucidation of the much discussed question of asphyxia, or, as he prefers to style it, apnea. Dr. Johnson calls the reader's special attention to the existence and function of the muscular arterioles, and the important part they play in regulating the supply of blood to the capillaries. After carefully and accurately analyzing the views held by the authors who have considered this subject for more than a generation, he shows how they differ as to the condition of the cavities of the heart at the time of death. Finally, he gives his own views as to the cause of asphyxia, which are an important contribution to the thorough understanding of the matter. We can heartily recommend this essay to those who are most interested in it, as the outcome of much hard, honest, and thoughtful work by one whose ability and position entitle him to speak with authority.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

A MELANCHOLY interest will attach to the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society next Monday. Mr. Douglas Freshfield will give a full account of the search expedition undertaken by Mr. C. Dent and himself which solved the problem of the fate of the two English mountaineers, Mr. Donkin and Mr. Fox, who were lost in the Caucasus in 1888. It will be remembered that the search party did not succeed in finding the bodies of the missing travellers and their guides; but the position of their last encampment left no doubt that they lost their lives in attempting the dangerous ascent of one of the highest and most difficult peaks in the Caucasus, and that there was no ground for the belief that they had fallen victims to the treachery and cupidity of the natives. Mr. Freshfield's paper will be illustrated by photographs taken by Signor V. Sella, one of the several travellers who succeeded last year in the ascent of Mount Elbruz, and by Mr. H. Woolley, who accompanied Mr. Freshfield in his search expedition.

The most interesting paper in the February number of the Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society is Col. Mark Bell's account of his journey from Peking to Kashgaria. He traversed the provinces of Shansi, Shensi, and Kansu, recording some noteworthy observations on the physical characteristics of the loess soil, with which we have been made familiar from the writings of Baron Richthofen. At Pingyang-fu Col. Bell found it better to take to Chinese dress of blue cotton leggings, blouse, travelling cap, and spectacles, and so disguised he saved himself many a mobbing from the provincial Chinese. To the north-west he passed through the scenes of the Mohammedan insurrection, which lasted for seventeen years, and has left its traces in the diminished population, which from 17,000,000 has dwindled down to 2,000,000. The Mohammedans are still feared; they are braver than the Chinese, who are demoralized more or less by opium smoking. Col. Bell comments on the decentralized form of government in China owing to the want of intercommunication, and prophesies that, unless China improves her communications by railways, the country bordering Russia, up to the Yellow River and the Great Wall, must fall to the Czar whenever he wants it. China, the writer continues, has driven a wedge into Central Asia between alien peoples, and has colonized it, so as to form a road for conquest and commerce. This wedge, from a political and strategical point of view, is of extreme importance to China, yet she holds it with a loose grasp, and it may slip from her any day. This appears to be the general moral of Col. Bell's paper, which is particular to note the foolish policy pursued by the Chinese at Hami, where they show neither justice nor protection to the Russian merchants, and where neither the civil nor military mandarin would either see Col. Bell or return his card. In Kashgaria, on the other hand, great courtesy was displayed. On the whole, Col. Bell considers that Kashgaria cannot possibly be defended by China against Russia so long as Chinese troops are not both trained and led by European officers, and rail communications with the valley of the Wei and with Peking are absent. British commercial enterprise is wanting throughout the region almost as much as it was twenty years ago, when Mr. R. B. Shaw first endeavoured to arouse interest in the subject; and a Russian occupation of the country is considered to be a very probable contingency.

Dr. Peters is at length authentically reported to be alive and well in Ukamba, a country lying a considerable distance to the south of Mount Kenia, and occupied, for some time back, by the British East Africa Company. He appears to have travelled in the footsteps of Messrs. Pigott and Smith, officials of that company.

Mr. Jackson, an explorer of the British East Africa Company, announces his arrival, in October last, in Sotik, a district of or near Lumbwa, about half-way between Mr. Thomson's route and the Southern Kavirond on the Victoria Nyanza. Mr. Jackson has thus succeeded in penetrating a part of the Masai country never before explored by a European.

The Royal Colonial Institute appears to be on the eve of a new departure. From the annual report, which is now in the hands of Fellows, and will be laid before the general annual meeting on the 18th inst., it seems that the proof-sheets of several forthcoming works relating to the colonies have been submitted to the council by members of the Institute with a view to their being published under its auspices. A special committee has been deputed to examine and revise such proofs, and report whether the matter contained therein is "sound and trustworthy." As a result of this arrangement it is probable that Mr. Washington Eves's work on 'The West Indies' will only be the first of a series.

Mr. Stanley's great popularity is evidenced by the large number of books which are being published concerning his most recent and certainly most arduous expedition. Stanley's Emin Pasha Expedition, by J. Wauters (Nimmo), is quite a handsome volume, with a portrait of the explorer, several other illustrations, and a good map. The bulk of it is naturally a compilation from Mr. Stanley's letters, but the author supplies in addition a readable history of the Sudan, since its conquest by the Egyptians, down to the return of Dr. Junker. M. Wauters is evidently in favour of Mr. Stanley's assertion that the snow-clad Ruwenzori is the representative of the mythical "Mountains of the Moon," which have thus been brought "within the range of positive knowledge."

Stanley and his Heroic Relief of Emin Pasha, by E. P. Scott (Dean & Son), is less bulky than the preceding work, but in some respects it is more complete, for the author furnishes his readers with a concise account of Mr. Stanley's career from his birth down to the present day. His book, too, is illustrated, and has a small, but useful map.—Messrs. Philip have sent us an excellent map of Stanley's Explorations in Africa from 1868 to 1889, accompanied by some useful letterpress by Mr. Ravenstein. This is decidedly the most helpful of the three publications to the amateur of geography.

Petermann's Mittheilungen publishes an account of Dr. Hans Meyer's exploration of the summit of Kilimanjaro, together with a preliminary map. Dr. Meyer, who was accompanied by Herr Purtscheller, ascended the highest summit of the "Kibo" no fewer than four times, and spent altogether sixteen days upon the saddle which joins the Kibo to the Mawenzi summit. Beyond the ice-wall, which put a stop to his progress in 1878, he discovered a huge crater, with an eruptive cone in its centre. It results from Dr. Meyer's measurements, no less than from a careful survey made by Lieut. von Höhnel, whose observations are published in a recent number of the Mittheilungen of the Vienna Geographical Society, that Kilimanjaro attains a greater altitude than that given it by Dr. Kersten, the companion of Baron von der Decken, who determined its height trigonometrically, but was unable to obtain a sight of its most elevated pinnacle, henceforth to be known as "Kaiser Wilhelm Spitze."

ANTHROPOLOGICAL NOTES.

ANTHROPOLOGISTS generally will, we are persuaded, learn with great regret that the School of Anthropology in Paris has suppressed the Chair of General Anthropology, which has been for fourteen years filled by Prof. Topinard. Following on the recognition of the School by statute as an établissement d'utilité publique—which will render necessary its removal next November from the École de Médecine, where it existed under the patronage of the Minister of Public Instruction in a Government building, to other premises which, being now in the eye of the French law, a "civil person," it must acquire for itself—this untoward step separates the School from the Institute of Anthropology founded by Broca, and from associations with his most distinguished pupil and follower. There seems some ground for doubt whether the proceedings in the matter have been perfectly regular; but, however that may be, the fact that such a decision should have been arrived at by the governing body of the School is a grave one.

The Institute of Anthropology of France was constituted by Broca in 1875, when he crowned his organization for the propagation of anthropology, commenced in the Society of Anthropology in 1859, and systematized in the Laboratory of Anthropology in 1867, by the School of Anthropology, with its staff of professors. The first professors authorized by the State were Broca, Topinard, Dally, Hovelacque, and De Mortillet. Each of the three bodies had its separate constitution and regulations, but it was the hope and aim of Broca that all would work together for the furtherance of the knowledge of anthropology, and to that end he devoted his private laboratory as a professor at the École de Médecine to the service of the Institute, and thus founded the Laboratory of Anthropology. In relation to all of them, it will be seen that his main object was the promotion of physical anthropology as an exact science, rather than the development of sociology and psychology and their application to social and political life.

It would seem that the governing bodies of the Society and the School have of late years given far too much weight to the latter class of inquiries, and have devoted themselves to what they not inaptly call "combative anthropology." It is in Dr. Topinard's objection to this tendency that the principal heads of the accusation that caused his dismissal arise. It led him to oppose the recognition of the School as an institution of public utility, to maintain the rights of the Laboratory against the School while himself a member of the latter, and to devote all his energies to making the portion of the recent exhibition which was placed under his care worthy of the occasion so far as physical anthropology is concerned. His success in that respect has been acknowledged by the French Government, and we cannot but surmise that the event on which we have been commenting is a further evidence of it.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Jan. 30.—The President in the chair.—Mr. W. H. M. Christie, Astronomer Royal, was elected a member of Council in the place of the Rev. S. J. Perry, deceased.—The following papers were read: "Investigations into the Effects of Training Walls in an Estuary like the Mersey," by Mr. L. F. Vernon Harcourt; "On Outlying Nerve-cells in the Mamalian Spinal Cord," by Mr. C. S. Sherrington; and "On the Germination of the Seed of the Castor-oil Plant (Ricinus communis)," by Prof. J. R. Green.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Jan. 30.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. Rome exhibited a fine bronze statuette of Jupiter Conservator.—Mr. J. G. Waller exhibited a rubbing of a remarkable brass to Fridesmonda, wife of Richard Barnes, Bishop of Durham, from the church of St. Andrew, Auckland, on which he communicated some remarks.—Mr. E. A. Wallis Budge read a paper on a hieratic papyrus in the Museum inscribed with (1) the Festival Songs of Isis and Nephthys, composed for the service which was celebrated in the temple of Amen-Râ at Thebes; (2) the additional Litanies of Seker, which also were sung at this festival; and (3) the Book of the Overthrow of Apepi, the enemy of Râ, and the Book of the Becomings or Evolutions of Râ. It was discovered at Thebes by Mr. Rhind in the year 1832. It is written in a fine small hieratic hand, but some of the characters have forms which, with very slight modification, become those we are acquainted with in Demotic. According to one of the colophons the papyrus was written in the twelfth year of the reign of Alexander, the son of Alexander (B.C. 305). As Alexander II. began to reign B.C. 317, but was murdered in B.C. 311, it is clear that the writer has added the years of the interregnum to those of the reign of Alexander II. The colophon was probably added to the papyrus some years after the other parts of it were written. The papyrus was written for Nesi-Amsu, the son of Petâ-Amen-suten-taiu, a "prophet" who held various dignities in nearly all the temples of Thebes. The date in the colophon does not indicate the antiquity of the compositions, for in the course of the work we more than once find the words "otherwise said," so the works are sufficiently old for several copies of them to have been made and for variant readings to arise. The first two compositions were written by the same hand, the third by another. The strips of papyrus were then joined together, and formed part of the stock-in-trade of an ancient Egyptian who made it his business to supply such works to friends of dead people, who bought them to bury in the tombs. Between the first and second compositions in the papyrus is written a series of curses which, it is hoped by the writer, may fall upon the person who ventures to look upon it or carry it away. The 'Festival Songs of Isis and Nephthys' and the 'Litanies of Seker' were sung in the temple of Amen by two young women intended to represent Isis, the wife of Osiris, and Nephthys, his sister. They were to be ceremonially pure, they had their heads bound with woollen tiaras, and their songs were accompanied by the music of the tambourine. The songs were led off by the precentor, and the women took it in turns to address pathetic appeals to the Sun-god to return to his temple and to his "widows" who pined for him. There is no rhyme, but there is a rhythm which, though occasionally monotonous, is not unpleasing. The unity of the Sun-god is unequivocally declared, and the various parts that he performs in the government of the material and spiritual worlds are described. For comparative mythology these songs are of value, and the new words they contain will be a gain to the Egyptian dictionary. The author is not named, and it is not possible to say exactly when they were composed; they are, in many respects, similar to the 'Lamentations of Isis,' which are found in a Berlin papyrus. The third and last work contains a full account of the defeat and slaughter by Râ, or the Sun-god, of Apepi his enemy. The rubrics say that the chapters of this work were recited so many times a day in the temple of Amen-Râ, and that certain acts had to be performed while the priest recited these chapters. A wax figure of Apepi was made, and upon it his name was written in green ink; this figure was placed in a papyrus case upon which Apepi's name had been written in green ink. At a certain time of the day this case, with the figure in it, was put in a grass fire and slowly burnt. The prayers for the slaughter of Apepi by Horus being said at the same time, it was believed that powers of the mist, darkness, and cloud would be overcome by the piercing rays of Râ. This custom is, no doubt, the origin of the old practice of attempting to cause harm to people by burning wax figures of them. It obtained in Egypt as early as B.C. 1300. It calls to mind the tradition about Nectanebus, the last king of Egypt, who maintained his hold upon Egypt by being able to destroy the armies of hostile kings by means of his magic worked with wax figures and a bowl of water. Towards the middle of the Book of the Overcoming of Apepi there is inserted a remarkable work describing the origin of gods, men, and things. In it the "universal god" in the form of Chepera, the self-begotten, is represented as speaking. He describes the waste and void condition of the earth and the non-existence of anything. There was not even a spot for him to stand upon, and he was quite alone. He by himself planned everything, and gods, men, and things came into existence from his evolutions. He was a husband to himself, his shadow was his wife. Shu and Tefnut were the gods that were first born, and the god says, "Thus from one god I became three gods." The great god Chepera weeps, and men and women spring into existence from the tears which fall from his eyes. Shu and Tefnut then gave birth to Seb, Sut, Osiris, Isis, Nephthys, and the other gods at one birth, and "their children multiply upon the earth." The text of this cosmogony exists in the papyrus in duplicate, and what one version lacks is supplied by the other. At the end of the work is a hymn to the Sun-god, who is described as having utterly overthrown Apepi, followed by several rubrics containing prescriptions for magical procedure.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Feb. 4.—Sir J. Coope, President, in the chair.—It was announced that Messrs. W. Y. Armstrong, J. H. Hallett, E. B. Taylor, and J. F. Weedon, Associate Members, had been transferred to the class of Members; and that fifteen gentlemen had been admitted as Students.—The monthly ballot resulted in the election of General E. Frome as Honorary Member; of five Members, and of thirty-eight Associate Members.—The paper read was 'On Bars at the Mouths of Tidal Estuaries,' by Mr. W. H. Wheeler.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—Feb. 3.—Sir J. C. Browne, Treasurer and V.P., in the chair.—Mr. F. W. Fison, Dr. C. A. Martius, Right Hon. Earl Russell, and Mr. W. Schooling were elected Members.

SOCIETY OF ENGINEERS.—Feb. 3.—Mr. J. R. Baillie, President for 1889, first occupied the chair, and presented the premiums of books awarded for papers read during his year of office, viz.: the President's Premium to Mr. G. M. Lawford for his paper on 'Fireproof Floors'; the Bessemer Premium to Mr. S. Griffin for his paper on 'Modern Gas Engine Practice'; a Society's Premium to Mr. H. Faifa for his paper on 'Forced Filtration of Water through Concrete,' and to Mr. George R. Strachan for his paper on 'The Construction and Repair of Roads.'—The President for the present year, Mr. H. Adams, then took the chair and delivered his inaugural address.

ARISTOTELIAN.—Feb. 3.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. D. G. Ritchie read a paper 'On the Conception of Sovereignty.' The conception of sovereignty which is expressed in Austin's famous definition may be taken as the central point of the characteristically English school of jurisprudence, and of the political philosophy of Hobbes, Bentham, and Cornwell Lewis. The historical method, especially as applied by Sir H. Maine, is supposed nowadays to have supplanted the analytic. Both methods are, however, necessary in the study of institutions. But philosophical analysis must get beyond the abstractions of the English jurists and economists. Even if the Austinian conception be applied only to highly developed modern constitutions, such as those of Great Britain and the United States of America, difficulties arise. Recent apologists of Austin take his "sovereign" as being only "the sovereign for the lawyer quod lawyer"; but Austin himself meant more than that. In political philosophy we must go behind this "legal sovereign" to the ultimate political sovereign—a distinction recognized by Locke. This ultimate political sovereign is not to be found in a determinate body of persons, but in that vaguer something which Rousseau called "the General Will." The value of Austin's conception lies in his insisting on the legal irresponsibility of the legal sovereign. The question of the responsibility of the ultimate political sovereign opens the way into the problems of international law and the philosophy of history.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

FINE ARTS

A Dictionary of Miniaturists, Illuminators, Calligraphers, and Copyists. By J. W. Bradley. Vols. II. and III. (Quaritch.)

A MUCH needed dictionary, of which we reviewed the first instalment in 1888, is completed in the volumes before us. Mr. Bradley has adhered to his plan of including in a work already sufficiently elaborate and difficult a considerable number of notices of collectors and amateurs, or, as he calls them, "patrons," whose biographies occupy an undue proportion of space in a dictionary where they are, under any circumstances, rather out of place. Nor has Mr. Bradley made the most of such excuse as he could allege for introducing them. For example, in the case of Cardinal Ercole Gonzaga he has omitted to say in what way and to what degree that ecclesiastical diplomatist, whose most brilliant appearance was at the Council of Trent, had to do with the art of the illuminators and miniaturists, or with art of any kind whatever. As well give us a biography of Bessarion as such a sketch as Mr. Bradley's. Ercole Gonzaga was, it so happens, a man of taste, fond of painters and scribes, nor are his associations with art confined, as the reader might gather from this book, to the ownership of an allegorical device which was characteristic of the affected and whimsical poetry of the period in which he lived.

However, a grant of arms by a German emperor did not make a "patron" of design worthy of companionship with a collector so eminent and energetic as Roger de Gaingnières of Burgundy, who, in the middle of the seventeenth century, was one of the most ardent of amateurs, as he was one of the first of his kind, in France, and who, fortunately for the Bibliothèque Nationale, amassed treasures for the establishment in the Rue de Richelieu is greatly the wealthier. He was one of the first of those over-enthusiastic collectors who kept a man "specially facile in the reproduction of mediæval relics," i.e., pseudo-antiquities and works of art. Italian cognoscenti had been taken in by knaves so far back as the fifteenth century. They complained bitterly that sham antiques were to be found in their collections, and that the fate of the amateurs of old Rome who bought spurious Greek gems befell their representatives in Florence and the Eternal City. The manufacture of "curios" took the place of that fabrication of saints' relics which distinguished the Middle Ages. But while Mr. Bradley has failed to show cause on behalf of the erudite and elegant Cardinal of Mantua, and to say all that might have been recorded of that learned man, he has, quite unnecessarily, dealt with the life of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, as a warrior, statesman, husband, brother, and prince. Surely it would have sufficed to say what were the "Good Duke's" relationships with art and artists, as a collector of illuminations, books, and MSS. As it is, Mr. Bradley has omitted to tell us when the Regent and Protector was born and died.

Of Hugo van der Goes, one of the most interesting figures of his class and age, especially worthy of a place here, there is only half as much as we already know, and, although the capital work of M. Wauters, 'Hugues v. d. Goes, sa Vie et ses Œuvres,' is referred to as an authority, we hear nothing of Van Mander, who, whether he was entirely trustworthy or not, remains the source of much of our knowledge of this greatly discussed artist. Mr. Bradley has, no doubt, authority for stating that many MSS. contain miniatures so like his work that, but for the want of documentary proof, "they might be attributed to him." But what is most lacking is means for deciding what, at least in miniature painting, "his work" was like. Mr. Bradley says that Hugo "afterwards went melancholy, or insane." It appears that he suffered melancholy mania of a religious kind and in 1482 died in the Red Cloister, near Soignes. About Lievine Teerlinck, who in 1547 had a salary of 40*l.* a year from the English Crown, and exchanged gifts with Queen Elizabeth, Mr. Bradley ought to have given a better authority than Miss Clayton's 'English Female Artists.' Most of the biographical details concerning Lievine are repeated in the notice of her father, Simon Bennynch the illuminator. Lievine herself is interesting to us because some of her works may survive under Holbein's name, and it may some day be possible to say what are hers and what belong to him. Mr. Bradley has not succeeded in tracing any of the former. She must have been distinguished in her way, or she would not have been mentioned so often or paid so well.

Another distinguished artist of whom Mr. Bradley has not much to tell us is Samuel Cooper. Under this illustrious name this book has ten lines, one of which sends the reader to Redgrave's 'Dictionary.' Surely Walpole, to say nothing of later writers, ought to have been referred to. As Albert Dürer painted more than one work which is quite as truly a miniature as most of those mentioned here, his name ought to have been included. More than twenty-two lines were due to that transcendent miniature-painter Hans Holbein the Younger. Although it is true that "Holbein literature is itself immense," something like an epitome might have been offered to the reader, who should not have been told that there is any "dispute" about the date of the death of this illustrious artist. Nicholas Hilliard, a great master in small, is most imperfectly dealt with in half a page. Virgil Solis really deserved more than twenty lines. On the other hand, Mr. Bradley is so very anxious that no one should confound "Gerard Horebout" with "Gerard David" that he warns the reader more than once against being in error on this point. There is a good notice of Scipione Cavaletti of Bologna, who is styled the "Master of Benvenuto Cellini"; but Mr. Bradley ought to have told us what Cellini said of this distinguished man. Francesco Bacchiacca, a miniaturist of the same period, 1520, is not mentioned at all, nor is the name of B. Spranger to be found. He is said to have painted miniatures as well as larger works. Jean Cousin has also escaped notice altogether.

Mr. Bradley does not profess to come down to a later date than the beginning of the last century. No doubt he had a right thus to limit researches which began with the "establishment of Christianity." Nevertheless, a dictionary of miniaturists is far from complete which does not include at least a notice of artists who worked in small before Christ, and, above all, of those admirable masters who became famous after 1700. Here and there we find, notwithstanding Mr. Bradley's limitations, names so late as the Singletons, of whom one was living in 1791. "Vespre, Victor," is mentioned as a miniaturist; the fact is this man, who exhibited in London from 1763 to 1769, and therefore had no business in this dictionary, was a painter on glass; the miniaturist was Francis Xavier Vespre (or Vispre). Mr. Bradley was misled in these matters by Redgrave, whom he quotes. We could have dispensed with an account of Anne de Beaujeu, who never drew a line, in favour of Mr. Beale and his "dear heart" Mary, whose doings he recorded with something like reverence, and whose works survive. Among the pictures of Simone Memmi enumerated here we have sought in vain for the lovely 'Christ before Joseph and Mary,' which belongs to the Liverpool Royal Institution, and was lately at the Academy. In so large a compilation confusing references are sure to occur. Thus, we looked for Anne de Beaujeu under "Anne," and were referred to "Bourbon"; "Bourbon" sent us to "Beaujeu, Anne de," where it is said she was the eldest daughter of Louis XI.; but under "Nemours, Jacques de," the lady is styled Jeanne de Beaujeu. The fact is that Anne of France took the name of Beaujeu from her marriage with Pierre II. of Bourbon, and was the only child of Louis XI. to be so styled. There was no Jeanne de Beaujeu. Although it is doubtful if he was a miniature painter, we desire more and later news of Giotto than Mr. Bradley has gathered from the sources he quotes, one of whom is the Abbate Lanzi! It is all very well to compliment Mr. Weale as a model of studious care, as Mr. Bradley does, but it would have been as well likewise to imitate that scholar's laborious qualities, which Mr. Bradley has not done when some of the greatest names in art were before him.

So much for the shortcomings of this large and difficult compilation. No small proportion of them is owing to the difficulties of a subject covering so wide a space of time and treating of multitudes of men and women, the bare names of many among whom are all we know about them. The usefulness of the book is due to its containing hundreds of names with at least indications of their approximate dates and of some of the drawings and writings they executed. Monkish calligraphers and illuminators of mediæval scriptoria in out-of-the-way monasteries have their place in these crowded pages, and references are supplied to at least some of the works of each, as well as criticisms of unequal technical value, descriptions, and other memoranda, to gather which must have been a matter of toil extending over many years. The sources of this mass of information lie far apart, in more than one language, and belong to diverse times. Dr. Julius Vogel's 'Nachweisungen,' although it promised much, required, when transcribed, to be practically rewritten and its materials to be tested. Even Halm, who had a great reputation, is not wholly to be trusted. In fact, it appears that not a few of the writers on the subject have looked on their duty as antiquaries in much the same way as Cunningham did when he constituted himself a biographer of artists—that is, they took much information on trust because it was picturesque and did not challenge the accuracy of what they heard or read. As with the author of the 'Lives of Painters, Sculptors, and Architects,' so writers on miniature art often omitted matter which was of value, and accepted anything which supported their preconceived ideas of men and works of art. On the other hand, Mr. Bradley has not only laid under contribution such writers as Nagler, Zani, D'Agincourt, Silvestre, Cahier, Woltmann, Raczyński, and Bermudez, but the British Museum catalogues, the catalogues of collectors' sales, L'Art, the Gazette des Beaux-Arts, Le Belfroi, the accounts of choir-books and missals which are scattered in all sorts of out-of-the-way volumes, and similar sources of information have been ransacked and their names given with each entry which is indebted to one or more of them for its materials. A copious bibliography of the subject would have added greatly to the value of his dictionary.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION.
(Fourth Notice.—The Tenierses and the Reynoldses.)

THIS exhibition contains four Tenierses, all of small dimensions and in excellent condition. The Duke of Wellington's Merry-making (No. 109) is curious, and to a certain extent admirable. It contains, on a panel less than 8 inches in its larger measurement, a complex design, involving some thirty figures, and many incidents depicted with wonderful spirit. Although none of the figures is more than 1½ in. high, each of them is crisp and firm in touch, as bright and clear in colour, and as perfect in proportion, as in the pictures with the same subject at Buckingham Palace and at the Hermitage, St. Petersburg. The same incidents and, to a certain extent, the same figures, occur in this version as in the larger works. The five men gossiping on our left are worthy of the master's best time in design, and have seldom been surpassed even by him in the exhaustive research with which they are painted, and the spontaneity of their attitudes, with which their faces agree in a truly wonderful manner. The whole company seems in motion, and there is not a figure without a motive; each is full of life, and unconscious of itself. This extraordinary feat of design is dated 1655, when David Teniers II. was nearly forty-five years of age, and its every point attests that, notwithstanding the prodigious industry which had enabled him to produce so great a number of paintings as history awards to him, his sight was uninjured, and his touch (and therefore his nervous power) had not suffered in the least. We need not credit the reckoning of Smith in his 'Catalogue Raisonné' that David Teniers II. painted nearly nine hundred pictures; yet the sum of his labours is, after all deductions have been made, quite unique. This work was sold with the collection of M. Randon de Boisset (renowned for its Tenierses) in 1777 for 80*l.*, with that of M. Destouches in 1794 for an unrecorded price; three years later M. Wautier, of Brussels, sold it for 160*l.*; M. Solimène sold it in 1812 for 100*l.*, and M. Lapeyrière sold it to M. Bonnemaison in 1817 for 22*l.* It is Smith's 199, and named by him 'A Village Wedding at a Country Alehouse,' and described as on copper. The great Duke of Wellington lent it as No. 28, 'A Village Feast,' to the British Institution in 1818, when he had only just bought it. The present Duke lent it to the Academy in 1886.

The Queen's Teniers called Woman peeling Turnips (103) is a brilliantly-painted view of a large kitchen. A later work than No. 109, it shows that long practice rendered the master's workmanship a little mechanical and more dexterous than spontaneous and sincere; his surfaces were growing metallic and laboured, and his colour and chiaroscuro had already become spotty and a little stony; there is more chic than we like in the execution of the wall and its timbers behind the barrow. Probably no small part of the stoniness of the surface, if not also its metallic character, is due to over-varnishing. But be these things as they may, only Maes could have produced a better figure than the old woman resting her elbows on her knees as she works, while who but Teniers and Ostade could with such exquisite precision depict the earthenware pot on the floor in front? The fruit and vegetables are by Snayers. Smith's 497, and Supp. 128, it was in the Holderness Collection, sold therefrom in 1802 for 310 guineas; it then belonged to M. Dutartre, of Paris, and was sold in 1804 for 120*l.*; next in the Baring Collection, from which the Regent bought it before he lent it to the British Institution in 1826 and 1827. It was here in 1876, and, on the whole, hardly deserves the high praise bestowed upon it by Waagen and Mrs. Jameson. Lord Ashburton's Seven Acts of Mercy (100) is a famous Teniers II., and the traces of his father's influence prove that it is a comparatively early work, although later than No. 84. It is warmer, fuller of tone and colour; it has less impasto, and the execution is thinner, if not weaker, and by no means wholly free from that greenness that distinguishes the early Tenierses. Smith and Waagen said it is on copper, and one of the five known pictures by the artist of a subject which evidently attracted him, although it puzzles one to say why. Smith assumed that it is the original, or rather the first to be painted, and that it was so much admired that amateurs asked for replicas, and that to accommodate them Teniers produced the various versions of the same motive, all of which resemble this, while none equals it. One of them is in the Louvre, and inferior, we think, to No. 100, which belonged to the Duc de Choiseul and Lord Gwydir, and was engraved with the former's gallery of pictures. The seven acts are relieving in various ways persons in distress, and burying the dead. It was originally painted for the Duke of Alva, and afterwards hung in the great Teniers gallery at Madrid. Smith's No. 1, he said it belonged to the Le Brun Gallery, when it was etched, and was sold in 1809 for 434*l.*; again, with the whole of Talleyrand's collection, in 1817 to Buchanan for 500*l.*; it then passed for 800 guineas to Mr. Gray, who sold it to Mr. A. Baring.

Another Teniers, the well-known Village Dance (84), belongs to Lord Ashburton, and comes from Bath House. It is unusually light in tone and bright in effect, enriched with many animated figures, who are watching two men and two women vigorously dancing in the Dutch boor fashion to the music of a bagpiper standing on a tub in the middle of the crowd. The work—remarkable for silveriness without the chilly character that injures earlier examples—is admirable throughout, and deserves the praises connoisseurs have bestowed upon it. Smith's 445, it was sold with the Hart Davis Collection in 1814 for 300 guineas, the price indicating that Tenierses of the silvery class were then, as now, preferred to others. It belonged to G. Watson Taylor, and was sold to Mr. A. Baring in 1823 for 395 guineas. In 1818 Mr. Taylor lent it to the British Institution.

The Larder (87) of Paul de Vos is interesting as showing the technique of the painter. Has it not been over-varnished after cleaning? The handling of the painter, his peculiar manner of representing fur and hides, is due to his master Snyder, who learned it from Rubens. The touch is heavy in many parts. The Land-scape with Cattle (88), which Mr. M. H. Colnaghi lends as a Paul Potter, has puzzled many collectors, who, although it is signed and dated 1657, refuse to accept it with that artist's name. Critics know that Potter almost always signed and dated his pictures. We do not find this work in the catalogues of Smith and Van Westreene, and its heavy and coarse execution, its blackness, the opaque distance and the sky, the slurred foreground, and the dullness of the animals' hides, to say nothing of the questionable colours and textures of the same, undoubtedly tell against the genuineness of an interesting, if not beautiful picture. On the other hand, we dare not positively assert that Potter had nothing whatever to do with it.

Twelve Sir Joshuas in one exhibition should attract the public, especially when a considerable proportion of them are very fine works. In condition, subject, and history the Portrait of Mrs. Payne-Gallwey (1) vies with the best; indeed few Reynoldses unite more points of interest than this unfinished bust of a young and beautiful lady in profile to our left, which reveals to painters the great President's method of working, his mode of draughtsmanship with pure carnations, that (wonderful for a Reynolds) have stood unchanged more than a hundred years, a frank, firm, and yet soft touch, delicious colours, and an animated expression. In it we see the results of one sitting of not more than two hours. The master has drawn the outline, painted the head as we see it, and, after rubbing some umbery pigment on the canvas to relieve the flesh, fortunately for us, put it aside for ever. It would have been well for the popular 'Strawberry Girl,' which stood on Reynolds's easel with this charming sketch, if he had used the same materials for both. Although the lady may have looked a little older in 1778 (she was then twenty) than Reynolds has made her, there is little doubt that this head was painted in the latter year, and as a preliminary study for the famous 'Fig-a-back' (in which, as our readers will remember, she is represented racing through a park with her child on her back), exhibited in this room in 1886. This sketch has never been exhibited before. It may profitably be compared in technical respects with Gainsborough's life-size, whole-length sketch of another beauty, the unfortunately named 'Housemaid, Portrait of Mrs. Graham' (3), which we shall notice on another occasion. The pocket-book for 1778, in which Reynolds entered the names of his sitters, is missing, and Mrs. Payne-Gallwey does not appear in that of 1777. According to Cotton, who is not, however, to be trusted for details, Reynolds wrote in his account-book, "Feb., 1778, Mr. Galloway, 18l. 7s. 6d." This may be taken to be the price of the work before us, as lower down in the book occurs, "Dec., 1779, Mrs. Paine Galloway and Child, 70l." The latter sum is quite as much as Sir Joshua would charge for 'Pig-a-back.'

Sir Joshua's William Stirling (17) has, unless as a 'Portrait of a Gentleman,' not been exhibited before. Miss Fanny Kemble, afterwards Mrs. Twiss (49), is more important. She was Mrs. Siddons's sister, and many thought her more attractive than the formidable personage whom Mr. Siddons had the courage to marry. Miss Fanny's more gentle charms are manifest in this capital half-length in a white dress, blue ribbons, and powdered hair, which was painted in 1783, and was at Somerset House in 1784 as 183, 'Portrait of a Lady,' with "189, Mrs. Siddons, whole-length (as the 'Tragic Muse')," 'A Nymph and Cupid' (Miss Wilson, a beautiful model), and thirteen other pictures, sixteen in all! Somebody who was touched by the charming picture of a woman "paid a poetic tribute," according to Northcote, to Sir Joshua by asserting that, however art might go astray,

In Kemble's look chaste'd will yet be seen
What one bright daughter of the stage has been;
Reserv'd, though mingling with the loud, the vain,
And unseduc'd where Syren pleasures reign.

Should Time, whose force our hopes in vain withstand,
Blast the nymph's face, and shake the painter's hand;
Yet may these tints divide the fame they give,
And art and beauty bid each other live.

A duplicate of this portrait was the property of the late Col. Clifford, and was sold to Messrs. Agnew in 1870 for 231l. It is probably the picture which "Mr. Reynolds" lent to the British Institution in 1823. No. 49 was at the Grosvenor Gallery in 1884, and in 1784 engraved by J. Jones.

Mr. Morritt's well-known picture Hope nursing Love (155) was painted in 1769, and was No. 92 at the Academy exhibition of that year, the first of the series mentioned below. The other pictures Reynolds sent were the 'Duchess of Manchester as Diana disarming Love,' 'Mrs. Blake as Juno receiving the Cestus from Venus,' and 'Portraits of Two Ladies' (Mrs. Bouverie and Mrs. Carew), with that motto "Et in Arcadia ego" which exercised so many wits. For 'Hope nursing Love' Miss Morris sat to Reynolds in January, 1768. It was engraved by E. Fisher and sold at "The Golden Head in Leicester Square," i.e., Mrs. Hogarth's, in 1770. It was engraved again by Bartolozzi in 1784. In the picture the pulps of the flesh and the beautiful modelling of the bust and face, the graceful attitudes and sweet expressions are worthy of note. The brilliancy of the whole remains, although the loss of some rosy hues has disturbed the harmony of the tone and colour. When Walpole saw it in the Academy, 1769, he wrote in his catalogue "Pretty—her head taken from Correggio's Leda." The design was repeated by Reynolds at least thrice. That before us became the property of the Marchioness of Thomond, and is described in Mr. Christie's sale catalogue of her pictures, May 19th, 1821, the second day, as "Lot 19," and the admired original picture. It fell to Mr. J. B. S. Morritt for 220 guineas; he lent it as No. 35 to the British Institution in 1823. The Earl of Upper Ossory lent a version to the same gallery in 1813; in 1817 another, the property of Mr. R. P. Carew, was No. 138 in the same place; the Earl of St. Germans lent one to the Academy in 1876, and Lord Lansdowne lent another in 1884. Northcote's list of his master's pictures says that Mr. Henry Hope paid Reynolds 150l. for one (it was sold in 1816 for 168l.); that Lord Holland had one, which J. R. Smith engraved in 1777, and that Lady Thomond had another (see above), which Fisher engraved in 1771. The marchioness had the sketch for this picture, which, with that of her uncle's 'Snake in the Grass,' was sold on the 25th of May, 1821. Miss Morris's hapless story is told in the catalogue before us, and is well known. It is not so well known that to her younger sister the last words of Dr. Johnson were addressed, when she called upon him just before he "turned his face to the wall," and, replying to her inquiries, he added, "God bless you, my dear!" Four days after the Academy opened, April 26th, 1769, the fair model of "Hope" was dead.

The Viscountess St. Asaph and Child (158) is another famous Reynolds, and is very beautiful indeed. The figures are more than half life size. The picture has retained its brilliancy and the carnations have faded but little, although we may be sure that some rosin has gone from them, the curtain behind the group being too red for Reynolds's exquisite sense of harmony in tone and colour to have permitted it to appear in its present relationship. The design has lost none of its charm, and every one will admire the lovely face of the lady, whose brilliant complexion has been a little flushed by romping with the boy, while he has roughened her hair and disarranged her dress. The picture was painted in 1786-7, when Reynolds's taste frequently inclined to combinations of fair carnations with pure white, accompanied, as in this case, by bright illumination, rich dark verdure, and strong red. Lady St. Asaph and Master Ashburnham (afterwards first Earl of Ashburnham) sat to Sir Joshua in May, 1786, and the picture was exhibited in May, 1787, with 'Lord Burghersh chasing a Butterfly,' 'Master Yorke and his Dog and Bird,' 'Miss Ward and her Dog,' the delightful 'Cherub Heads,' now in the National Gallery, and other works. The whole-length of the Prince of Wales, the group before us, which was No. 100, the heads of Boswell and Sir Henry Englefield, the fine 'Lady Smyth and her Children,' and the 'Cherub Heads,' all Reynoldses, with Opie's 'Rizzio,' now in the Diploma Room at Burlington Gardens, and Northcote's 'Wat Tyler,' are recognizable in Ramberg's picture of the private view of 1787 in the Great Room at Somerset House. On June 24th, 1788, Reynolds was paid 157l. 10s. for No. 158, which has not been exhibited since it was at the British Institution in 1813. It was engraved by J. Grozer in 1792, and the plate destroyed after a few impressions were taken; afterwards it was engraved by S. W. Reynolds. Why does not some one engrave it again?

Puck (162) is one of the best of Reynolds's grotesques, franker, freer, and more spontaneous than some much more ambitious attempts of his in the same line. It was painted in 1789, and exhibited at the Academy in that year as 'Robin Goodfellow,' and described by Walpole on the margin of his catalogue as "an ugly little imp, but some character, sitting on a mushroom as big as a millstone." It appears that Reynolds had painted the urchin, whom he found sitting on his doorstep in Leicester Fields, and had not quite made up his mind what to do with the picture. Alderman Boydell, whose edition of Shakspeare was then on the stocks, called on Sir Joshua with Nichols, and, taking a fancy to the thing, wished it could be brought into the great publication. Nichols said, "If Sir Joshua will kindly place him on a mushroom, give him a fawn's ears, and make a Puck of him," it would do. So it was done. Boydell gave the President a hundred guineas for it, and had it engraved by Schiavonetti, 1799; C. Heath engraved it, and Testalini, with Schiavonetti, engraved a third plate. At Boydell's lottery this and other pictures passed to Tassie, the modeller, and it was sold by auction to Samuel Rogers for 215l. 5s., which he, naturally enough, called "a comparatively trifling price." "I walked home from the sale, a man carrying 'Puck' before me; and so well was the picture known, that more than one person, as they passed us in the street, called out, 'There it is!'" At Rogers's sale, in 1856, Earl Fitzwilliam gave 980 guineas for it. Rogers lent it to the British Institution in 1813, 1823, 1843, 1854, and 1856; Earl Fitzwilliam lent it to the Art-Treasures at Manchester in 1857; the Hon. G. Fitzwilliam sent it to the British Institution in 1860; since then it has not been seen till now. It seems to be in an excellent condition, although Sir Joshua's mode of painting at the time he produced it was anything but safe. Is it to be taken for granted that it has not been restored?

The Portrait of the Fifth Earl of Carlisle (119) as a boy, in a pseudo-Van Dyck dress, is in the style Reynolds followed in 1761, when it was painted. Its youthful grace, ingenuous and English face, pure and healthy look, and earnest eyes make it attractive. The dog—the "poor Rover" who was buried in the garden at Paris—was a favourite of the lad, but Sir Joshua painted it as if it were made of wood. The picture has faded and lost brilliancy, but, like most Reynoldses of the period, it is still harmonious. The boy grew up to be the genial and elegant scapegrace we so often meet in company with Walpole and George Selwyn. He it was who bought a large part of the Orleans Gallery, and formed that fine collection of pictures of which the public, through his living representative's kindness, has of late years had the benefit. The picture was painted in 1761-2, as the catalogue says, when the boy was only fifteen; it is a later portrait in Garter robes that Reynolds painted in 1767. On this and other pictures now here, e.g., The Countess of Carlisle (122), see "The Private Collections of England" (Castle Howard), No. XXIX. J. Spilsbury engraved No. 119 in 1761. This picture has not been exhibited before. The 'Earl of Carlisle,' which was at the British Institution in 1813, was a smaller picture; with it was the beautiful oval by Reynolds of Earl George, when Lord Morpeth, son of the fifth earl, of which Trotter made a charming print. The fifth earl lived to be one of the pall-bearers at Reynolds's funeral. One of his companions in that ceremony was the subject of the next portrait, George, First Marquis Townshend (120), who had the good luck to command after Wolfe was slain and to accept the surrender of Quebec. To many people he is more interesting as a satirical draughtsman who ridiculed the Duke of Cumberland than as a field marshal—see 'Walpole to Montagu,' August 28th, 1756, and 'George II.,' ii. 68; see likewise the 'Catalogue of Satirical Prints in the British Museum,' Nos. 3342, 3847, and 3581. The vigorous and genial look, the frank air and sarcastic smile render the man to the life. The face, indeed, is superbly painted, but the armour, robes, and what not are but leather and prunella, hardly worthy of Northcote, much less of Peter Toms. The picture was painted in May, 1779; exhibited at the British Institution in 1813 and 1862, and at the National Portrait Exhibition in 1867. Mr. Beauchamp Gwatkin lent another, a half-length, to the Grosvenor Gallery in 1884.

KIRKSTALL ABBEY.

THE Corporation of Leeds, who are now the owners of Kirkstall Abbey, seem likely to take good care of it. Something was done for the protection of the ruins by the advice of the Yorkshire Archeological and Topographical Association soon after the property was acquired, and lately the Corporation have applied to the Society of Antiquaries of London to send their assistant secretary, Mr. St. John Hope, whose work at Fountains and at Easby has made him well known in Yorkshire, to visit and report on the abbey. Mr. Hope has accordingly been to Kirkstall, and we have reason to believe that the authorities who have sought the best advice will not fail to act upon it. The buildings at Kirkstall are amongst the most interesting in England. Though on a smaller scale, they rank next after those of Fountains in completeness. A hundred years ago the church was complete all but the roof, but since then neglect and destructive agents, which are more active in such a neighbourhood than in the purer air of the country, have done much harm, and, unless measures are taken to protect it, will soon do much more. The walls and vaults must be cleared of trees and ivy and protected from the wet, and here and there some underpinning or shoring up is wanted. The most difficult question is, What should be done with the tower? Some years ago one of the four pillars which carried it gave way, and brought down two of its sides and a good deal of the adjoining part of the church. Two sides of the tower still stand, and attached to them are parts of the fallen sides, hanging on in a way that says much for the excellence of the masonry, but it must at last fail, and there will be another serious fall unless something is done to prevent it. As a rule a ruined building should be protected from further harm, but kept as much as possible in the condition in which it has come down to us. But in this case it is worth considering whether the fallen part of the tower, the fragments of which lie as they fell, might not be built up again, as the best way of preserving the part which has not fallen.

SALE.

At the Hôtel Drouot, on January 30th, the following works of Jules Dupré were sold: La Rentrée à la Ferme, 20,000 fr.; Les Trois Arbres, 8,000 fr.; Bords de la Rivière, le Soir, 10,400 fr.; and Sous Bois, Forêt de l'Île-Adam, 10,100 fr. On the same occasion other painters' works belonging to Dupré realized good prices; thus Corot, Le Concert, 40,000 fr. (bought by the Duc d'Aumale), and Crépuscule, 8,100 fr.; Géricault, Portrait de Jamar, 6,000 fr.; besides smaller sums for pictures by Courbet, T. Rousseau, Daumier, Decamps, and Troyon.

Fine-Art Society.

THE Earl of Carnarvon, ex-President of the Society of Antiquaries, has accepted the position of President of the British Archaeological Association for the present year, and of the forty-seventh annual congress of this well-known society. The meeting is to be held at Oxford during the month of July next. Lord Carnarvon, by the way, is Lord High Steward of the University. The Mayor and Corporation of the city have already promised to do all in their power to combine with the University in making this year's congress of the Association a success. To Mr. George R. Wright, F.S.A., the hon. congress secretary of the Association, all applications should be made for further information connected with this congress.

MESSRS. A. TOOTH & SONS appoint to-day (Saturday) for a private view of Mr. C. E. Johnson's pictures of Highland sports. The public will be admitted on Monday.

MESSRS. BOUSSOD, VALADON & Co. have on view at the Goupil Gallery Troyon's masterpiece, 'La Vallée de la Touque.'

THE Graphic Society has appointed the 12th inst. for a special evening meeting, when an important collection of the works of Mr. T. Faed and Mr. H. Moore will be shown to visitors at University College, Gower Street.

MESSRS. BELL & SONS have in preparation a new edition of 'Puckle's Club' from the original wood engravings, which are in their possession. The edition will be printed at the Chiswick Press, and will be limited in number.

At Messrs. Johnstone, Norman & Co.'s, 67, New Bond Street, may be seen for a short time a large stained-glass window, very sumptuously coloured, which Mr. John La Farge, of New York, has designed and executed for a church of that city. By the help of four figures rather more than life size it represents the sealing of the Elect, according to Revelation. In the foreground stands the angel addressing one of the elect placed at his side, while above, and a little within the picture-plane, are two other appropriate figures. All the figures are attired in ample robes, the disposition of which, as draperies, is expressive, if not particularly severe and impressive. It is to be regretted that these robes are not more strictly architectonic—a change that would befit the function of the window and its purely decorative purpose—because, good and suitable as the general design undoubtedly is, it lacks that repose and simplicity which belong to monumental art, and this unsuitability is rendered more emphatic by the fact that the treatment of the light and shade, the forms, and even the coloration are strictly realistic, the modelling is elaborate, the shadows are strong and highly finished, and the solidity of the life is imparted to objects which are seen, as in a transparency, by transmitted light, whereas in nature they are displayed by reflected light. You cannot see through a human figure or its drapery, a stone or a piece of architecture, therefore to represent such things transparently, and yet with the shadows of solid substances, is as false to nature as it is illogical in art, and inconsistent with the conditions of stained glass. This thoroughgoing violation of one of the rudimentary canons of design is the more to be deplored because Mr. La Farge's taste for colour, and the glass he has employed for this work, are gorgeous and strong in the extreme, equalling in these respects the most splendid ancient specimens. If the artist will but conform to the laws of the art he practises with so much vigour, the nature of the glass he employs promises magnificent decorations and colouring intensified to a pitch as powerful as it is beautiful.

FIVE scholars are to be elected next July on the foundation formed by the Charity Commissioners through appropriating the remaining funds of the defunct British Institution: two in painting, one in sculpture, one in architecture, and one in engraving. Each scholarship will be of the value of 50*l.*, and tenable for two years. The limits of age are seventeen and twenty-three.

THE death is announced of Mr. John Fisher, Keeper of the Taylor Gallery at Oxford.

MR. PENNELL writes on the 1st inst.:—

"After Mr. Blackburn had emphatically denied my statement that the fashion of illustrating catalogues with reproductions of the artists' own sketches originated in France, in his first letter, I scarcely thought he would have taken the trouble, as he does in your issue of to-day, to prove the truth of my original assertion by quoting names and dates. There was no necessity of his going back to 1864; in 1869 'Le Salon de 1869 Album Boetzel' was published, and one finds in it this announcement, 'Dessins exécutés par les artistes eux-mêmes,' while the 'Handbook to the National Gallery,' by Sir Henry Cole (Bell & Son, 1843), was not illustrated by the artists themselves, but 'with reminiscences of the most celebrated pictures, drawn from the originals by John James and William Linnell'; therefore this does not affect my original statement in the least. As Mr. Blackburn is so desirous that the readers of the Athenæum should be possessed of the correct facts, it is rather a pity that he was misled himself, and consequently would have misled them. I should, however, have mentioned the reproductions in the Gazette des Beaux-Arts in this connexion. Even though I was not 'on the scene when the pioneers of the new methods of reproducing pen drawings were experimenting,' the results of their experiments are to be found in the museums and libraries of London, Paris, and New York, and there have I sought them."

M. PAUL ALEXANDRE PROTAIS, whose death on the 27th ult. we briefly mentioned last week, was born in Paris in 1826, and, after spending ten years in the Bureaux des Postes, drawing passionately whenever he could get a spare minute, became a pupil of an artist named Desmoulins. He evinced an extraordinarily sympathetic feeling in illustrating military suffering, fatigue, glory, and valour. As we have often said of his pictures in past Salons, he generally told his stories in a delicate fashion that was often poetical in the highest degree. Thus a far-extending column of men marching in early dawn towards a battlefield seemed to rise out of the shadow of one valley, thread a woodland covering a ridge which the sun had barely gilded, and, moving all as one man, descend noiselessly into a valley of deeper gloom. The irresistible suggestions of the silence attending this progress were more impressive than the noisy furies of many a battlefield by second-rate designers. The cold, grey dawn, the very faintness of the shadows of the men upon the grass, the passing out of sight of the head of the column, the soldiers holding their weapons lest they should rattle, the muffled flags, and the serious faces of the officers whispering to their neighbours, united to heighten the picture's poetical motive. Broad, simple, innocent of efforts to be strong in colour or tone, Protai's works owe nothing to tricks of any kind, and their admirable technique is not thrust in our faces so as to disturb the impression the painter aimed at producing and attained with rare tact and modesty. His sense of fitness adjusted the sentiment of his landscape backgrounds and the aerial effects of his pictures to the motives of his designs. Others had done this before, but very few so finely and truly as Protai's. His best-known pictures are 'The Battle of Inkerman,' 'Taking a Battery,' 'The Last Thought,' 'An Evening March,' 'The Morning before the Attack,' its sequel 'The Evening after the Battle,' 1863, for which he received a medal, 'The End of the Halt,' 'Return to the Camp,' 'En Marche!' 'The Grand Halt,' 'Swiss Guards,' and 'A Wounded Soldier.' The 'pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war' are exactly the elements we never look for in Protai's works, but we find incidents of as true and serious a kind. A deft, accomplished, and spirited draughtsman, he exhibited no signs of labour in his most careful delineations, which lose nothing of spontaneity because every firm touch tells its tale. He was a Knight of the Legion of Honour.

M. FAYET, a French amateur of note, has bequeathed to the Louvre a hundred and thirty drawings in sepia by Tiepolo, and a sketch attributed to Michael Angelo as a study for a part of the 'Last Judgment.' To Cluny the same gentleman has given a large dish of Italian faience on which is painted a portrait of Raphael, and two cylindrical pots painted with figures of the school of Giovanni Bellini.

THE French architect Louis Jules André is dead. He was born in Paris, won the Prix de Rome in 1847, became a Knight of the Legion of Honour in 1867, an Officer in 1882, and a member of the Institute in 1884.

It is reported that the 'Cromwell' of Paul Delaroche, or that one of several which had been lent to the Exposition Universelle by the city of Nîmes, has reached home again in a much injured state. Dispatched by mistake from Paris to Aix, it was forwarded to Nîmes, and during the journeys rain penetrated the case. The Municipality claims damages from the railway company. It is to be repaired.

THE Italian journals announce the death of M. Antonio Salviati, aged seventy-four years, the well-known reviver of the manufacture of decorative glass and mosaics in that city.

At Cyme in Eubœa was found the other day a prehistoric tomb presenting novel features. Some peasants in making lime came, at a great depth of soil, upon an empty tomb, 2 mètres long and 70 centimètres wide. The bottom was formed of a double series of fire-baked bricks, and the four walls of bricks laid thin end upwards. Inside were found two lecythi with traces of black colouring.

MUSIC

Memorials of Frederick Arthur Gore Ouseley. By the Rev. Francis T. Havergal, D.D. (Ellis & Elvey).—This volume is not a biography of Sir Frederick Ouseley, but a compilation, consisting of remarks on his early life by his eldest sister, a number of obituary notices from various journals, some sketchy notes from musicians and others concerning his life and works, and a few notes on Tenbury College, which Ouseley munificently endowed and in which he took much interest to the day of his death. The book is, therefore, merely a collection of fragments which may be useful to a future biographer, should such appear. It may be doubted, however, whether an interesting volume could be written concerning the personal experiences of Ouseley, as his career was singularly placid and uneventful. Though in the world of music, he could scarcely be said to be of it, and this notwithstanding that he was an incessant worker. His duties at Oxford, at Tenbury, and at Hereford occupied nearly the whole of his time, and the residue was devoted to composition. We spoke at some length concerning Sir Frederick Ouseley as a musician and a composer, and also of his genial and lovable qualities as a man, only a few months ago (Athenæum, No. 3207), and the present volume does not necessitate any additional observations on these points. Perhaps the most interesting portion is that dealing with his childhood. Interest in and capacity for music were manifest from an almost incredibly early age. At three months he is said to have shown discrimination regarding the airs played by his sisters, and to have evinced a special fondness for the waltz in 'Der Freischütz.' Long before he could speak he repeated melodies he had heard, and always in the correct key. At the age of two he could distinguish between tonic and dominant harmony, and at three he hummed original airs in regular measure and rhythm. A little later he seems to have displayed intuitive ideas as to correct modulation, and showed a particular fondness for the chord of the augmented sixth. He could detect the prevailing note in ordinary noises, and one day he caused much amusement by exclaiming, "Only think, papa blows his nose in c!" If these and many other instances of the marvellous precocity of young Ouseley are not exaggerated—and on this point it is necessary to preserve freedom of judgment—it seems singular that in mature life he did not evince more originality as a composer. But Sir John Stainer asserted, in his lecture at the Musical Association recently, that Ouseley was of opinion that the art of music was in a state of decadence, the necessity, therefore, devolving upon composers of the present generation to adhere rigidly to the methods adopted by the masters of the period which ended with Mozart. We trace this conservatism in his music and in his predilection for Church composition, in which, of course, archaic forms may still be used with advantage. The volume contains an excellent photograph of Sir Frederick Ouseley, taken by Mr. T. Jones, of Ludlow.

Musical Gossip.

MR. FRANZ RUMMEL, a sound and capable though not striking executant, was the pianist at the Popular Concerts on last Saturday and Monday. On the former occasion he gave a rendering of Beethoven's 'Waldstein' Sonata, unexceptionable as regards technique, if not otherwise remarkable. Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat, Op. 87, and Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D, Op. 8, were the concerted works, and Miss Liza Lehmann was the vocalist. Her refined vocal method lent artistic interest to the old English and Irish songs which she introduced somewhat rashly in a classical programme.

On Monday the pianoforte solos were Schubert's Impromptu in A flat, Op. 90, No. 4, Chopin's Nocturne in D flat, and Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso. The Chopin piece was artistically rendered, and Mr. Rummel may also be commended for the moderate tempo he adopted in the Berceuse which he gave as an encore, as pianists frequently spoil this trifle by taking it too fast. Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, Op. 12, and Schumann's Trio in D minor, Op. 63, were the concerted works in this programme, and Madame Néruda played Vitali's Chaconne in G minor. A young American vocalist, bearing the name of Christine Nielson, succeeded in making a favourable impression in her second song, Rubinstein's 'Sehnsucht.' Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of sympathetic quality; but she will do well not to force her upper register.

THE Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts will be resumed to-day, when the novelty will be a concert overture, entitled 'To the Memory of a Hero,' by Mr. C. H. Coudery. Other works to be given for the first time at the succeeding concerts are a pianoforte concerto by J. Rosenhain, Mr. Edward German's Overture to 'Richard III.,' Mr. Hamish MacCunn's cantata 'Bonny Kilmeny,' Brahms's Double Concerto for violin and violoncello, a concert overture 'Im Frühling' by Goldmark, and Saint-Saëns's Piano Concerto in c minor, No. 4. Among the artists engaged we note the names of Herr Joachim, Madame Néruda, M. Ernest Gillet, Sir Charles Halle, Miss Fanny Davies, Madame Backer-Gröndahl, Mr. F. Lamond, and Herr Stavenhagen.

DR. HUBERT PARRY'S 'St. Cecilia's Day,' Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's 'Dream of Juba!' with Mr. Charles Fry as the reciter, were performed by the Highbury Philharmonic Society on Monday evening, under the direction of Mr. G. H. Betjemann. The rendering of the works was exceedingly creditable in all respects.

MADAME SARA PALMA, a soprano from Milan, who played the leading part in Signor Tito Mattei's comic opera 'La Prima Donna' at the Avenue Theatre recently, gave a concert at the Princes' Hall on Thursday last week. The artist's voice is of fairly good quality, except in the upper notes, which are rather hard and forced. A favourable impression was made by Señor Pietro Guetary, a Spanish tenor, in some tasteful and characteristic songs from his own pen; but with this exception the concert was without intrinsic musical interest.

MR. E. PROUT'S treatise on counterpoint is in the press. It will be found, we believe, that the author favours the retention of the old rules, with modifications the object of which will be to make them harmonize with modern ideas respecting tonality.

MR. DAN GODFREY, JUN., has been appointed conductor of the London Military Band, in place of Mr. Hill, who has accepted an engagement in America.

A SERENADE in E flat, by M. Saint-Saëns, was announced for the first time in the programme of Sir Charles Halle's Manchester concert on Thursday evening, other items being Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, and the overtures 'Im Hochland,' by Gade, and 'Hans Heiling,' by Marschner.

At the International Exhibition to be held in Edinburgh this year Mr. Robert Marr, author of 'Music for the People,' will develop what was a novel feature in the Glasgow Exhibition of 1888. Added to the daily programme of music there will be notices of the performers and general information on musical matters, practical and historical, constituting a small daily musical newspaper.

It is not generally known that the principal part in M. Ambroise Thomas's 'Hamlet' was originally written for tenor voice, and was revised for baritone in order that it might be sustained by M. Faure. The original version is about to be tried at Monte Carlo, with M. Dereims as Hamlet.

AFTER a period of neglect Meyerbeer's 'Les Huguenots' has been revived at the Berlin Opera with considerable alterations, various portions of the score being restored, while the ridiculous chorus of bathers has been suppressed, the object of the revision being to accentuate the dramatic significance of the work and to reduce as far as possible the incongruities which have always hindered its full acceptance by thoughtful musicians.

A SITE has at last been found for the monument of Weber at Eutin, the birthplace of the composer. It is to be erected in an open space called the Eichenheim, situated at a little distance from the town, and the fêtes in connexion with the inauguration will take place on June 30th and July 1st next.

A NIECE of Franz Schubert died on the 28th of January at Steyr, in Upper Austria, at the age of seventy-four. She was a great favourite of the composer, who used to make her sing, by way of trial, any songs he had composed for soprano. She was married to Prof. Stuppöck, of Steyr, where she led a quiet and retired life.

HERR MAX BRUCH has resigned his position as Kapellmeister at Breslau, which he has held since 1883. The financial difficulties of the Orchesterverein have compelled him to take this course.

ONE of Michael Haydn's symphonies was recently revived at Dresden, and produced a highly favourable impression.

THE music of a new ballet called 'The Sleeping Beauty,' by Tchaikowsky, produced at St. Petersburg, is spoken of in the highest terms. The third and fifth acts are said to be specially original.

AN interesting historical, or rather antiquarian, concert has just been given in St. Petersburg. The programme included a Requiem of Anerio, Litanies from 'La Musica Divina' by Proska, and selections from Monteverde's 'Orfeo.'

THE Brazilian composer Carlos Gomez has lately written three new operas, named respectively 'Le Schiavo,' 'Il Cavaliero Bizzarro,' and 'La Sirena.' Gomez is only known in this country by his opera 'Il Guarany,' which secured some measure of acceptance at Covent Garden.

THE WEEK.

AVENUE.—'Dr. Bill,' a Farical Comedy in Three Acts. From the French of Albert Carré by Hamilton Auld. 'Fool's Mate,' a Comedy in One Act. By F. W. Broughton.

OPÉRA COMIQUE.—'A Noble Brother,' a "Comedy-Drama" in Four Acts. By W. J. Summers.

MR. AIDÉ's new farcical comedy is a good specimen of adaptation. 'Le Docteur Jojo,' on which it is based, is a three-act vaudeville of M. Albert Carré, the associate of M. Raymond Deslandes in the conduct of the Vaudeville, and ran for something near a hundred nights at the Théâtre de Cluny in 1888. It is, like most pieces of its class, artificial in construction, and calls for some exercise of credulity. It is sparkling, however, and in the original very saucy. Some difficulty must, indeed, have been experienced in getting rid of the sauciness. The most mirthful scene of the original consisted in the surprisal by a jealous husband of a wife, and it is so lightly suggested by the actors now charged with the piece, that indeed it was not understood by the public. Fortunately the play was comic enough without it. There is too much use of dark chambers and the like, and the second act, after the fashion of the last of the 'Barber of Seville,' is a veritable series of surprises. The main idea of the piece is, however, comic—that of an old gentleman compelling his son-in-law, who is a penitent and reformed rake, to resume his work as a doctor, in ignorance of the fact that in so doing he is undermining his daughter's domestic peace. The profession in which Dr. William Brown, otherwise Joséphin Richard, has found "fortune and liberty" has been that of the medical attendant of ladies of dubious repute. When, accordingly, out of fear lest idleness should breed mischief, Firman, or Courtelin, screws on his son-in-law's door a brass plate announcing consultations from one till three, he subjects the reformed libertine to a renewal of the temptations from which he had fled. The pleasant days in which he won the endearing appellation of Dr. Bill come back again, and his virtue all but succumbs. In the end, however, the meddlesome relative is sent back to the country, and after a short ebullition peace is restored. Miss Fanny Brough played in this piece with wonderful vivacity and talent as Mrs. Horton, a character originally taken by Mlle. Aciana. Her performance had, indeed, a comic intensity rare on the stage. Mr. Frederick Terry made a successful appearance in farcical comedy, and Miss Marie Linden and Messrs. Webster and Chevalier were included in a good cast. The farce was received with uproarious laughter.

'Fool's Mate,' by Mr. F. W. Broughton, shows the manner in which the designs of a wicked nobleman are thwarted by a young child, who sees that the stake is her father's happiness and contrives to win the documents by which it is compromised. It is prettily conceived, but too elaborately set, and shows Mr. F. Terry and Mr. Nutcombe Gould to advantage in seventeenth century costumes.

Mr. Summers, who made in his own play his first appearance before a London public, possesses a distinct gift of comedy. This he shows to advantage in the character of a drunken and disreputable tramp, who, after bearing for seventeen years the burden of a brother's crime, escapes from gaol, abandons himself to drink, and at the close of the action by a deed of self-sacrifice rehabilitates himself with the world. His performance is interesting and praiseworthy. Unhappily, however, his pathos is hard and ineffective, and the stronger scenes stimulate less than the more mirthful. The play itself is a commonplace melodrama that reaches one or two fairly conventional effects. The character of the tramp, however, dwarfs all others, there is a total lack of artistic balance, and the whole claims little consideration. Some of the speeches put into the mouths of the secondary characters are whimsical in crudeness, and elicited laughter not wholly creditable to the author. The frank way, for instance, in which the villain declares his intention to beguile the hero into forgery is decidedly diverting. Miss Ellen Boucher, Mr. Charles Weir, and Mr. E. Rochelle are included in the cast.

A Memoir of E. A. Sothorn. By T. Edgar Pemberton. (Bentley & Son.)—Sothorn, like Mr. Joseph Jefferson, his distinguished associate in 'Our American Cousin,' is practically, so far as the English playgoer is concerned, a one-part actor. His Dundreary, on which during the portion of his life subsequent to its production he never ceased to lavish his attention, will live so far as any performance can live when the original type has disappeared. On other parts he stamped no striking individuality, and his success in them might almost be said to have been in proportion as they approached his one great creation. To this name Dundreary is entitled. Tom Taylor supplied a mere outline, which Sothorn filled in at his pleasure. A certain amount of success attended the actor's appearance in less extravagant parts, and he was anxious to risk a really serious representation. When the critical moment arrived, however, he shrank from the experiment. For the following characteristic fact we can vouch. From an eminent dramatist he purchased a play of serious interest, the principal character in which he was anxious to present. He kept it for the period (seven years) over which his rights extended, and then repurchased it rather than allow it to go into other hands. It was never acted. Mr. Pemberton has supplied a sketch of Sothorn's theatrical career which, slight as it is, is ample. His volume is made up of practical jokes, in which Sothorn took a strange and almost childish delight. He would for days lay the foundations of jokes, and go to indescribable pains to assure their success. Such a reputation as a farceur did he obtain that when he went in company with an English duke to America, his introduction of his companion failed to inspire belief. Very readable are many of the stories Mr. Pemberton recapitulates, though some of them have been told elsewhere in a different fashion. A pleasant companion, a bold rider, and an intelligent man, Sothorn made a mark in society almost as conspicuous as that on the stage. His premature death arrested a career which was bright, but had reached its climax.

GEORGE PEELE, SIR HENRY LEE, AND THE THIRD EARL OF CUMBERLAND.

A POINT of some literary and antiquarian interest is raised by one of the exhibits in the Tudor Exhibition at the New Gallery in Regent Street. It is a magnificent suit of armour, the property of Lord Hothfield, No. 577 in the Catalogue, in which it is described as having probably been worn by George Clifford, third Earl of Cumberland, at his taking over from Sir Henry Lee the office of Champion of Queen Elizabeth, November 17th, 1590. That the armour was Cumberland's there can be no doubt; proof is afforded by two portraits of the earl clad in this identical suit in this same exhibition, Nos. 446 and 1112 in Catalogue; but was it his originally? I incline to believe that it was the suit worn by Sir Henry Lee on this his last appearance as the queen's knight, and in which, after the tournament, he armed and presented to the queen the earl his successor.

George Peele the dramatist, in his 'Polyhymnia,' 1590, thus describes the accoutrements of Lee and Cumberland, the first couple in the tournament:—

In corset gilt of curious workmanship,
Sir Henry Lee, redoubtéd man-at-arms,
Leads in the troops: whom worthy Cumberland,
Thrice-noble earl, accoutred as became
So great a warrior and so good a knight,
Encounter'd first, y-clad in coat of steel,
And plumes and pendants all as white as swan.

Peele insists on this description of Cumberland's accoutrements further on in giving an account of the third couple:—

Next, in the virgin's colours, as before Ran Cumberland, comes lovely Compton in;

His courser trapp'd in white, and plumes and staves
Of snowy hue,
His armour glittering like the moon's bright rays,
Or that clear silver path, the milk-white way,
That in Olympus leads to Jove's high court.

At the end of the poem Peele tells how Sir Henry,

Having unarm'd his body, head and all,
presents the earl to the queen,
And to him gives his armour and his lance.

I have taken these extracts from Dyce's edition of Peele's works; he, followed by Peele's more recent editor, Mr. A. H. Bullen, prefaces the 'Polyhymnia' with a long account, from Segar's 'Honor, Military and Civil,' 1602, of this same tournament. Segar says of Sir Henry that "he himself disarmed, offered up his armour at the foot of her majesties Crowned Pillar; and kneeling upon his knees, presented the Earle of Cumberland, humbly beseeching she would be pleased to accept him for her knight, to continue the yeerly exercises aforesaid [the annual tournament Sir Henry had established in the queen's honour]. Her majesty graciously accepting of that offer, this aged knight armed the earle, and mounted him upon his horse."

I suggest, therefore, that the splendidly gilt suit of armour in the Tudor Exhibition was originally Sir Henry Lee's, and that in the tournament the earl, as candidatus, was, as Peele describes him, appropriately clad in white armour.

A monogram engraved on the suit in question is described by Mr. William Chaffers, in a small brochure printed in 1885, as "the double cipher of Queen Elizabeth of two E's adossé, connected by two entwined annulets." Mr. Chaffers, however, does not note that the upright members of the two E's are connected also in the middle by a horizontal line, and thus form a very obvious H. Then, by omitting the two upper horizontal limbs of one of the E's, an L may be obtained, and the whole monogram might be read H. LEE.

This, of course, may be mere fancy on my part; but it is possible, supposing this armour to have been originally Sir Henry's, that he intended to combine his name with the queen's cipher.

Dramatic Gossip.

THE illness of Mrs. Langtry proves to have been serious, and there seems no prospect of her speedy appearance in 'As You Like It.' With a theatre and a company upon her hands, and with rehearsals completed and a piece all but produced, Mrs. Langtry is the victim of sufficiently serious misfortune.

'APRIL SHOWERS,' produced some time ago at an afternoon representation, will shortly be given at the Comedy at a series of afternoon performances, with Miss Olga Brandon, Miss Blanche Horlock, Mr. Nutcombe Gould, and Mr. Leonard Boyne in the principal parts.

AFTER many postponements Mr. Buchanan's version of 'Clarissa Harlowe' was produced on Thursday afternoon at the Vaudeville.

ON Monday Mr. Toole revived in the course of his farewell performances 'Chawles' and 'Off the Line.'

A "COMEDY-DRAMA" entitled 'Quicksands,' adapted by Miss Charlotte Morland from Mrs. Lovett Cameron's novel 'The Devout Lover,' will be presented on the 18th inst., with a cast including Miss Dorothy Dene and Mr. Frederick Cooper.

THE Shakespeare Reading Society, of which Mr. Henry Irving is president, has now reached the sixteenth year of its existence. The next annual rehearsed reading has been fixed to take place on Wednesday evening, February 26th, at the London Institution, Finsbury Circus, the play selected being 'Much Ado about Nothing.' Miss Handson, of 16, Stanley Gardens, W., is the honorary secretary.

A History of the Four Georges. By Justin McCarthy, M.P. Vol. II. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. JUSTIN MACCARTHY has hitherto been regarded as a lively and agreeable writer rather than a serious historian, and the publication of the second volume of his 'History of the Four Georges' will certainly not tend to alter the opinion already formed of him. It is, of course, his misfortune, not his fault, that his book should appear so soon after an important monograph on the same period by Mr. John Morley. But if any one wishes to know how far the work of a scholar and thinker can differ from that of a clever journalist, let him first read Mr. Morley's 'Walpole' and then the opening chapters of the book before us. The conclusion will be, it is to be feared, that Mr. McCarthy is occasionally trivial and sometimes flip-pant. When he has to chronicle the death of Swift, the duty is performed by setting down a little chatter about Stella and some obvious reflections on the "hic jacet" in St. Patrick's Church; and to give a picture of London in "the '45," he spices Horace Walpole with a page out of Mr. George Augustus Sala's novel 'The Adventures of Capt. Dangerous.'

The present volume covers the years from 1731 to 1760. At the beginning of that period we are told that "the King's Friends" and the "Patriots," otherwise the Court party and the Country party, were speechmaking and pamphleteering. If this is intended to be an exhaustive description of English parties at the time it is not good. In the first place, the term "the King's Friends" did not come into use as a party designation until the next reign, when it was adopted by Bute and attacked by Burke; and in the second place, it cannot with any propriety be applied to the ministerialists under Walpole, as Mr. McCarthy apparently intends to apply it. That statesman's main object was to strengthen government by party, it was the main object of the later King's Friends to destroy it. They were in fact the direct political descendants of the so-called "Patriot" opposition to Walpole, and the germ of the principles which they developed is to be traced in the writings of Bolingbroke, the organizer of that "Patriot" opposition. Nor were the followers of Walpole essentially a Court party or the Patriots essentially a country party; on the contrary, Carteret was far more of a Court party man than Walpole. These appellations were practically obsolete. Court party and Country party had long before developed into Tory and Whig, and the actual arrangement of parties in the reign of George II. did not correspond with either of those divisions. Mr. McCarthy accurately defined it in his first volume as a Whig Government and a malcontent Whig, Hanoverian Tory, and Jacobite Opposition, and his present use of the terms "Court," "Country," and "King's Friends" is therefore all the more singular.

But if Mr. McCarthy's description of party politics under George II. is confused, his picture of the Court life leaves nothing to be desired in point of elaboration. Of course, he had Lord Hervey and Horace Walpole to draw upon, and the caustic reflections of the former lend themselves, no doubt, to highly effective quotation. But much that is related by those writers, though fascinating to the Court chronicler, ought to be of quite subsidiary significance to the historian. Mr. McCarthy apologizes for mentioning at all the disagreeable incident of the Prince of Wales carrying off his wife from Hampton Court when she was on the point of giving birth to her first child. The story has to be told, because its political consequences were of some importance; but surely two lines would have dealt with the matter. Mr. McCarthy devotes two pages to it, in which he describes how the princess twisted and screamed in the carriage, and so forth. Again, we might well have been spared some of the medical details of Queen Caroline's last illness and a good deal of dissertation upon her dying exclamation, "Oh, mon Dieu, cela n'empêche pas!" Thackeray was rather tiresome on the subject, and Mr. McCarthy is not an improvement on Thackeray. Besides, his statement that "as regards indiscriminate amours and connexions, poor, stupid, besotted George was on a level with the lower animals," is by far too sweeping. George II. was not nice, but at least he confined himself to one mistress at a time; and when we are told that Charles II. at his worst was a gentleman in comparison, it is clear that Mr. McCarthy has quite forgotten the brutal insult the latter inflicted upon his queen in forcing her to receive Lady Castlemaine before the assembled Court. The combination of habitual infidelity with genuine affection is, no doubt, peculiar, but it is not absolutely unparalleled, for the relations of John Sobieski with the "idol of his soul, well-beloved and charming Mariette," were precisely similar.

Surely Mr. McCarthy might have paused to consider whether the king who was the author of the famous phrase, "Sir, you have taught me to look for the sense of my subjects in another place than in the House of Commons," does not deserve some slight attempt to set in relief his better qualities. It is true that he was small, immoral, and ridiculous, but he stood by Walpole, and in the end forgave Pitt, although his opposition to the King's Hanoverian schemes had been loud and long. Finance, again, is a subject which does not lend itself to effective treatment; yet it is astonishing to find that there is not a word about Henry Pelham's conversion of the National Debt, though it was a highly important and successful measure. It is to the credit, too, of the Pelhams that they should have helped to bring a great European war to a close. Mr. McCarthy has singularly little to tell about that war, though it is of some importance in our history, inasmuch as a great attempt on the part of France to re-establish herself as mistress of the sea was then defeated; and in what he does say there are several mistakes. The war of the Austrian succession did not break out on the death of "Charles VI. of Spain," but on that of Charles VI. of Germany. This is, of course, a slip; but the battle of Fontenoy, one of the most stoutly contested engagements on record, is very inaccurately described as a "sudden defeat." The importance of the battle of Dettingen to this monarchical writer lies solely in the fact that it was the last occasion on which a king of England appeared on the battle-field. Hefancies "the darkening clouds in the west, where the sun has sunk over the battle-field, to be the phantom shapes of the great English kings who led their people and their armies in the wars." This is fine writing, no doubt; but it would have been more to the point if, instead of ridiculing George II. and praising Lord Stair, Mr. McCarthy had condescended to explain that the latter had got the British army into a complete impasse.

Mr. McCarthy deals at considerable length with the "Forty-five," and tells the story with animation. Yet it is not quite fair to the memory even of the Duke of Cumberland to ascribe to him all the horrors that followed Culloden. They were, many of them, the work of the brutal Hawley, though the Duke was no doubt cognizant of them, and might have stopped them if he had chosen. Nor is it easy to see why all mention of the battle of Falkirk is omitted; and though it is not difficult to decide now that the Pretender ought to have advanced from Derby to London at all hazards, those hazards were extremely great, and his advisers were prompted by other motives than "a curious madness" when they counselled retreat. In fact, throughout the volume Mr. McCarthy is far too confident in the expression of his opinions, and unluckily lacking in sobriety of judgment. His description of the rise of the Wesleyan movement is adequate, though a few more facts about Wesley's organization might have been given; nor is there any fault to be found with the account of Clive's campaigns. But the chapters dealing with the Seven Years' War are woefully incomplete. Mr. McCarthy is very fond of deciding what does belong to English history and what does not; but it is not easy to see any logical reason for mentioning the capture of Minorca by the French, and passing over the battles of Minden and Quiberon in absolute silence. In the same way he jumps at once from the destruction of Braddock's expedition against Fort Duquesne to Wolfe's attack on Quebec, without mentioning the intervening failure of Lord Loudon's attempt upon Louisburg. This method of detaching a number of effective incidents from the great movements of which they formed a part, and presenting them to the reader with the addition of some pungent comments, has succeeded in producing an amusing book, but as an abstract and brief chronicle of the time its value is inconsiderable. It is to be hoped that if Mr. MacCarthy perseveres in his task he will rise to the height of his great argument, and endeavour to make his remaining volumes a little more worthy of his subject and of himself.

A Child of Japan; or, the Story of Yone Santo. By E. H. House. (Drane.)

THE leading motive of this book—a book American alike in its authorship and its orthography—the author declares in his postscript, which ought to be read as a preface, is

“to set forth the character and personality of a Japanese girl of the present day, and to exhibit the social and moral conditions by which she is surrounded, in case she undertakes to participate in the rapid intellectual development of her people.”

But, although Mr. House disclaims any intention to offer a “polemical treatise under the guise of a romance,” his book is in reality quite as much a denunciation of American missionaries in Japan as an idealization of young Japanese girls. “During many of the years I have lived in Japan,” he makes his exponent Dr. Charwell say to the only respectable Occidental besides himself mentioned in the story,

“I sought, with an assiduity I could hardly make you realize, for missionaries I could hold in honour, whose characters I could unqualifiedly respect, whose methods of dealing with the Japanese seemed to me worthy of approval.....It seemed incredible that of all who came in this cause none should be conscious of the broad and comprehensive duties that lay before them.....” “Do you mean that no single one of them equaled your hopes and wishes?” “Not one, Miss Gibson, not one. If I sometimes thought I had encountered a simple, upright, well-meaning soul, I soon learned that it was steeped in ignorance more befitting the rudest peasant than a pretended teacher of religion.....they shrunk before such tests as I felt bound to apply, and their falling masks revealed the selfishness, or cowardice, or conceit which pervaded and dominated them.”

Finally, the elder Miss Philipson, who does duty as the typical missionary, and has absolutely not a ray of light or spark of goodness in her composition, is represented as taking a perfectly fiendish pleasure in inflicting the severest moral torture within her power upon the heroine of the story lying in the very agony of death.

No wonder such a travesty as this of their work in Japan was resented by the missionary bodies of New England, whose influence, it seems, was sufficiently powerful to prevent the proprietors of the Atlantic Monthly, in which the story originally appeared, from carrying out their offer to publish it in book form. Into the quarrel between the missionaries and Mr. House it would be tedious to enter, but we may say that, unfitted as the former not seldom are for the task they undertake—mainly through lack of graciousness, excess of puritanic rigidity, and defective knowledge of the traditional life and thought they set themselves to improve and guide—they are as far as possible from being the peevish, brutal, and heartless pedants depicted in this book. Mr. House is much too fond of sweeping and violent condemnation of those whose views of things do not accord with his own. He for some time conducted a paper in Tokyo, distinguished by a sort of rabid hatred of a kind of Western, chiefly British, “spectre” in the East—a creation of his own which he seemed unable to contemplate without falling into fury—and by an hysterical adulation of the Japanese, past and present, Government and people, which was for some years the amusement of the foreign community and the despair of the Japanese themselves. The spirit of the Tokyo Times has passed into the present volume, and a phase of the curious transition from Orientalism to Occidentalism, of which contemporary Japan is the theatre, has been presented under a false and distorted aspect, in which all sense of historic truth and due proportion of parts has been lost.

The one merit of the book lies in the delineation of its heroine. Yone Santo is an artless, innocent Japanese girl of good birth—it is for the well-born Japanese that Mr. House reserves all his sympathies—whose family is reduced to poverty through the abolition of the daimiates. An intense thirst for knowledge possesses the girl, but a harsh grandmother stands in the way of its satisfaction. The domestic tyrannies of Japanese life are real, and Mr. House's portrait of the cruel grandmother is not, perhaps, overdrawn, though for a foreigner to obtain any accurate knowledge of Japanese interiors is even yet a most difficult matter. However, Yone—whose thirst for knowledge is exceptional—finally attends a foreign school, bearing patiently the while the burden of almost the whole of the household drudgery. Here she meets with her first real griefs, being bullied by the missionary-mistress because she has redder hands, and is oftener late—both defects due to hard domestic work—than the other pupils, over whom nevertheless she soon shows her superiority in every mental and moral quality. Her grandmother, alleging the family poverty, causes the girl to be betrothed to a boat-builder of no birth and less breeding. At this point Dr. Charwell, who had previously been interested in Yone, intervenes, but to no purpose, and the marriage takes place. Yone accepts the position as a perfectly natural one; rebellion against any wish of her parents or elders never enters into her thoughts. A young American, Milton by name, next appears on the scene, and is greatly attracted by Yone, who is not indifferent to him, though she is hardly aware of her feelings. Dr. Charwell watches the pair with anxiety, and on becoming aware of Milton's intentions, which he considers nefarious, indulges in a series of violent diatribes against him and Occidentals in general, at whose door he lays all the evils which afflict Japan. The climax is reached when Milton refuses to avail himself of the facility of divorce in Japan to free Yone from her husband the boat-builder, and occupy his place. At a later period the Bostonian repents him of his treatment of Yone, but it is too late. The little Japanese maid dies, apparently of cholera—one of the thousands of victims, according to Mr. House, of the brutality of German and British representatives and the squalor of Western peoples.

What interest the tale possesses lies wholly in the story of Yone's unconscious heroism and sweet patience. But there is little that is distinctively Japanese about her; her reflections, like her qualities, are those of a European or American tenderly nurtured young lady, not those of the daughter of a Japanese samurai. The picture is a charming one enough, but the traits are Western, not Eastern, while the dark background of missionary tyranny and cruelty is, we may be sure, almost wholly of Mr. House's own creation. He may have personally known a Yone more or less resembling the heroine of his story; such a pack of female demons as the missionary women who dog, like furies, every step of her life, and revel in a truly satanic twisting of her simplest acts into vile offences, exist neither in Japan nor in New England. We can understand that a girl in Yone's position would have much to endure from her own people, and we can quite sympathize with the hard lot of Japanese women generally in a state of society for which they are not yet fitted, and in which their claims form as yet a subject of quite minor consideration. But almost the only hope of Japanese women lies in the truer civilization of their countrymen by missionary effort. Steam and electricity, science and the arts, will not work this change, though they may facilitate it, nor probably will the preaching of dogmatic Christianity be much more effectual; but the moral example and moral teaching that constitute more and more the main elements of missionary influence, with time and patience, cannot fail of success.

On the whole, then, despite many graceful and tender traits in the portrait of his heroine, Mr. House cannot be congratulated on his performance. What is good in it is not characteristic of Japan, while it is throughout more or less disfigured by violent and repulsive caricature. The style, it must be added, is often turgid and forced to an extraordinary degree—in fact, the author appears to be as incapable of stating a simple fact in simple language as he is of fine observation and just judgment.

The First of the Bourbons. By Catherine Charlotte, Lady Jackson. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

The Marriages of the Bourbons. By Capt. the Hon. H. D. Bingham. 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

No amount of experience will ever, we fear, mature the mind of a reviewer to the point of knowing precisely what to do with such books as Lady Jackson's and (in a somewhat different way) Capt. Bingham's. To treat them as scholarly compositions, as attempts at history in the proper sense, and to find with them the innumerable faults which might be discovered in them from that point of view, would be a mere case of Pedantry's Labour Lost. On the other hand, it is extremely difficult to understand what readers they can have from any other point of view. We can only suppose that there is still a considerable public at the circulating libraries for books which appear to possess a certain amount of the “improving” without any troublesome literary pretensions or any air of severe accuracy. If so, it is a pity.

We have hinted that our two authors are not quite on a level. If somebody could contrive a barometer of book-making, it would sink much lower in Lady Jackson's case than in Capt. Bingham's. If any one will compare the passages relating to La Belle Gabrielle's death in the two, he will see the difference. Capt. Bingham, to do him justice, has generally read modern authorities on his subjects, and at least sometimes attempts criticism. Lady Jackson does not seem to know what criticism means. Her plan appears, as it has appeared before, to be to take some stock memoirs on the subject (in this case of course Sully's), to fill in from one or two others, and occasionally to translate or paraphrase from a modern book something about some older one. Thus in her present volumes, instead of reading the 'Satyre Menippée' (which, Heaven knows, is amusing reading enough), she borrows from M. Gustave Merlet some strange stuff about "a serio-comic epic in prose and verse," "a fantastic magic palace," "a discourse of great eloquence falling on the ear as an echo from the ancient forum," and so forth. The result is a most curious muddle, not detailed enough, and still less critical enough, to be of any historical value, and we should have thought not gossiping enough to be of any other. In some of the numerous books which have preceded this Lady Jackson has translated or paraphrased from the memoirs passages of some interest; but we find little or nothing of the kind here, while her style is almost unbelievable, as witness this sentence: "Much more fighting took place, and with singular success, though unfortunately with immense loss of life—the combatants on both sides fighting with extraordinary fury."

Capt. Bingham is, to do him justice, above this. His 'Marriages of the Bourbons' is a curious farrago, beginning somewhere about A.D. 1200 (a little early for "Bourbons"), and ending with a letter from Don Carlos dated in February, 1889. But Capt. Bingham has at any rate endeavoured in all cases to consult late, and in some cases the latest, authorities, and as no country has been more prolific of late years than France in historical monographs based upon previously unpublished matter, he has plenty of good and trustworthy material. With M. Chantelauze to draw upon for Marie de Mancini, and M. Vatel to set him straight about Madame du Barry (to take two instances only), he is not likely to go quite hopelessly wrong. Where good Lady Jackson trusts to Sully, or corrects him only by D'Aubigné and Mathieu, Capt. Bingham is well aware of the vigorous fashion in which divers industrious tar-brushers have been at work upon the reputation and the performance of Maximilien de Bethune. Yet qualms come across us as we read the title 'Causeries de Lundi,' and qualms still greater as we read the following passage:—

"Such was the haughty manner in which Louis XIV. treated the Parliament of Paris two years before Charles I., the son-in-law of Henri IV., lost his head on the scaffold. He was now sixteen years of age, and had already joined the army in the field."

Now Louis was sixteen years of age in 1654; but what are we to think of the historical competence of a writer who thinks that Charles I. lost his head two years after that year? After such an astonishing proposition as this it seems unnecessary to examine Capt. Bingham any further. His book, however, is less dull than Lady Jackson's. Both, we should say, are rather well illustrated, Lady Jackson's with heliogravure portraits (the more faithful reproduction of that of Charlotte de Montmorency, by the way, justifies the vert-galant's senile passion less than the steel engravings, for instance, in the modern editions of Tallemant, which are certainly beautiful enough), and Capt. Bingham's with copies (also "processed" in some way) of drawings signed "E. Pavy," which are rather effective. But we must say that we find vague book-making of this kind extremely depressing to read.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Edited by J. A. H. Murray.—Part V. Cast—Clivy. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

THE fame of the 'New English Dictionary' and its editor is so firmly established by this time that it is unnecessary, and would be almost impertinent, to indulge in any encomiums on part V. Suffice it to say that the general excellence of the great work appears to be well maintained, while if possible the portion of the language of English literature which is here treated presents an exceptionally large percentage of interesting matter. The majority of us are naturally more concerned with the current coins of speech than with the battered tokens of antiquity, and even those who are interested in etymology and the history of language find a large number of obsolete words altogether unattractive. Now in the part before us the percentage of obsolete words falls for the first time under 20, while the percentage for letter B is just over 25, and for A just over 28, and for C—Cass over 20. The percentage of alien words again is 4.6, very little above the general average, while for C—Cass the alien percentage is 7.6. Moreover, there is a happy paucity of long compounds derived from Latin or Greek, and of the scientific jargon which is so rife under the letter A, owing in part to the fact that cata- (about sixteen columns) and circum- (about thirty columns) are the only classical prefixes included.

In proceeding to details the critic is not met by the usual difficulty of deciding where to begin, as the opening articles on cast (sb. and vb.) form a noble façade to the imposing structure before him, and at once attract his attention. The treatment of the substantive cast has demanded 14 divisions and 42 sections, while that of the verb cast has demanded 13 divisions, 83 sections, and more than 160 sub-sections, occupying about fifteen columns, in which nearly 800 illustrative quotations are to be found. The arrangement and the numerous definitions seem entirely satisfactory. The etymological paragraph illustrates the ingratitude with which men treat useful words; for cast "took in Middle English the place of Old English [Anglo-Saxon] weorpan.....and has now been largely superseded in ordinary language and in the simple literal sense by throw." It is, perhaps, a pity that a phrase-key has not been given, as for burn, burst, as well as the abstract of the general arrangement. We note several little inaccuracies in the quotations from the 'Cursor Mundi,' viz., under cast, vb., § 2, "were" for werre, and "dere" for dere; § 31, "an ass" for a nass (Morris); § 32, "heroude" for heroudes; § 45, marks of omission not inserted between "graid" and "Crafitili"; also under cast, sb., § 4, "to" between "pan" and "reu" left out. Under cast, vb., § 63, last quotation, "1884, 'Mehalah,'" stands for "1880, Baring-Gould, 'Mehalah.'" It seems incredible that a "Mrs. Riddle" (see cast, vb., § 73) should have chosen the title 'City and Suburb' as well as Mrs. Riddell. There are also sundry slight errors which a good press-reader would have sent back with queries: under cast, sb., § 10, Ascham's 'Toxophilus' is dated 1545, and under cast, vb., § 53, 1544; ib., § 44, Lassels's 'Voyage to Italy' is dated 1660, elsewhere rightly 1670; ib., § 83 e, Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' is dated 1618 for 1678; ib., § 81 d, "Mandev." for "Maundev."; ib., § 83 k, "Wodrow" is printed as an abbreviation, but under § 27 as an entire name. Under cast, past participle, § 5, "Bible" is omitted before "Jer." Under Christianity, 1 a, "Cursor H." appears for "Cursor M." It is to be wished that Gabriel Harvey's phrase "kaste of leeger de mane" ('Letter Bk.,' p. 121) or some similar phrase had been noticed in the article on cast, sb. From numerous other very interesting articles, those on cheer, choose, chrisom, and church may be selected as worthy of special attention, not to mention that on cat, a word which seems to be as necessary to language as the animal itself is to a granary.

There are several omissions for which it is not easy to account: for instance, catalowne (Beck's 'Draper's Dict.'), the form chaton (for which a quotation is given in Cassell's 'Encyclopædic Dictionary'), claviary (given in the same and in Webster). And surely Caurus, causerie, and cavea, not to mention cheiri (cheiry), are more at home in English than Lewes's wretched causatum, or casus, or chiasmus. Of the last word Sir Thomas Browne's botanical use is more worthy of record than Dr. A. S. Wilkins's rhetorical instance given in an edition of Cicero's speeches against Catiline. We do not notice under chicken anything quite corresponding to Gabriel Harvey's "chickins of the game" ('Letter Bk.,' p. 31), while his use of chapel might have been cited with advantage. The Indian stuff chucklah is inserted, but not the companion word cherconnaes, charconnaes (Yule, s.v. "Piece-goods"). The word chuck is called "echoic"; but as "onomatopoeic" is also used, we seem to have here a needless extension of our plethoric vocabulary. To return to the omissions: under cicatrice the meaning "scab" is not given at all, though it is, we believe, still extant, and it is at any rate to be found in more than one old surgical treatise.

It is surprising that earlier instances of usage have not been found in a good many cases. For instance, the illustrations of class, with the exception of a casual Scotch use, commence with Blount (1656), whereas the educational use occurs in W. Watson's 'Quodlibets' (1602); clannish ('N.E.D.,' 1776) occurs in Burt's 'Lett. N. Scotland' (1754); the earliest instance of clan in combination is 1828, though "clan-quarrel" occurs in Burt. The earliest instance of cinder in combination is 1575, though "cinder-like" and "cinder-dust" are found in 'Tottel's Miscellany' (1557); catarrh ('N.E.D.' 1533) is met with in Paynell's 'Reg. Sal.' (1528); cerote ('N.E.D.' 1562) is in Traheron's 'Vigo's Chirurg.' (1543); clitter clatter ('N.E.D.' 1535) is, according to Mr. T. L. K. Oliphant, to be found in Skelton; cautery ('N.E.D.' 1543) is used in the translation of Jerome of Brunswick's 'Surgery' (1525); citadel ('N.E.D.' a. 1586) is in J. Shute's 'Two Comment.' (1562).

In the first instance given of the Latin word causa, "c. 1420, 'Chron. Vilod.' 428, 'For he was causa of his brotheris deythe,'" the scribe probably ought to have written "causar." The fifteenth century cicade, given under cicada as if it were an Anglicized form, is clearly the Latin plural, for cicadæ. The word chassé used as a verb, meaning "to dismiss," is jumbled up with the distinct verb chassé used in English with reference to the dance-step chassé. This article should clearly be divided into two. The reference to Pliny given in the etymological remarks on chalcadony, viz., "xxvii. §§ 103, 104," is mysterious, as, according to the usual notation, those sections refer to plants; while there seems to have been very little doubt that Pliny's chalcadony was an inferior kind of emerald, named from a mountain or an island near Chalcedon on the Propontis. We rather grudge the space lavished on the etymology of chalcadony, cabazite, catawampous, chortle, and so forth, which kind of words ought to be treated as briefly as possible. The one interesting feature about chortle is that it is a nonsensical coinage, the meaning of which has to be inferred from the context, and which seems to have taken root in the language, though its companions, "brillig," "frabjous," "vorpal," &c., have not been so successful, possibly owing partly to the fact that their meaning is by no means so clear. We observe that the French chatoymement seems to be struggling into technical use, chatoyant having already been admitted into our vocabulary. We are disappointed that nothing is said as to the relation of this last word to shot, applied to silk, &c. A protest must be entered against the immortalization of such monstrosities as the Earl Wemyss's caucusified; chatter (the Spectator, 1886); chattelization (the Guardian, 1888), which the coin has the grace to put into inverted commas; and chattelhood (Echo, 1881). Any writer who pleases can coin derivatives of this kind to any extent, so that they ought not to be recorded without evidence that they have been used at least more than once. If all such coinages up to a certain date could be collected, a list of them might form an interesting study in the pathology of language.

The admission of what we consider superfluous items of vocabulary is the only serious fault which we have to find. The other blemishes of various kinds which we have noted are not in any sense typical, and might be multiplied a hundredfold without appreciably affecting the character of a work distinguished by merits which we have not space enough to exemplify, and among which it is extremely difficult to make a choice. Dr. Murray, in his short preface, very properly draws special attention to the highly satisfactory dissertation on the etymology of church, which is a model of close reasoning and sound philological method. Though the derivation from Late Greek κυριακόν is not new, much of the argument adduced to support it is novel. The only difficulty left unremoved is the existence of early forms in -kya by the explicable forms in -ka, such as Anglo-Saxon (oblique) ciricean, circean, Icelandic kirkia, kyrkja. The suggested metathesis kiryika to kirikya does not recommend itself strongly. This small point, however, does not affect the validity of the main contention. It is pointed out that churches were known to Angles, Saxons, and Germans as objects of pillage long before they had churches of their own.

The etymology of charter from Latin cartula, not chartarius, is, we believe, new, as is the separation of claret (from Late Latin claretum) from clary (from Late Latin claratum). Many other instances of advance in this department might be added. The phonetics of chary, chicken, claw (cleo), and clench are most instructive, illustrating as they do the regularity of sound-change in a striking manner. The list of specially interesting words given in the preface, which includes several very important ecclesiastical terms, might have been considerably increased, but nothing except use and study of the pages themselves can convey any adequate idea of the intellectual profit and entertainment which they afford.

The Barons of Pulford. By Sir George R. Sitwell, Bart., F.S.A. (Sitwell Press, Scarborough.)

EVERY student of English history and of the growth of our constitution is well aware of the peculiar interest that pertains to the county of Chester. Of this county it may be fairly said that it enjoyed Home Rule of an advanced type from soon after the Conquest up to the reign of Henry VIII. It was not represented in the Parliament of the kingdom until 1541. During that period Cheshire remained Norman in spirit and in organization, having but little share in national progress or popular reform, and, at times, proving itself a menace to the Crown, and subsequently to the liberties of England. "Low and primitive types of institutions, as of plants or animals," says Sir George Sitwell,

"are apt to survive in corners where they are protected from competition. The secret of the peculiar institutions of the county palatine, unguessed by Leicester, Ormerod, or Helsby, is that they were survivals.....The 'custom of Chester,' which sanctioned the decapitation before trial of robbers or burglars by the Serjeants of the Peace, had in the thirteenth century been common to the whole country, but was at that time falling into general discredit, owing to the difficulty of repairing an occasional mistake."

This book is not a mere record of a race of soldier barons, or a dry investigation of genealogical problems, for the author, in following up the fortunes of one of the leading families of the county—a task fulfilled with exemplary diligence and pains—has come across far larger questions. They, though treated of with clearness and emphasis, have been found too large for inclusion within the history of a baronial house, and are to be reserved for a future book that will be styled

'The Normans in Cheshire.' Until that is issued the whole matter will not come before historical students for their judgment and examination; but Sir George Sitwell has meanwhile put out the leading facts of his case, and the chief arguments whereon they are based. If they are established, they cannot fail to revolutionize many of the current statements in our handbooks of history, and must upset not a few of the most sober assertions of our accepted authorities as to baronies, palatinate earldoms, and the like.

It does not prepossess the general reader, and still less perhaps the critic or reviewer, to find a new author, whom we believe to be still young and untried, quietly stating in the preface, in the introduction, in the body of the book, and even in the index, that every one who has previously written about Cheshire and its baronies, from Camden and Dugdale down to Prof. Freeman and Bishop Stubbs, is wrong, and that he has found the explanatory key. Yet it is only fair to say that Sir George Sitwell's assertions are not put forward in an offensive way; they are made with an air of deliberate conviction, and we are inclined to think that his arguments and facts will, before long, be generally accepted. At all events, even the comparatively meagre statements now put forth demand, at the least, careful study.

The accepted view is that William the Conqueror gave Chester, the capital of the Mercian earldom, and its county to Hugh d'Avranches (better known as Hugh le Loup), "to hold as freely by the sword as the king held England by the crown, for such," says Camden, "are the very words of the donation." Every subsequent writer has built upon this statement. But Sir G. Sitwell has examined this document, disputes its interpretation, and denies that Hugh was a palatine earl. Certainly Hugh enjoyed almost unlimited power, and was nearly as independent of the King of England as was the Duke of Normandy of the King of France. His earldom was not subject to English law or English taxes; he was the head of all military and judicial procedure, as well as the sole landlord of the county; and he enjoyed also its entire revenues and profits. Whence, then, did the earl obtain these powers, which have hitherto been looked upon as regalian, and inseparable from delegated and palatine authority? The explanation given in these pages of these sovereign powers being centred in Hugh's earldom is threefold:—

"As Edwin's heir, he was the military leader of the shire and president of the folkmoet; by the universal forfeiture of the small Saxon thanes, and the consequent escheat to his demesne of the entire land of the county (except, of course, that which was held by the Church), he became the supreme landlord and gained a proprietary interest in the shire court and sheriff; and his possession of the wasted revenues of the county was derived from the not unusual generosity of the Conqueror."

The supreme jurisdiction in all causes, capital or otherwise, which the earl possessed over his vassals in his court at Chester, was one that he was able to delegate to others. His tenants-in-chief, like the king's, were termed barons, and to them he granted complete jurisdiction over their tenants. These barons could not have been, as has been usually supposed, the hereditary vassals of his family in Normandy, for Richard, the father of Hugh le Loup, was still living, and in possession of Avranchin and Hiemois, eleven years after his son had obtained the earldom of Cheshire. They were the younger sons of great houses who had attached themselves to Hugh, some through relationship, and some through the earl being a favourite of the Conqueror and marked out for greatness. The number of these Cheshire barons has been much disputed. Dugdale gives a list of six or seven, but admits there were others whom he was unable to identify. Bishop Stubbs states there were eight, and gives their names. Sir George Sitwell claims to have established that there were twelve of these baronies in Cheshire, and he is able, moreover, to identify them all. Amongst these hitherto forgotten baronies that of Hugh Fitz Osbern was one of the most important. He was one of Earl Hugh's officers in the reduction of Cheshire in 1071-2, and was rewarded by the acquisition of various manors in the county. The head of Hugh Fitz Osbern's barony was Pulford, where a strong castle was erected. He had another residence on his manor of Ormesby, in Lincolnshire, which subsequently supplied a surname to one line of his descendants.

Sir George Sitwell then proceeds to give, in the introduction, a readable account of the barons of Pulford of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and of the subsequent history of their descendants, the Reresbys of Thrybergh and Ashover, the Ormesbys of South Ormesby, and the Pulfords of Pulford Castle. The well-known memoirs of Sir John Reresby, written in the latter half of the seventeenth century, are so delightful in the insight they give into the family life of a leading house of the time, that it is specially acceptable to learn more of this family and of their connexions, particularly when it is told in an attractive and interesting manner. The main portion of the book gives copies of charters and evidences, culled from all manner of sources, in support of the statements in the introduction, and in proof of the descent of the barons of Pulford and of their later offshoots. We have been able to test these pages in various places, and have found hardly any flaws; but their general accuracy makes us all the more surprised in detecting the writer in one piece of credulity in the later history, which deals with the fortunes of the Reresbys during the Commonwealth. Eastwood Hall, Ashover, built by Sir Thomas Reresby for occupation during the year he was sheriff of Derbyshire (1613), was dismantled and partly destroyed by the Parliamentary troops in 1646. This is history, but Sir George Sitwell has been led to quote at length from a literary forgery, supposed to be a letter from Immanuel Bourne, then rector of Ashover, as to details of their action. After the troops had blown up the hall, the rector follows them to the church, and

"to my great surprise did find the scout master Smedley in the pulpit, where he did preach a sermon two hours long about popery priestcraft and kingcraft; but Lord, what stuff and nonsense he did talke, and if he could have murdered the kyng as easily as hee did the kyng's English the war would long since have been over."

The fact is that about twenty years ago some clever London scamps found a ready market for forgeries of both pen and pencil pertaining to the Commonwealth period, and we have little doubt that Sir George Sitwell has unfortunately lighted on one of these. Immanuel Bourne was, in reality, a strong adherent of the Parliamentary side, and became a noted member of a Presbyterian Classis. But surely the English of the brief passage quoted is enough to show the modern origin of the letter.

This book will be of interest to the antiquaries and genealogists of Cheshire, Lincolnshire, and Derbyshire; but it is on account of the boldness of the challenge to all past historians of Cheshire and of its peculiar customs that it ought to claim some general attention. We believe this to be the first venture of the author, and though we are unable, without further proof, to accept all his conclusions, he has surely by these pages made his mark among antiquaries. At all events, he has succeeded in making his readers look forward to his next appearance.

A Last Love. By Georges Ohnet. Translated by Albert Vandam. (Chatto & Windus.)

HAD Mr. Clark Russell's choice of a plot only proved as happy as his handling of individual incidents, unqualified praise might have been bestowed on the latest product of his pen, especially as he has manifested great improvement in characterization, hitherto, perhaps, the weakest spot in his equipment. But the main motive of the story—jealousy aggravated by insanity and unsated by vengeance—weighs like an incubus on the reader from beginning to end. Neither the love-making of the minor plot, nor the brilliant description, nor the exciting episodes which throng these pages have power to wholly remove this impression. We have spoken of the writer's advance in his character-drawing, but after all there is more flesh and blood, if one may say so, in his ships than in his men and women. He writes of a beautiful yacht with that chivalrous admiration and enthusiasm which would be inspired in another by a beautiful woman. 'An Ocean Tragedy' is not wanting in strokes of humour, the phraseology of the sailors being often delightful, racy, and quaint; but instead of lightening the prevailing sombreness of the story, these livelier passages often strike a jarring note. It speaks well for Mr. Clark Russell's ability that he should have avoided a fiasco; but the book at best is but a brilliant failure.

Mrs. Cudlip writes of lords and grooms, grand ladies and ladies who are no better than they ought to be. They mostly speak and act according to the same standards of propriety, and some of them change with the utmost ease from one standard to another, as though refinement of mind and manners were a glove, that could be put on and taken off at will. By dint of giving different people the same name, making lawyers and other men of business accept impostors on their own showing, and various devices of the like kind, the author has no difficulty in putting together what may be called a highly remarkable and complicated plot. In fact, the complication is so great that Mrs. Cudlip herself seems to have been lost in its convolutions. In two successive chapters, the third and fourth of her third volume, she has written out two different accounts of the same incident, making it occur twice over, with an interval of several days. The story has been written too hastily, and there has evidently been no time for the study of character or motives.

'Midst Surrey Hills' is in a way creditable, even meritorious, yet it is an example of a book that is well-nigh a failure because the power of elimination and selection of material is deplorably wanting. With a little of this quality the author might have produced a something—not powerful, perhaps, but showing at least observation and feeling. As it is, there are lines upon lines, paragraphs, pages, now and again whole chapters, quite ineffective, entirely out of place, and only helping to ruin the rest, which a practised workman would not have allowed to stand for a moment. To cut, recut, and cut again wants riper experience and more artistic insight than the author of 'Midst Surrey Hills' seems to possess. Heavy, laboured descriptions and dialogue, pauses over effects that do not repay the effort, the tendency to seek after humour which does not always flow, are unfortunately marked features of the story. There are, for instance, pages describing a little affair with a certain firm of rapacious publishers which may be very well in their way, but are quite out of focus here. The adventures of a couple of "cyclists" are of the same nature, and the reader is not grateful when he is removed from Surrey (the legitimate scene of the story) to South Wales, simply to give the author an opportunity of introducing yet more material. Isolated bits there are which are clever and pleasing, and there is some quiet reticence and command of character. The bishop's palace and the bishop's daughters are likable, though one doubts a bishop's palace (even minus a "bishop's lady") ever being so agreeably free and easy as this one. Church and Dissent are contrasted, without much more result than to show that "good men and true" may exist in each. One wonders (needlessly perhaps) to find a dignitary of the Church using the expression "I expect" when referring to the past. The sibilant sound in the title of the book might easily have been avoided, and the heroine provided with a name more comfortable to pronounce than the combination of "Fee Eager" bestowed upon her.

'Dead Stripes' has good points; not the least is a certain air of assurance and workmanlikeness which pervades it. There is a great deal about "mill hands" in the North; their ways and their talk seem real enough, and suggest that the author has a fair knowledge of the phase of life he has chosen to depict. And yet all this, though it is the dominant feature, is hardly the best of the book. There is quiet and accurate observation shown in several of the characters of the story, though certainly not in all, for some of them are conventional enough. The mill-owner, however, who desires to wed the fair and virtuous beauty of his "shop," possesses more reality and, in a way, more originality—is, indeed, a fair example of the average man who, with more common sense than intellect or imagination, may, under favouring circumstances, rise to unlooked-for heroisms. In short, although 'Dead Stripes' offers little matter for a reviewer, it is by no means bad reading.

'Cosette' is another romance in French setting, of the kind to which its author has accustomed her readers; and it is neither worse nor better than several which have preceded it from the same source. Cosette, like many a girl in various ranks of life, chooses one love for herself whilst her friends choose another for her; and there are the usual complications, which are told with good taste and feeling. The story has very little incident, but much play of character, so that the men and women who act their parts in the comedy appear almost real. The experiences of Cosette are decidedly touching, and her fate is well contrived to support a French rather than an English view of the theory and practice of courtship.

The feeble thread of love and society gossip which runs through Hasmbib's story of the Soudan, though spun with considerable delicacy, does not distract the reader too much from the main purpose of the author, which is to give a sketch of a soldier's life during the Khartoum Expedition, and of the glories of the Camel Corps. This is excellently done, in no pedantic or pragmatical fashion, with the commentary and illustrations of a sensible man of the world, and with just the appropriate dash of Gordonolatriy. The drawing is picturesque throughout, and Hasmbib supplies the colour and warmth of an artist. He is sufficiently bold also. His hero is "missing" after Abu Klea—there is a good parallel for the curious between the march to Matemnah and Antony's march from Phraata—and falls into the hand of the enemy. Then romance and history are deftly interwoven, and the story ends at Cairo, as most good stories end, with peace for at least one couple of distracted souls.

The characteristics of M. Ohnet's 'Dernier Amour' were so much like the characteristics of most of his work as to confirm a theory held by some critics that there is no author so popular as the author who gives the public exactly what it expects. A certain facility of construction, dialogue slipshod but fluent, cheap pathos, a knack of describing all classes of society with indifferent incorrectness, and, finally, a kind of bluntness of moral touch which tickles morbid senses without shocking them—these are M. Ohnet's qualifications, and they appear in the history of the contest of Madame de Fontenay and Lucie Andrimont for the not particularly valuable affection of the former's husband as well as in all his other work. Mr. Vandam's translation is fairly readable, though not exactly good. "Bearing themselves somewhat too correctly and precise," "those who did unlike they did did wrong," and similar phrases, occur, though not too frequently. But we must protest against a new instance—new to us, at least—of the absurd misunderstanding of French abbreviations, the rule for which is simple enough in all conscience. You take the first and the last letter or letters, and no intermediate one—"Gal." for Général, "Mis." for Marquis, "Cte." for Comte, and so on. Here we have, on the pattern of the ridiculous English solecisms "Mdme." and "Mlle." for "Mme." and "Mlle.," "Mte." instead of "Me." for Maitre in the legal sense. We are wont, and in the main justly, to pride ourselves on the superiority of English to French printing in the matter of foreign names and words, but in this particular point we are sadly vulnerable. Let "Mte." therefore, be nipped in the bud. If it is short for any French word at all, it is short for morte, or malepeste, or matérialiste, or something like them, but certainly not for Maitre.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

The Hammer. By A. J. Church and R. Seeley. (Seeley & Co.)

Job Simmons; or, "I am Nothing." By the Rev. F. T. Bramston. (Skeffington & Son.)

The Heir of Treherne. By the Rev. A. D. Crake, B.A. (Mowbray & Co.)

Little St. Elizabeth, and other Stories. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. (Warne & Co.)

Dulcima's Doom, and other Tales. By N. H. Willis. (Edinburgh, Grant & Son.)

Witch Winnie: the Story of a "King's Daughter." By Elizabeth W. Champney. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

The Wreck of the Argo. By F. G. Fowell. (Ward & Downey.)

The Spanish Galleon. By F. C. Badrick. (Same publishers.)

In 'The Hammer' the joint authors have given a vivid and interesting picture of Jewish life in the second century B.C. The opening chapters show to what an extent the Jews had fallen away from the old faith, and were endeavouring to disown their ancestry by assuming Greek dress, Greek manners, and even Greek names. Then follows a stirring account of the persecution of the faithful under Antiochus and of the rise of the Maccabees, with the aged Matthias at their head. The remainder of the volume is devoted to the struggles of Judas, "the Hammer," and his intrepid band of followers against the Greeks, until his death in the famous battle of Eleasa, "the Jewish Thermopylæ." The leading personages of the tale are, of course, historical, and drawn from the Books of the Maccabees, but the authors have filled up the bare outline by introducing fictitious minor characters, and have thus given completeness and interest to the story. The preface states that Mr. Seeley is responsible for the plot and Mr. Church for the narrative.

'Job Simmons' is one of the most depressing village tales we have ever encountered. A murdering squatter, a murdered squire, and a well-meaning, but helpless curate are the personages dealt with by Mr. Bramston, whose book has little merit in manner and still less in matter.

The lamented author of 'The Heir of Treherne' wrote in the guise of a vivid historical romance an admirable description of the opposition to the Reformation in Devonshire, that "first great rebellion in the West on account of religion." Mr. Crake dwelt chiefly on the sufferings of the Catholic martyrs, affirming that, "for the sake of fairness, we who do not share their opinions in many respects, who accept the results of the Reformation struggle, as found in the Church of England of the present day—will yet offer our tribute of sympathy to these long-forgotten sufferers for conscience' sake." Mr. Crake did not intend 'The Heir of Treherne' primarily for the young. Nevertheless we feel sure that it is eminently calculated to interest and instruct young as well as old.

All young folks will welcome a volume of stories by the author of 'Little Lord Fauntleroy.' Little St. Elizabeth is one of the most winning and pathetic of Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's child heroines. The fairy tales which follow her history, retold from a lost fairy book, are quite charming.

'Dulcima's Doom' and the accompanying tales are modern fairy tales of middling interest. The last in the book, the story entitled 'Aged Two Hundred Years,' is gruesome enough.

'Witch Winnie,' a Transatlantic tale of child philanthropy, encumbered with an involved and rambling plot, is well meaning, but unhappily rather tedious.

'The Wreck of the Argo' and 'The Spanish Galleon' are two books for boys, and exceedingly good specimens of their respective classes. Mr. Badrick's story, especially, has a swing about it which, combined with its appetizing mystery, should prove very attractive to young readers. Mr. Fowell's story of shipwreck recalls 'The Swiss Family Robinson' a little too strongly; but boys are not particular, and the fresh and cheerful style in which it is written will doubtless recommend it sufficiently to their approval.

THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Iris: Studies in Colour and Talk about Flowers by Prof. Franz Delitzsch, translated from the original by the Rev. A. Cusin, M.A. (Edinburgh, Clark), contains lectures on theological matters under the cover of the colour of roses and other flowers. They are written with much poetical feeling, and are intermingled with charming lines from various German poets.

"The subjects of the following papers," says the Nestor of Biblical commentators, "are old pet children, which have grown with me ever since I began to feel and think. For I can scarcely remember the time when I was not irresistibly drawn to observe the refraction of light, and to muse on the language of colours. With flowers I have always been on the most confidential footing; they have heavenly things to tell me, and in their perfume I feel the nearness and breath of the Creator."

The book consists of twelve papers, mostly connected with colours or flowers as found in the Bible or the Talmud, in an ecclesiastical and academical form. Besides the attractive style, which can scarcely be reproduced in a translation, there is much to instruct us. Thus, in the paper 'On the Talmud and Colours' the author rightly speaks of the two opposite opinions about the Talmud—that of the late E. Deutsch, according to whom "the Talmud is the ocean and the New Testament an inland sea fed from its waters," and that of Dr. Rohling, "who has collected the silliest and filthiest matter which older polemical writers had extracted from the Talmud, and gives out these sweepings as a representation of the whole." The paper entitled 'The Flower-Riddle of the Queen of Sheba' gives a complete study of the legend connected with the queen and Solomon, from Eastern and Western sources. It is really astonishing to note the vast amount of reading of Prof. Delitzsch on the subject. The comparison between the Jordan and Rhine, or the vine in Palestine and in Rhineland (ix., 'The Bible and the Vine'), is quite beautiful. We learn from it that in a prayer connected with the Holy Supper thanks are given for the holy vine of David. 'Dancing and the Criticism of the Pentateuch in relation to One Another' (paper x.) is a genial hit at Drs. Wellhausen and Smend, who maintain that the Jews after the return from the exile formed no longer a nation, but a religious sect. Space does not permit even the enumeration of the titles of the other papers, much less a short analysis of them.

The Life and Works of Saint Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux. Edited by Dom John Mabillon. Translated and edited by Samuel J. Eales, M.A., D.C.L. Vols. I. and II. (Hodges.)—Mr. Eales reminds us in his preface that in 1844 a prospectus was issued at Oxford for a translation of the works of St. Bernard by Frederick Oakley and J. S. Brewer. The undertaking was abandoned, and has only now been revived by Mr. Eales, who has given us a substantial instalment of an important piece of work. The two volumes which have appeared contain the greater part of St. Bernard's letters; his sermons and treatises are to follow; and Mr. Eales holds out the expectation that he may complete his labours by a life of the saint. If this programme be carried out the finished work ought to be one of great importance. No writer of the Middle Ages is so fruitful of moral inspiration as St. Bernard, no character is more beautiful, and no man in any age whatever so faithfully represented all that was best in the impulses of his time, or exercised so powerful an influence upon it. St. Bernard stood at the head of a great revival of monasticism, he laboured for the reformation of the Church, he combated the rationalism of Abelard and the errors of heretical sects, he awakened crusading zeal, he healed a schism of the Papacy, and his voice was powerful in the politics of every European country. There is no man whose letters cover so many subjects of abiding interest, or whose influence was so widely spread. If Mr. Eales calls greater attention to so significant a personage he will have done good service. To English readers generally St. Bernard is known by Mr. Cotter Morison's biography, a work which won its way by its sympathetic enthusiasm for its subject, but is deficient in historical insight. The field is still open for Mr. Eales to reap a ripe harvest. It is not yet time to pronounce an opinion on Mr. Eales's labours as a whole; but the present instalment does not show signs of the serious research which the subject requires. A translator is justified in using the best available text, and Mr. Eales has rightly chosen the fourth edition of Mabillon, which is a worthy memorial of Mabillon's scholarship. But he might at least have given us some account of the various editions in a connected way. Instead of this he has translated without comment Mabillon's introduction, and only in the preface to vol. ii. gives a page of bibliography. A table showing the numbering of the letters in the various editions would have been useful; a synoptical table of contents is an obvious requirement. Yet Mr. Eales gives us neither of these things; he has translated Mabillon, and considers that to be enough. He does not show any knowledge of Hüffer's volume, 'Der heilige Bernard von Clairvaux: Vorstudien' (1886), though Hüffer has collected twenty hitherto unpublished letters, which might well have been arranged in chronological order. In the same way Mr. Eales has translated the notes given in the edition of 1839 with very unimportant additions. He has not altered references to suit the convenience of students, who now have standard editions in the 'Monumenta Germanica' and the Rolls series of chroniclers. Further, he quotes titles in the ablative case in a way which leads us to suppose that he knows nothing of the books themselves; thus, 'Perard in 'Burgundicis Monumentis'; 'Haeften in 'Disquisitionibus Monasticis,' and the like. Thus it will be seen that Mr. Eales has not carried matters further. He has translated Mabillon's text and notes, and that is all. He has done nothing to help the English reader; yet on several points connected with English affairs he might have referred to Miss Norgate's 'Angevin Kings.' But he has put away all temptations, and we can only hope that his erudition is being reserved till the translation makes way for the promised biography.

Of the translation itself we can only say that it is fluent, but makes no claim to literary distinction.

PROF. MARGOLIOUTH in his inaugural lecture, An Essay on the Place of Ecclesiastics in Semitic Literature (Clarendon Press, Oxford), endeavours to restore the original of Ben-Sira's Wisdom (which was, no doubt, written in New Hebrew), with the help of the Greek and the Syriac Peshito translations. Prof. Margoliouth is nearly certain that Jesus, the son of Sirach, wrote in metre, viz., in trimeters and tetrameters, and that he made many plays upon words. These two factors he takes for his guidance as to the words needed in his restoration. How did the professor find this out, since the original is lost? The translators do not mention that the book was written in metre, and in the few Hebrew quotations to be found in the Talmudic literature no trace of metre can be discovered. The consequence of the metrical hypothesis is that Prof. Margoliouth produces a great number of unidiomatic sentences in the specimens of his restoration which we have before us. For instance, in Specimen I. lines 10b and 11c cannot read as they stand. The restoration of xxx. 7, "he that spoils his son binds his wounds," and in Syriac, "his stripes will be many," is effected by the words לפנק בן ענב חבורותו, which could mean, according to the professor, when differently pointed, "he that spoils his son vexes his family." The irregularity of בן instead of בני is evident, and it is to be found in the Syriac translation, but בן is forced upon him by the metre; ענב, "to bind," is taken in the Syriac sense; חבורות, "family," is a new word which does not occur elsewhere; לפנק does not mean "will be many," and all these conjectures are due to the "massora" of the metre. Perhaps the original reading was לפנק בני ירבו חבורותיו "who spoils his son his stripes will be many" (Syriac version); the Greek translator may have read ירב, "will bind," instead of ירבו. On the same page we find the word נאם in the sense of נאם, and the Syriac root נאם, "to marvel," put in the mouth of Ben-Sira. In the second specimen, ii. 20a, אלי or עלי is unidiomatic; and 21a begins with a Syriac word followed by a short sentence in classical Hebrew, and concludes with the word אישון as "men" (Greek) or "eye" (Syriac); the one and the other are unacceptable. For the sake of metre "alive" is rendered by בחים (p. 14) instead of חי, and the strange word השנה for "year" or "sleep" is introduced (p. 15). In iv. 30, "Be not as a lion in thy house, nor capricious with thy servants," when the Syriac renders the second clause "nor angry and terrible in thy work," Prof. Margoliouth suggests that the original had כרב ולא כרב, "Nor as a bear amongst thy servants," whilst the Greek and the Syriac renderings stand for כרב, "a very familiar word in Arabic and New Syriac, meaning 'morose.'" Is it admissible that the translators were not able to guess the word כרב, "as a bear," and fell rather upon כרב, which does not mean "morose," and which is not familiar at all in New Syriac, as the professor says?—not to say that the כרב in כרב cannot represent "amongst," and that the Greek translator would not have taken the rare meaning of כרב "amongst thy servants" (Gen. xvi. 14 and Job i. 3), for the common meaning "in thy work." This forced and unnatural Hebrew characterizes the whole text with few exceptions; the Hebrew without the theory of metre could have been restored, where the translations are intelligible, in correct language, without the unnatural assistance of Syriac, Arabic, and even Sanskrit.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur, by Mark Twain (Samuel L. Clemens), published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus, is a rather laborious piece of fun with a sort of purpose in it.

One of the illustrations, early in the volume, represents a Yankee tickling with a straw the nose of a gigantic statue of a lion, and indicates the general nature of the serious purport of the 525 pages of that very American kind of American humour of which "Mark Twain" is the chief master. Laughing at British institutions, and showing that the good old times were uncommonly bad times for the people, and that not a few of the historical privileges which still exist do not suit the ideas of the great republic of the West, afford a good deal of harmless amusement and opportunities for very trite comment. It is a mistake to decide that ridicule cast upon the story of Arthur is an offence in any way other than in the matter of taste in jokes. Sir Thomas Malory and Lord Tennyson will survive. Masterpieces will stand any amount of parody. 'The Burial of Sir John Moore' and Gray's 'Elegy' are just as impressive and admirable as if they had not been parodied with all sorts of jocularity and ribaldry scores of times. One may easily read Mark Twain's book without any ill will; but it is a harder task to read it with sustained merriment. By writing so much the author has shown how mechanical his method really is, and, with all respect for the cleverness of the writers of Gaiety burlesques, one doubts if anybody could be amused by reading one of them if it ran to five hundred pages. That is, however, the sort of task which Mark Twain offers to his readers. One may be pardoned for confessing that the task has proved too severe. A trial of several chapters taken at random shows that the author is still as fresh as ever in his racy contrasts between things ancient and modern, and as quaint in his droll expressions. He can raise a laugh once, twice, or even twenty times, but not a thousand.

MR. FRANK R. STOCKTON'S Ting-a-Ling Tales (Ward & Downey) also makes demands on one's capacity for being amused, and one might be grateful to him if the boredom of trying to grin perpetually were not so oppressive. His book, however, is short, and his power of narration is excellent. His humour is not too peculiarly American, and it is often conveyed with a very pretty subtlety. The tales are about giants, dwarfs and fairies, princes, princesses, and magicians. The book market is well stocked with this class of article; but Mr. Stockton's work is decidedly a good specimen.

In Tennyson Land (Redway) is a pretty book. Mr. Walters, no doubt, had an enjoyable holiday when he visited Lincolnshire, and it is impossible not to feel a certain respect for his enthusiasm and single-mindedness; but there is something irritatingly prosaic in his conception of poetry. He seems to consider a poet is a species of photographer, possessed of no imagination, and only able to record what he has actually seen, without any power of combining, altering, or inventing. A letter we publish in another column upsets some of Mr. Walters's most elaborate hypotheses, which he has put together with the patience of a genuine Dryasdust. Such will always be the fate of matter-of-fact scholiasts who think that the poet is made in their own likeness.

MR. STOCK deserves our thanks for having published a literary curiosity in A Book for Boys and Girls; or, Country Rhymes for Children, by John Bunyan. This book, long sought for, turned up several years ago, having apparently been in the library at Stowe till its dispersion. Originally it had belonged to Narcissus Luttrell. Now it is in the Museum, as it should be. Mr. Stock has issued what he is pleased to call a facsimile, and he has wisely induced Dr. Brown to write an introduction, which, like Dr. Brown's other work on Bunyan, is excellent.—Carmen Macaronicum, a pretty little volume sent to us by Messrs. Gilbert & Rivington, consists of a number of short pieces translated from various languages, into English mostly, by Mr. Mollatt. In these he has been fairly successful, but he renders Jean Paul too literally, and he makes no more of Heine than other translators. Where did Mr. Mollett learn that Calderon died in 1687? Has he copied this blunder from Mr. Hole?

We have received from Mr. Murray a handsome and valuable work under the title of The Railways of America, by several writers, and with an introduction by Mr. Cooley, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission. All the great American railway names are found among the writers, as, for example, Mr. Charles Francis Adams, President of the Union Pacific, who writes on the prevention of railway strikes. The volume is beautifully illustrated. Portions of the work are suited to the scientific, and portions to the general reader. The story of the Texas jury which awarded damages to a tramp against a railway company, because a section-master's wife had given him a meal which disagreed with him, belongs to the latter. Many of the illustrations are full of American character, and thoroughly true to life. A work to be commended.

We have received from Messrs. Allen & Co. The Life of the Earl of Derby of "The Statesmen Series," by Mr. Kebbel, which is fully as good as his 'Lord Beaconsfield,'—high praise. The estimate of Lord Derby as a statesman and as a literary man is excellent, and the personal anecdotes are amusing. The author reminds us that Lord Aberdeen professed to think Lord Derby no orator, and there have been those who thought that he was no scholar and no poet; but we believe that the verdict of time on his translation of Homer will admit the justice of his literary claims, while so long as any of his great contemporaries remain with us the fame of his oratory will not die. A few of the anecdotes are couched in language which Mr. Kebbel says has "unhappily become obsolete"; but the author goes on to add: "To show what difficulties attend the discovery of truth, I have been assured quite recently by one of Lord Derby's most intimate and confidential friends that Lord Derby never swore in his life."

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. republish Socialism in England, by Mr. Sidney Webb, which had previously been published by the Johns Hopkins University of Baltimore, and which is the best general view of the subject from the moderate socialist side.

We have received from the author, Mr. H. H. Hayter, C.M.G., the Government Statist, the first half of the Victorian Year-Book for 1888-9, as this famous Australian year-book is in future to appear in two sections in place of the three of last year. The work, excellent as it always was, steadily improves, and it is now to be bought in London of Messrs. Trübner & Co.

ONE of the best books of reference known to us is Kelly's Handbook to the Titled, Landed, and Official Classes, a most convenient work, containing as it does all county magistrates and all members of the various "Orders," and enabling the reader to find in a moment all those persons who are commonly described as "somebody." The editor has gone out of his way to make a praiseworthy attempt to include some persons who do not come within his catalogues, but are well known, for example, as authors.

FROM M. Calmann Lévy there reaches us the new volume of "Pierre Loti," Au Maroc. When M. Julien Viaud comes in due course to be elected to the French Academy is he, we begin to wonder, to sit as Pierre Loti or as Capt. Viaud? In his present work he is more than ever the dreaming sceptic and less than ever the naval officer. Admirers of Fromentin will find in 'Au Maroc' much imitation of the great painter's two perfect books upon Algerian scenes; but the general public, which now votes Fromentin times over, will not find "Loti" less so, and the lover of poetic prose and of descriptive writing will think Loti inferior to the writer who has now evidently become for him the master. It will perhaps be news to the English agricultural classes that the word silo has long been in use among the Moors for their stores of vegetable food hidden away from the risks of war.

We have received catalogues from the following booksellers: Mr. Baker (theology), Mrs. Bennett (three), Messrs. Dulau (botany), Messrs. Ellis & Elvey (interesting and valuable), Mr. F. Edwards, Mr. Harvey (engraved portraits, A-B), Mr. F. H. Hutt (Alpine books, Thackerayana, &c.), Mr. A. Jackson, Messrs. Myers & Co., and Messrs. Fawn & Son of Bristol, Mr. Murray of Derby, Mr. Brown and Mr. Cameron of Edinburgh (both good), Mr. Commin of Exeter (books from Canon Lee's library), Mr. Howell of Liverpool, Mr. Simmons of Leamington, and Mr. Nichols of Sheffield. M. Charavay has sent us a catalogue of a valuable collection of autographs he is going to sell on Thursday next; M. Twietmeyer of Leipzig has forwarded a catalogue of French literature; and M. Rosenthal of Munich three interesting catalogues.

THE COUNTRY OF HAR.

FOR THE CENTENARY OF BLAKE'S 'SONGS OF INNOCENCE.'

ONCE a hundred years ago
 There was light in London town,
 For an angel of the snow
 Walked her street sides up and down.
 As a visionary boy
 He put forth his hand to smite
 Songs of innocence and joy
 From the crying chorals of night,
 Like a muttering of thunder
 Heard beneath the polar star;
 For his soul was all a-wonder
 At the calling vales of Har.

He, a traveller by day
 And a pilgrim of the sun,
 Took his unaccompanied way
 Where the journey is not done,
 Where no mortal might aspire
 His clear heart was set to climb,
 To the uplands of desire
 And the river wells of time.
 Home he wandered to the valley
 Where the springs of morning are,
 And the sea-bright cohorts rally
 On the twilight plains of Har.

There he found the Book of Thel
 In the lily-garth of bliss,
 Fashioned, how no man can tell,
 As a white windflower is:
 Like the lulling of a sigh
 Uttered in the trembling grass,
 When a shower is gone by,
 And the sweeping shadows pass,—
 Through the hyacinthine weather,
 Wheel them down without a jar,—
 Heaving all the dappled heather
 In the streaming vales of Har.

There was manna in the rain;
 And above the rills, a voice:
 "Son of mine, dost thou complain?
 I will make thee to rejoice.
 Thou shalt be a child to men,
 With confusion on thy speech;
 And the worlds within thy ken
 Shall not lie within thy reach.
 But the rainbirds shall discover,
 And the daffodils unbar,
 Quiet waters for their lover
 On the shining plains of Har.

"April rain and iron frost
 Shall make flowers to thy hand;
 Every field thy feet have crossed
 Shall revive from death's command.
 Hunting with a leash of wind
 Through the corners of the earth,
 Take the hounds of Spring to find
 The forgotten trails of mirth;
 For the lone child-heart is dying
 Of a love no time can mar,
 Hearing not a voice replying
 From the gladder vales of Har.

"Flame thy heart forth! Yet, no haste:
 Have not I prepared for thee
 The king's chambers of the East
 And the wind halls of the sea?
 Be a gossamer of things
 Nowhere written through the wild,
 With that gloaming call of Spring's
 When old secrets haunt the child.
 Let the bugler of my going
 Wake no clarion of war;
 For the paper reeds are blowing
 On the river plains of Har."

Centuries of soiled renown
 To the roaring dark have gone:
 There is woe in London town,
 And a crying for the dawn.
 April frost and iron rain
 Ripen the dead fruit of lust,
 And the sons of God remain
 The dream children of the dust.
 For their heart hath in derision,
 And their jeers have mocked afar,
 The delirium of vision
 From the holy vales of Har.

Once in Autumn came a dream:
 The white Herald of the North,
 Faring West to ford my stream,
 Passed my lodge and bade me forth;
 Glad I rose and went with him,
 With my shoulder in his hand;
 The auroral world grew dim,
 And the idle harvest land.
 Then I saw the warden lifting
 From its bergs the Northern bar,
 And eternal snows were drifting
 On the wind-bleak plains of Har.

"Listen humbly," said my guide.
 "I am drear, for I am death,"
 Whispered Snow; but Wind replied,
 "I outlive thee by a breath,
 I am time." And then I heard,
 Dearer than all wells of dew,
 One gray golden-shafted bird
 Hail the uplands; so I knew
 Spring, the angel of our sorrow,
 Tarrying so seeming far,
 Should return with some long morrow
 In the calling vales of Har.

LINES BY POPE.

NEITHER of your correspondents enlightens us as to the original appearance, in print or otherwise, of the 'Letter from Artemisa,' &c. It would be interesting to know how Pope came to seize upon the few lines which he heads 'A Description of Love.' Mr. Ward will evidently be surprised to hear that Throne with down is one of Pope's irregular rhymes, the reference to which he can find in Abbott's 'Concordance.' So this rather favoured the supposition of originality, taken in conjunction with the peculiar circumstances under which the two poems in Pope's hand appeared.

MRS. STANGER.

Hawthorns, Keswick.

A DEAR old lady, much beloved in this country, Mrs. Stanger, died at Keswick at the end of last week. She was probably the last link with the great writers who lived here, being in her eighty-sixth year, and remembering Wordsworth, Southey, Hartley Coleridge, and even S. T. Coleridge and Shelley. Mrs. Stanger was a daughter of William Calvert, and niece of Raisley Calvert. The Calverts came of the colony of German miners who settled in the valley of Newlands two centuries ago. When Coleridge came to Greta Hall in 1800 William Calvert was living at Windybrow, and the neighbours became friends. Wordsworth and his sister visited at Windybrow about that time, and at Raisley Calvert's death Wordsworth came into the legacy that enabled him to devote his life to poetry. It is thought by Profs. Dowden and Knight that William Calvert may have been "the noticeable man" in Wordsworth's 'Castle of Indolence.' Mrs. Stanger did not favour that notion; she thought she must have heard of it if either of the two men described had been meant for her father. She remembered Wordsworth very well, but did not appear to have been strongly impressed by him as a man. Southey, on the other hand, was, I am told, all but the god of her idolatry. His children and the children of Coleridge—Hartley, Derwent, and Sara—were her earliest companions in childhood. She knew Mrs. Coleridge intimately, and spoke of her as "a fine woman, but rather a fidgety body," with whom it might be hard for some men to get along comfortably. Of Hartley Coleridge she talked affectionately as of one whose weaknesses were a source of sorrow. I understand that she preserved to the last somewhat intimate relations with the Coleridge family. Of S. T. Coleridge she cannot have had very clear recollections. He lived but little at Keswick after 1804. She might have seen him on his visit in 1810, but it is probable that all she remembered of Coleridge came of visits to the Wordsworths at Grasmere. Her memories of Shelley, however, date almost as far back. Shelley came here first from York in 1811, when he was flying with Harriet from the atmosphere of Hogg. In December of that year he visited the Duke of Norfolk at Grey-stoke, and met William Calvert there. On his return to Keswick he stayed a week at Windybrow, then Greta Bank—a new house on or near the same site as the old house, and standing not on the Penrith Road, but on the bank above across the river. There Shelley met Southey. Mrs. Stanger was a child of six at this time, but she remembered Shelley perfectly. One little story that she told of him was too like Shelley to be questioned. Either while living at Chesnut Cottage, or on his visit to Greta Bank the year following, Shelley announced that in his bag he had brought a present for Mrs. Calvert's little girl. The bag was fetched into the drawing-room, and opened amidst great excitement, but on being searched no present was found there—Shelley had left it behind. Mrs. Stanger could not in the least remember what Shelley was like to look upon. She could just recall the figure of a young man, and the sense of having heard him speak, and his look of amazement at this little disaster, and her own blank disappointment. These are very trifling matters, all of them, but it has given me a genuine and, I trust, not unworthy thrill of the heart to feel that down to the end of last week there lived close to my own door one who knew Southey, had been spoken to by Wordsworth, been patted on the head by Coleridge, and had "once seen Shelley plain."

A HERO OF 'THE DUNCIAD.'

ONE of the most interesting chapters in Mr. Courthope's 'Life of Pope,' recently reviewed in these columns, is that which describes the 'War with the Dunces.' Pope's literary triumphs and financial prosperity could hardly fail to make him many enemies, and his social success would be still more galling to his less fortunate rivals. Among the authors who took part in the contest with Pope was Thomas Cooke, known to his contemporaries as "Hesiod" Cooke, and his history furnishes a good example of a typical 'Dunciad' hero. This unhappy man was born in 1702 at Braintree, in Essex, where his father, a member of the sect called Muggletonians, kept a tavern. Thomas Cooke was educated at Felstead, and on leaving school he obtained a situation, probably as librarian, in the household of the Earl of Pembroke. The employment appears to have been uncongenial, or in any case it was not long retained, for Cooke came up to London in 1722, when he was twenty years of age, and embarked on a literary career. His first known publication is a poem on the death of the Duke of Marlborough, issued soon after the author's arrival in London, and from then till the time of his death he was continually producing poems, plays, fables, works on the drama, and translations of the classics, besides occasionally writing songs for the concerts at Vauxhall, and contributing to the daily papers.

In the quarrel with Pope it appears that Cooke was the aggressor. Pope was mentioned in some uncomplimentary lines in 'The Battle of the Poets,' a poem published by Cooke in 1725. The satire was not particularly offensive, but Cooke had criticized Pope's Homer; he was also the author of the 'Scandalous Chronicle,' and a year or two later he was suspected of writing some "malevolent things in the British, London, and Daily Journals." It was known, moreover, that he was on intimate terms with Welsted, Theobald, Concanen, Ambrose Philips, and other enemies of Pope. Cooke's name was accordingly marked down for punishment, and some quotations from his poems were given by Pope in 'The Art of Sinking in Poetry' (1727), as examples of the "inanity or nothingness," and of the "expletive." In 'The Dunciad' (1728) Cooke was again held up to ridicule. In the early editions his name was only designated by initials, but when it was known that the satire would before long be republished with notes and a commentary, Cooke became alarmed, and sent a letter of abject apology to Pope, denying the authorship of "the scurrilous Pieces which have been lately printed in the Daily Papers," but confessing that he had formerly written a poem ('The Battle of the Poets') of which, he states, "I am now sincerely ashamed." The letter was accompanied by "a mean present" of the writer's translation of Hesiod. Pope was unable to trust Cooke's protestations and denials, nor would he accept the books, but he sent the letter on to Lord Oxford with a reply, and requested that nobleman to communicate with Cooke through Mr. Samuel Wesley, the usher of Westminster School, and author of 'Neck or Nothing,' a satiric poem on Curll. There was some difficulty at first in carrying out Pope's wishes. Wesley had gone into the country for his holidays; Cooke's creditors were just then giving him trouble, and he, as Lord Oxford wrote, was "at hide and not to be found." Pope's answer at length reached Cooke, who wrote another letter, again expressing his deep repentance, and declaring that in the next edition of his works 'The Battle of the Poets' should be entirely left out. These explanations were not, however, considered satisfactory. In the variorum 'Dunciad' Cooke was the subject of a very sarcastic note, and a few years later he was again unfavourably mentioned by Pope in the 'Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot,' and in the Grub Street Journal. It is unlikely that these attacks could have really done Cooke any serious harm in his profession. He had never any reputation as an author, and his chief profits were derived from the patrons to whom his books were dedicated. He was wretchedly paid for his literary work. For writing a life of Andrew Marvell and editing his works Cooke received from Curll the sum of five pounds, but the edition was dedicated to Lord Pembroke, who probably was much more liberal in his reward than the publisher. Cooke, in fact, lived by his dedications and by the subscriptions which he received for his translations of the classics. His best-known work was a translation of Hesiod, of which the frontispiece was engraved by Hogarth, and among the subscribers' names were those of Theobald, Aaron Hill, Concannon, John Dennis, and other writers who were pilloried with Cooke in 'The Dunciad.'

Cooke lived in a wretched hovel at Lambeth, but in the company of strangers he spoke as if he was the owner of a magnificent mansion. His neighbours were very kind to him, and he could generally get a meal at the house of one of these good Samaritans, who, moreover, assisted him occasionally with small pecuniary loans on the security of the borrower's note of hand. After Cooke's death Sir Joseph Mawbey, who wrote a memoir of Cooke in the Gentleman's Magazine, burnt a handful of these interesting documents. For the last ten or fifteen years of his life Cooke's literary productions were chiefly confined to short poetical pieces, and odes dedicated to Sir John Ligonier (one of his most generous patrons), to the Duke of Newcastle, to the Duke of Dorset, or, in fact, to anybody from whom he could get a few guineas. His chief resource, however, was his translation of Plautus, which was to be published by subscription in ten volumes. The idea of this work appears to have been conceived about 1740, in which year Cooke wrote to Sir Thos. Hanmer, begging permission to dedicate to him one of the ten volumes, all of which, he writes, were completed. Each volume was to be dedicated to some "person of great worth," and "without the usual views of addresses of that kind, being determined to admit of no return in whatever manner offered." All that the translator asked for was a subscription of two guineas for a set of copperplates to embellish the work. The writer goes on to offer assistance to Sir Thomas in his forthcoming edition of Shakspeare. The letter is a masterpiece of its kind, and shows a skill and resource which could only have been attained by long practice. When Cooke died, sixteen years afterwards, only one of the ten volumes of Plautus had appeared, and nothing was ever heard of the copperplates. Cooke, however, obtained one literary triumph which fairly claims to be recorded. In a letter to the Comedian, or Philosophical Enquirer, of May, 1732, of which he was editor, Cooke proposed an alteration in a line of Epistle IV. of Pope's 'Moral Essays,' and the suggestion was ultimately adopted.

Among his Grub Street brethren Cooke seems to have been popular. His most intimate friend was Leonard Welsted, and at one time he saw a good deal of Savage, whom he assisted as far as he could when that eccentric individual was awaiting his trial for the murder of Sinclair. But in later times Savage was suspected of acting as Pope's spy, and the relations between him and Cooke were a good deal strained.

In politics Cooke was an advanced Liberal; in religion he was a Deist. We know little of his personal appearance, except that he was above the middle height, and had a cast in his left eye. He married early in life a Miss Anne Beckingham, and had an only daughter, who survived him. Cooke died in great poverty and distress at Lambeth, in December, 1756, and his wife survived him only a few weeks. Their daughter was left entirely destitute, but Macklin, the actor, and a few other friends, assisted her till her profligate conduct obliged them to leave the unhappy girl to her fate. The year after her father's death she was admitted, in a state of pregnancy, into the Lambeth Workhouse, where in a short time she died.

THE LOCALIZING CRAZE.

I SUBJOIN the following extract from a letter of Mr. Hallam Tennyson's on a book called 'In Tennyson Land':—

"The poems which he quotes—'The Owl,' 'Dying Swan,' 'Orlana,' 'Supposed Confessions,' 'The Miller's Daughter,' 'Lady Clara Vere de Vere,' 'The May Queen,' 'The Lotos Eaters,' 'The Gardener's Daughter,' the prologue and conclusion of 'The Princess,' the sketch of Sir Henry Vivian, 'Maud,' and 'The Brook'—have nothing of Lincolnshire about them, and are purely imaginative creations.

"The dramatic personæ of the two 'Locksley Halls,' of 'The Northern Farmer,' of 'The Northern Cobbler,' and of 'The Village Wife' are not portraits drawn from particular individuals, but,

As imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name."

Lord Tennyson informed a recent visitor to Farringford that Locksley Hall is no particular hall, and the Moated Grange is no particular grange. But the localizing craze is already busy upon them. So profoundly undramatic is the temper of our time that a poet is not considered capable of imagining any dramatic action, or even a scene of any dramatic action. Had 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' been written by a contemporary poet, the public would have demanded, and the literary and artistic "providers" would have promptly provided, a "photograph from life" of Titania and an "accurate water-colour drawing" of the bank whereon the wild thyme blows.

Literary Gossip.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD & SONS will immediately publish the correspondence between Mr. Pitt and the Duke of Rutland, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from 1781 to 1787. The letters throw much fresh light upon the conduct of Grattan's Parliament, upon the condition of the country, the factious conduct of the Irish leaders, and upon the early ideas for establishing a union with Great Britain. This correspondence was collected and edited by Earl Stanhope for the Rutland family, and a few copies privately printed; but the volume seems to have been lost sight of until it was unexpectedly recovered by the present Duke of Rutland when arranging his family papers. The Duke of Rutland has prefaced the volume by an introductory note, and this important correspondence will now, for the first time, be laid before the public.

MR. HENRY JAMES has for some time been engaged in dramatizing one of his own novels.

THE March number of Harper's Magazine will contain an essay on John Ruskin, written by Mrs. Thackeray Ritchie, accompanied by numerous illustrations of Brantwood. General Wesley Merritt, U.S.A., also writes on 'The Army of the United States,' with illustrations.

DR. VON DÖLLINGER some time before his death entrusted the translation of his last work, 'Academic Studies,' to an English lady, Miss Warre. Her English version is now completed and in the printer's hands, and will be published in a few weeks by Mr. Murray. "These famous essays," as Mr. Gladstone has styled them, include 'The Jews in Europe,' 'Dante,' 'Madame de Maintenon,' &c.

SIR GEORGE SITWELL, of Renishaw Hall, Derbyshire, whose work on the Barons of Pulford we review in another column, is engaged in writing a work on wayfaring life in England during the Restoration, for which he has collected considerable materials. It will be somewhat on the same lines as M. Jusserand's 'Vie Nomade.'

THE sixth volume of the 'History of the Irish Confederation and War in Ireland,' by Mr. J. T. Gilbert, F.S.A., will, it is expected, be issued towards the close of the present month. In it are included many original letters and papers hitherto unpublished relative to the affairs of England and Ireland from 1646 to 1648, illustrated with portraits and facsimiles. The work, it is stated, will be completed in seven volumes.

MR. FISHER UNWIN will shortly publish a new novel in two volumes by Mr. C. F. Keary, author of 'A Wanderer.' It will be in the form of letters, and probably be called 'A Marriage de Convenience.'

MESSRS. BLACK, of Edinburgh, have just acquired for their London establishment a large block on the west side of Soho Square extending back to Dean Street. The firm will remove its headquarters to Soho Square next summer; but we are glad to say it has no intention of severing its connexion with Edinburgh, where the business was commenced at the beginning of the century by the late Mr. Adam Black.

THE 'Government Year-Book,' the object of which was to combine a record of the forms and methods of political government throughout the world with a survey of the constitutional changes occurring year by year in various countries, will be published henceforth not as an annual, but in successive editions, as may appear desirable from the number and importance of such changes. The third edition of the work, including an estimate of the political tendencies of the more important states, will make its appearance next Easter.

A SMALL brochure on the 'Source of the "Ancient Mariner,"' by Mr. Ivor James, Registrar of the University College of South Wales and Monmouthshire, will be issued almost immediately by Messrs. D. Owen & Co. of Cardiff. Mr. James argues that the source of the poem, of which Wordsworth gave one version and De Quincey another, is to be found in the 'Strange and Dangerous Voyage of Capt. Thomas James,' printed in London in 1633, a copy of which it is almost certain Coleridge must have read.

MR. CHARLES KENT had to undergo another formidable surgical operation on Wednesday last, but we are glad to learn he has passed through it satisfactorily.

MISS DANIEL, of Girton College, will contribute a long paper to the March number of the Classical Review on the idea of immortality in Greek tragedy. Prof. R. Y. Tyrrell will review in the same number Mr. Rutherford's edition of the fourth book of Thucydides; Prof. Margoliouth, Soltau on the "Punica" in the Pœnulus of Plautus; Prof. J. E. B. Mayor, Mr. Hardy's edition of 'Pliny's Correspondence with Trajan'; and Mr. Hodgkin, Mr. Bury's 'History of the Later Roman Empire.'

THE late Miss Naden's book on 'Induction and Deduction,' which was intended to be an historical and critical sketch of successive philosophical conceptions, is to be issued by Messrs. Bickers. It has been edited by Dr. R. Lewins, of the Army Medical Department.

THE American branch of the publishing business of Cassell & Co., Limited, has been acquired by a syndicate of American citizens, trading from and after January 1st, 1890, under the designation of "The Cassell Publishing Company." The new company will be carried on under the management of Mr. O. Dunham, who has been associated for many years with the business, and the American company will continue to act as the specially authorized agents throughout the United States and Canada for the sale of the publications and works of the English company, which, on its part, will act similarly in Great Britain, the colonies, and on the continent of Europe for the American publications of the Cassell Publishing Company. The Cassell Publishing Company, New York, will receive payment for all accounts due to, and discharge all claims against, the American branch of Cassell & Co., Limited, to December 31st, 1889.

'LETTERS TO LIVING AUTHORS' is the title of a work by Mr. J. A. Stewart which Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. have in the press. It is to contain also the portraits of many English and American authors.

MR. ADAM, of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, who has already edited an excellent edition of the 'Apology,' is going to bring out, through the Cambridge University Press, an edition in four volumes of 'Plato's Republic,' provided with an introduction, notes, and a translation. The first volume will contain the general introduction and translation; the second, books i.-iii. of the Greek text, with introduction and notes; the third, books iv.-vii., with introduction and notes; and the fourth, the remaining books, with introduction and notes. It is proposed to issue vol. i. last of the four. The introduction will deal critically and exegetically with the structure and doctrine of the Republic, and the translation will aim at reproducing the peculiarities of Plato's style as far as is consistent with the English idiom, especial stress being laid on the evolution of Plato's reasoning.

PREBENDARY RANDOLPH, whose edition of some of the old registers of the diocese of Exeter has obtained favourable notice in these columns, will contribute a second paper to the Newbery House Magazine on the subject commenced last month, viz., 'The Parish and the Manor Six Hundred Years Ago.' The special point to be discussed in the March number is whether the then Dean and Chapter of Exeter made good rectors and landlords. The part played by Wales in the history of the English Church will be the subject of another article in the same number, from the pen of Canon Roberts, of Cardiff.

THE Rev. C. Yeld, of University School, Nottingham, sends us some words of explanation called forth by the letter of Mr. Tennyson's that we published last week:—

"The poem, which I quoted from memory at the dinner of our Literary Club without any thought of its ever getting into the London papers, was one that had quite become public property among the friends of Henry Bradshaw. They had been shown it and allowed to take copies of it for the last thirty years to my certain knowledge (a version correcting mine in two or three words has been sent to the papers by a gentleman in Belfast), and when I quoted it to our small club I never thought that any vexation could be caused either to Lord Tennyson or the friends of the lady. But when prominence was given to it by the Daily News I wrote to both, apologizing if my having allowed the poem such unexpected publicity had caused any annoyance, and giving this explanation."

THE death is announced of Mr. Thomas Paul, editor of the Falkirk Herald. He had been for a long period connected with journalism, and at one time was head of the reporting staff of the Scotsman. The decease has also to be recorded of Mr. Robert Knight, formerly editor of the Times of India, and the starter, in conjunction with the late Col. Osborn, of the Statesman, a journal which, after a brief existence in London, migrated to Calcutta.

THE Austro-German admirers of Scheffel, the poet of the 'Trompeter von Säckingen,' have formed a society under the name of "Scheffel-Bund." In order to commemorate this event they will shortly issue, under the editorship of Herr A. Breitner, a Scheffel-Gedenkbuch, which is to contain contributions from quite a host—the number of one hundred is mentioned—of writers, artists, and composers.

AMONG the papers left by the lately deceased Prof. Giesebrecht, of Munich, the last part of the fifth volume of his 'Geschichte der Deutschen Kaiserzeit' has been found. This posthumous instalment brings down the history of the first German Empire to the end of the reign of Barbarossa.

SHARES in the Revue des Deux Mondes, which in 1848 brought in 5 per cent., have been steadily increasing in value, and now return 150 per cent. on the original outlay.

PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN, of Harvard University, died in Cambridge, U.S., on January 21st. He passed the larger part of his life as a teacher in the service of his alma mater.

In 1843 he succeeded Dr. Palfrey as editor and proprietor of the North American Review, and he continued so to be for more than ten years. Among his most important publications were: 'Documents of the Constitution of England and America from Magna Charta to the Federal Constitution of 1789'; 'Principles of Political Economy applied to the Condition, Resources, and Institutions of the American People'; 'A Treatise on Logic'; 'American Political Economy'; 'Modern Philosophy from Descartes to Schopenhauer and Hartmann'; and 'Gleanings of a Literary Life.'

PROF. HARTENSTEIN, of Leipzig, has died at Jena. He was a copious writer on philosophy, but is best known as the editor of the collected editions of the works of Kant and Herbart. The famous Brunswick publisher H. Vieweg is also dead at the age of sixty-three. He was the last of his race, and he is said to have bequeathed his villa and grounds and various other things (for he lived in splendour, as becomes a publisher) to his native city. The death is also announced, near Windischgrätz, of the chief of Slavonic poets, Davorin Trstenjak, a country clergyman who had held several preferments in Lower Styria. Besides writing poetry he was an authority on Croatian history. As a member of the Diet he was a stout opponent of the Illyrian movement.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are Local Taxation Returns, England, 1887-8, Parts III.-VI. (5s.); and Educational Endowments, Ireland, Commission, Report for 1888-9 (4s.).

SCIENCE

A Naturalist in North Celebes. By Sydney J. Hickson. (Murray.)

WE must confess that the expectations of pleasure raised by the sight of Dr. Hickson's book of travels have not been realized. It is another example of the specialization of modern studies that one who was quite qualified to investigate "the anatomy and, if possible, the development of certain corals," does not appear to have had the ordinary equipment of a naturalist. Dr. Hickson, we are astonished to learn, found to his "surprise" chelifers or tail-less scorpions fixed on to the wings of beetles. Not only is it a text-book statement that chelifers attach themselves to insects, but Hagen and others have recorded their presence under the elytra of beetles. The statement that cephalopods have a "remarkable power of adapting the colour of their skin to the colour of the surrounding objects" is far too general; in Tunis, as Consul Green reports, the octopods "are attracted by all white, smooth, and bright substances," and "the natives deck places in the creeks and hollows of the rock with white stones and shells, over which the polypi spread themselves, and so are caught from four to eight at a time." The same remark may apply to the statement that "many of the alcyonarians are supported by other skeletal substances than lime. The flexible corals, Gorgoniidae [or, more correctly, Gorgoniidae], possess a solid core of horny substance"; for, as Kölliker first pointed out, Plexaurella is distinguished from Plexaura by the deposit of carbonate of lime in the horny substance. Antedon roseus, again, is said to be "not uncommon in some localities in the English Channel," but there would have been evidence of wider knowledge had it been said to be very common on many parts of the English coast. "It might be thought," says Dr. Hickson, "that it is the simplest thing in the world to 'collect' a sea-anemone"; but surely not by any one who has ever done an hour's shore-collecting. As a matter of fact, sea-anemones are one of the most difficult of groups to collect in anything like a satisfactory manner.

It is a pity that our author's English is so loose that it is difficult to understand him at times without considerable effort; for example, describing the ingenious manner of keeping time in Manganiu, he says: "Twelve short sticks are hung upon a string, marked with notches from one to twelve, and a hook is placed between the stick bearing the number of notches corresponding to the hour which was last struck and the next one." Again, discussing the distribution of certain mammals, he explains it thus: "The fact that many of the squirrels, rats, and bats are identical or very similar in the two islands is not to be wondered at, for these could easily be drifted across the narrow straits separating the links in the chain of connecting islands on drifting timber." In the next place, there is an evidence of self-consciousness which forces on our attention the author more than the places he visited; his lunches and his baths remind us of a distinguished lady's love of tea. And lastly, to conclude this grumbling, we note what some may think a failing and some may not; that is, the extraordinary lack of humour. Most authors, we hope, would have corrected in the "revise" such remarks as:—

"The women, of whom we saw very little, wore only a sarong folded round the waist—no bracelets, necklaces, or hairpins of any description. Their long dirty black hair was simply tied in a knot on the top of the head. They all ran into the houses as we approached the village, and all we could see of them afterwards was a row of their uncomely heads watching us over the balustrades, or peeping at us through the chinks in the walls."

We cannot quite make out the story of the game of whist, though we saw the dénoûment at once. A Chinese trader had for "his partner" an Arab; Dr. Hickson's friend "and partner" was a Dutchman; the four played whist till the early hours of the morning, without, so far as we learn, any change of "partners," "and the end of it all was that the Chinaman was victorious." Of course he was! but how about his "partner"? Dr. Hickson has either told the story in exactly or this Chinaman outdid the Heathen Chinese.

Let us turn to the leading characteristics of Dr. Hickson's book, which we are glad to be able to admire. He has a strong and sturdy common sense; and he is able to see that the British Constitution is not the only rational form of government. He has a keen sense of natural beauty, and is at his best when describing what he saw. The top of the Ruang volcano, which was reached with great difficulty, gave a splendid view.

"It is impossible for me to describe the beauty of the view from this commanding position, for no words of mine can do justice to the richness and variety of the colouring or the tone and boldness of the outline. The clearness of the atmosphere in the dry summer months of this tropical region not only renders objects at a distance remarkably clear and distinct, but seems also to exaggerate the intensity of colouring of sea and forest. The wide expanse of the sea at our feet, of that deep sapphire-blue colour which is only met with in the deep waters of the great oceans, framed by the greenish-blue water of the shores and coral lagoons, the great expanse of the blue heavens, broken only by a single cloud stationary over the distant Siau volcano, the infinite variety of the green and brown foliage on the forest slopes of the neighbouring island, and then in the far distance the azure mountains of Minahassa in one direction and of the Sangir Islands in another, presented one of those magnificent panoramic pictures which it has rarely been my good fortune to see and which once seen can never be forgotten."

It was a great misfortune for Dr. Hickson to be taken so ill that he had to leave his station on Talisse Island so suddenly that many of his collections were imperfectly preserved, and on his return found to be more or less completely destroyed. We should like, however, to note one or two points in which he has made additions to our knowledge. The well-known organ-pipe (Tubipora) coral appears to be so common because its polypae are able to tightly contract themselves, and so to live when left partially dry. A number of species of the genus Tubipora have been described on differences which are now proved conclusively to depend entirely upon the position of the coral on the reef; all the forms described may be found living together, and they should all be regarded as representatives of one species. The blood of various of their allies was known to turn blue on exposure to the oxygen of the air, but the author was the first to observe the fact in centipedes. For the first time a correct account of the structure of a typical coral is given in a general work, but it is to be feared that the ordinary reader may find it too technical and the anatomist not detailed enough. The illustrations are very well done. The latter portion of the work deals with the ethnology of the Celebes district, but the greater part, though of interest, is "borrowed from the valuable writings to be found in many of the reports of missionary and other societies and in Dutch periodicals." The account of land tenure in Minahassa may be recommended to the attention of the penitent philosopher, the practical physiologist, and the socialistic Scotchmen who have lately been addressing the editor of the Times.

He also read notes on the recent discovery of a menhir, found built up as old material in the wall of Gulval Church, Cornwall. It has a key pattern and two letters in Roman character worked in the granite of the country.—A paper was then read, by Mr. M. Drury, on a supposed Roman causeway at Lincoln. This consists of a deep concrete mass which has been traced beneath the course of the Roman road which still forms the southern approach to Lincoln. The positions of a vast number of Roman discoveries were indicated on a large map, and the finds were described at length.

ARCHEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—Feb. 6.—Mr. T. H. Baylis in the chair.—Mr. J. L. André read a paper on Burton Church, Sussex. The building has but little to recommend itself from a structural point of view, but contains several most interesting features—(1) a rood screen and loft; (2) a wall painting of a female saint crucified head downwards on a cross saltire; (3) an effigy of a lady 3 ft. 6 in. in length; and (4) a brass of a Dame Goring clad in an heraldic tabard instead of the usual mantle. From this lady were descended the two Goringes who played so conspicuous a part in the civil wars of the seventeenth century.—The Rev. Dr. J. L. Cox exhibited a vesica-shaped private seal of amber, mounted in a plain rim of silver, with a suspending loop attached. It was found in a stone coffin at Old Malton Priory. The lettering, somewhat rude Lombardic, shows it to be of the thirteenth century. The emblems engraved on the seal are a fish, a tree, a bird, and a lion. The legend runs thus, "Secretum signum fons piscis avis leo lignum." The material of the seal (amber) makes this specimen of an ecclesiastical seal of peculiar interest, and it is at present believed to be unique. The Rev. Dr. Cox also exhibited various Romano-British articles of bronze, pottery, and bone, found in January last in Deepdale Cave, near Buxton, by Mr. M. Salt, as well as some relics of earlier inhabitants of this cavern.

ZOOLOGICAL.—Feb. 4.—Prof. W. H. Flower, President, in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions made to the Society's menagerie during January.—Communications were read: from Mr. W. K. Parker, on the morphology of the hoatzin (Opisthocomus cristatus), the author treating of the early stages of the development of this reptilian bird, and its shoulder-girdle, sternum, and hind limbs,—from Mr. A. D. Bartlett, on wolves, jackals, dogs, and foxes,—from Mr. G. E. Dobson, on the genera of the family Soricidae, in which family the author recognized nine genera, and divided them into two sub-families; new methods of defining the genera were introduced, each genus was briefly characterized, and remarks on certain genera not admitted in the synopsis (although hitherto generally recognized) were appended,—by Mr. F. E. Beddard, on some species of earthworm of the genus Perichæta,—from Mr. J. M. Leslie, on the habits and oviposition of the clawed glossogloss frog (Xenopus laevis), as observed at Port Elizabeth, Cape Colony, where this species was said to be of ordinary occurrence,—and by Mr. O. Thomas, on a collection of mammals from Central Vera Cruz, Mexico, made by a scientific expedition organized by the authorities of the Mexican Museum, under the superintendence of Dr. F. Ferrari-Perez. The collection consisted of about one hundred specimens, belonging to twenty-one species. Amongst these, two (a hare and a squirrel) were described as new, and proposed to be called Sciurus niger melanonotus and Lepus vera-crucis.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—Feb. 5.—Right Hon. Lord Walsingham, President, in the chair.—Messrs. B. A. Bristowe, J. E. Eastwood, A. B. Farn, and O. Goldthwaite were elected Fellows; and Mr. R. S. Standen was admitted into the Society.—Mr. F. D. Godman exhibited a specimen of Papilio thoas from Alamos, Mexico, showing an aberration in the left hind wing.—Mr. R. Trimen remarked that butterflies of the genus Papilio were seldom liable to variation.—Mr. C. G. Barrett exhibited a series of specimens of Physcia subornatella, Dup., from Pembroke, the east and west of Ireland, the Isle of Man, and Perthshire; and a series of Physcia adornatella, Tr., from Box Hill, Folkestone, Norfolk, and Reading; also a number of intermediate forms taken in the Isle of Portland by Mr. N. M. Richardson. He said that these forms proved the identity of the two supposed species, which he believed were both referable to P. dilutella, Hb. He also exhibited specimens of Hesperia lineola, a pale variety of it taken in Cambridgeshire by Mr. H. W. Vivian; specimens of Epischia banksiella, a recently described species, taken in Portland; and a specimen of Retinia margaritana, H.-S., a species new to Britain, discovered amongst a number of Retinia pinivora collected in Scotland.—Mr. W. H. B. Fletcher showed a series of Gelechia fumatella from sandhills in Hayling Island and near Littlehampton, and, for comparison, a series of G. distinctella from the same places. He also showed a few bred specimens of G. terrella, and a series of preserved larvae. On the downs the larvae live in the middle of the tufts of such grasses as Festuca ovina and allied species; and on sandhills, where herbage is more sparse, they make silken galleries under stones, and sally forth to eat blades of grass growing near their homes.—Mr. H. Goss read a communication from Dr. Clemow, of Cronstadt, on the subject of the alleged coincidence of vast flights and blights of insects during the years 1510, 1757, 1763, 1782, 1783, 1836, and 1847, and the epidemic of influenza. During 1889 no unusual activity in the insect world had been recorded.—Mr. H. T. Stainton and Mr. M'Lachlan made some remarks on the subject.—Mr. G. A. J. Rothney communicated 'Notes on Flowers avoided by Bees.' It appeared, according to the author's observations made in India, that dahlias were exceptionally attractive, but that the passion-flower was only resorted to by a few species of Xylocopa; and that, with one exception, he had never seen any insects feeding on the flowers of the oleander.—Lord Walsingham, Mr. Slater, Col. Swinhoe, Mr. Trimen, and Mr. M'Lachlan took part in the discussion which ensued.—Dr. D. Sharp read a paper entitled 'On the Structure of the Terminal Segment in some Male Hemiptera,'—Col. Swinhoe one 'On the Moths of Burma,' which contained descriptions of several new genera and 107 new species,—and Dr. F. A. Dixey one 'On the Phylogenetic Significance of the Wing-Markings in certain Genera of the Nymphalidae.'—A long discussion ensued, in which Lord Walsingham, Mr. Jenner-Weir, Capt. Elwes, Mr. Trimen, and others, took part.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Feb. 7.—Col. Michael in the chair.—A paper 'On the Utility of Forests and the Study of Forestry' was read before the Indian Section by Dr. Schlich.

Feb. 10.—Mr. W. H. Preece in the chair.—The fourth and concluding lecture of his course of Cantor Lectures 'On the Electro-Magnet' was delivered by Dr. S. P. Thompson.

Feb. 11.—Mr. H. H. Statham in the chair.—A paper 'On Cast Iron and its Treatment for Artistic Purposes' was read before the Applied Art Section by Mr. W. R. Lethaby.

Feb. 12.—Sir D. Galton in the chair.—A paper by Mr. G. Findlay, manager London and North-Western Railway, 'On Modern Improvements in Facilities for Railway Travelling,' was read, and was followed by a discussion.

PHYSICAL.—Feb. 7.—Prof. Reinold, President, in the chair.—The reports of the Council and of the Treasurer were read and adopted. The former stated that there had been a very satisfactory increase in the number of members during the year. The number now exceeds 360, of whom 80 are Fellows of the Royal Society. During the year the Council had proposed to change the time of meeting of the Society from Saturday afternoon to Friday evening. The change was adopted by the members by a vote of 129 to 30, and had resulted in a larger attendance at the meetings. During the year the second volume of the translations of important foreign memoirs had been issued to the members, and it was hoped that a third volume would be published early in the present session. The Council had to regret the loss by death of three well-known members, James P. Joule, Warren De La Rue, and Father Perry. A valuable collection of books had been given the Society by the Royal Astronomical Society. From the Treasurer's report it appeared that the balance of the Society had been increased by 120*l.* during the year.—Prof. Hittorf, of Münster, was, at the recommendation of the Council, elected an Honorary Member.—The result of the new election of officers was declared as follows: President, Prof. W. E. Ayrton; Vice-Presidents, Dr. E. Atkinson, W. Baily, S. Bidwell, and Prof. S. P. Thompson; Secretaries, Prof. J. Perry and T. H. Blakesley; Treasurer, Prof. A. W. Ricker; Demonstrator, C. V. Boys; Other Members of the Council, W. H. Coffin, Sir J. Conroy, C. W. Cooke, Major-General Festing, Prof. J. V. Jones, Prof. O. Lodge, Prof. W. Ramsay, W. N. Shaw, H. Tomlinson, and G. M. Whipple.—The meeting was then resolved into an ordinary science meeting.—Messrs. E. W. Smith and R. E. Holland were elected Members, and Mr. S. Evershed was proposed as a Member.—The paper 'On Galvanometers,' by Prof. W. E. Ayrton, Mr. T. Mather, and Dr. W. E. Sumpner, was then resumed by Prof. Ayrton.

HUGUENOT.—Feb. 10.—Sir H. W. Peck, V.P., in the chair.—The Rev. H. A. Olivier, Messrs. W. de Neufville and H. E. Hovenden were elected Fellows.—A paper was read 'On the Life of Madame Du Noyer,' by Miss F. Layard.

SHORTHAND.—Feb. 5.—Mr. J. G. Petrie, President, in the chair.—Mr. J. Sandow, Foreign Associate, was admitted as a Fellow, and Mr. W. Mann was elected an Associate.—A paper by Mr. Sandow, on 'Stenotachygraphy,' was read by Mr. H. Richter, Vice-President. The system was published in Germany in 1875 by Lehmann, but its authorship has been the subject of dispute.—An interesting discussion on the differences between English and German rapid writing followed.—A paper by Dr. Westby-Gibson on Simon Bordley, author of the first script or graphic system, 1787, was deferred. The paper will be read at the March meeting, and will appear with a facsimile reprint of Bordley's scarce work, about to be published by Mr. McCaskie, a Fellow of the Society.

Science Gossip.

We regret to announce the death of Dr. Wentworth Erck, F.R.A.S., at his residence at Sherrington, Shankill, co. Dublin, on the 15th ult. Of late years his chief attention was devoted to politics, especially in connexion with the Irish land question; but many astronomical papers have appeared from his pen in the Transactions of the Royal Dublin Society, the Monthly Notices of the Royal Astronomical Society (these were principally on methods of observation and instrumental appliances), and other scientific publications.

Prof. Otto Struve has resigned the directorship of the Pulkowa Observatory, which he has held during the last twenty-five years, having succeeded his father, W. Struve, in 1864.

The death has been announced of the eminent meteorologist Prof. Buys-Ballot, of Utrecht, in the seventy-third year of his age.

FINE ARTS

The Art of Wood-Engraving in Italy in the Fifteenth Century. By F. Lippmann. Illustrated. (Quaritch.)

(First Notice.)

This is an English version, much enlarged and greatly improved, of a series of articles which originally appeared in the Jahrbuch der K. Preussischen Kunstsammlungen, and was subsequently reprinted without alteration in a volume. To this country the learned Keeper of the Prints at Berlin pays a compliment in giving it the benefit of the improvements that further research has suggested, and in enlarging the number of facsimiles and notes. His book is confined to the quattrocento and to the xylographers who worked in Italy. The productions of each city are treated independently, so that the student can refer to what is said about each of them with or without regard to the others. Of course Florence, the most important of them, and, according to Dr. Lippmann, the fountain-head of wood-engraving in Italy, receives by far the greater part of his attention. The "single-leaf" and other cuts which answered to our broad-sides, and, very soon after xylography was given to popular use, attained prodigious circulation in Italy and abroad, are reproduced in admirable facsimiles, which thoroughly illustrate their origin and histories.

Dr. Lippmann takes it as an established fact that wood-engraving was practised in Germany long before it was used for Bible cuts in Italy; at a somewhat later date political satires—which in all countries, including England, were among the earliest applications of xylography—were in vogue, and from an art point of view their history is inferior in importance to no subject of the kind. Whatever may be said of the rather audacious claims of those learned Teutons who have striven to secure for their country the glory of having invented printing from metal plates engraved for the purpose, the plausibility of German pretensions to have devised the craft of the wood-engraver is hardly to be questioned. It is to Dr. Lippmann's credit that he has been the first to call special attention to the primitive woodcuts of Italy; neither private collectors nor custodians of national museums have hitherto recognized the real importance of this precious branch of study, or, indeed, attended to it at all, except in a perfunctory fashion. Although tens of thousands of impressions from blocks cut in Italy must have been spread broadcast over the peninsula and other Latin countries, comparatively few of them have survived, yet their artistic merit is, as our author truly says, attested by such examples as remain; for instance, the great view of Florence, c. 1490, of which he gives a facsimile, and, we may add, the noble Venetian cuts of shipping and buildings now in the British Museum, which are almost contemporary with the view, and in no way inferior to it. The cuts which illustrate chap-books such as Savonarola and others spread abroad for political purposes prove not only the popularity in Italy of his 'Arte del ben Morire,' 1496, but the cleverness of the draughtsman, Lorenzo Violi of Florence, who published three editions of that valuable brochure very soon after the lecture on the art of living (though often so called, it is not a sermon) was delivered with an effect as momentous as it was transitory. The Teutonic 'Ars Moriendi,' which passed through countless editions in every country pretending to possess a literature even of the rudest, was the converse of Savonarola's passionate discourse, which had not a few imitators of less force and fervour. The 'Art of Good Life' was illustrated with capital cuts, all evidently Italian in character and of the Florentine type of design and execution, and they are, by means of facsimiles of great merit, made to assist the arguments and illustrations of Dr. Lippmann.

Confining himself, as we have remarked, to the quattrocento, our author does not attempt to solve the mystery surrounding that manifold artistic phenomenon Zoan Andrea, whose doings have troubled art historians from Bartsch, Passavant, and Koloff to Mr. R. Fisher. Nevertheless Dr. Lippmann says much that is valuable about the Venetian puzzle. With rare acuteness he analyzes the whole body of works which custom rather than knowledge has attributed to Zoan, and he shows conclusively (what others before him had said briefly, but distinctly) that it is out of the question that one man's hand could have produced instances so diverse, and that some of them are not Venetian. In this manner the author displays his critical faculty as well as his technical and practical knowledge. For instance, after speaking of a famous cut in the Berlin Print Room, and telling us that it indicates the hand of a draughtsman trained in the school of Mantegna, but who, like others of his tribe, borrowed hints and motives at random from various schools, Dr. Lippmann adds:—

"The execution is rather mechanical, although far superior to the Opera nuova. The mode of engraving betokens individuality. As in the prints of Mantegna and his school, the outlines are boldly drawn, and the effect of relief is obtained by parallel slanting lines, unhatched, which are thick and heavy in the shadows, but diminish into fine strokes in the lights."

This is an excellent description of the Venetian school, and distinctly shows where it differed from the style of Florence.

Now and then we fail to catch our author's meaning, as when he speaks of the "difficulty of cutting the block lengthwise" (p. 57); this refers, we presume, to the old mode of wood-cutting, which was dictated by the use of pear-wood and other soft materials previous to the common employment of box-wood, which is so hard and tough that it permits the cutter to work with the fibre perpendicular to the face of the block, whereas other woods require to be cut with the fibre parallel to the face of the block. This made a great difference, and affected the cutter's craft so much that the tools used formerly differ materially in shape from those which are at present in vogue. A knife, cutting from the edge of the metal, served the ancient engravers; nowadays the graver proper is preferred in most, but not all respects. Of course, the exquisitely fine modern cuts, which rival steel engravings in their delicacy, precision, and firmness, and match copperplate engravings in breadth, richness of tints, and softness, were not to be thought of while the horizontal fibres of soft woods were cut with knives and, as we suppose Dr. Lippmann to say, "lengthwise." It is a noble testimony to the merits of the old craftsmen that "the lines [on their blocks] fall everywhere exactly into true perspective; the corners form correct angles sharply and clearly drawn," while the book containing such examples "is one of the most noteworthy productions of an age astonishingly fertile in new inventions." The book of which this can be said is Valturio's 'De Re Militari,' Verona, 1472, the first fruit of the press in that city, "in patria primus impressit," as the colophon avers of the work of "Johannes ex uerona oriundus," and it is a typographical masterpiece. The cuts are undoubtedly the work of a capital artist, trained to work in a large manner and accustomed to draw with precision and freedom. Dr. Lippmann suggests that he probably was Matteo de Pastis, a medalist; and the style of the treatment and the type of the drawing per se in 'De Re Militari' make it clear that an artist accustomed to the conventions of sculpture, rather than one whose practice lay among pictures, produced them. In 1483 two new editions of the book were simultaneously published, but the versions of the cuts in them are distinctly pictorial rather than sculptural.

How it happened that Italy was tardy in following Germany in producing popular woodcuts is philosophically explained:—

"The cause of this remarkable fact in the history of progress was assuredly something more than the deficiency among Italians of a technical knowledge of wood-engraving. The true reason is rather that the grand frescoes of their painters had familiarized them with bolder and more vivid conceptions of the sacred story than those to which the Northern mind was accustomed; and likewise that the pious sentiment which prompted the desire of the German to decorate his home with a saint's picture had no existence in Italy."

Considering the affection of the Italians, especially in Roman times, for delineations of their lares and penates, the latter part of this passage goes, we think, too far; and if German artists painted little in fresco, they painted the sacred story most efficiently in stained glass. The climate, which allowed of large rooms and external pictures in Italy and forbade them north of the Alps, had much to do with the difference of development in question. Dr. Lippmann continues:—

"Here likewise [in Italy] the strong religious movement which arose in Germany before the Reformation, and which led to the multiplication of such pictures, was wholly unknown."

It is a noteworthy fact that, when spiritual enthusiasm of the destructive kind promoted by Savonarola in the latest decade of the fifteenth century prevailed, "the same artistic method of illustration [book prints] came at once into existence, and the passions of the lower orders were inflamed by innumerable cheap cuts." The printed sermons of the Ferrarese monk spread rapidly among the people, in thousands of copies and in numberless editions. One of the earliest (if not the earliest) Florentine portraits cut upon wood is that of Savonarola himself; and illustrations of his career were circulated among the people. So in Italy the so-called democratic craft performed important political and religious functions at its very outset. In Germany wood-engraving served first religion, e. g., the 'Ars Moriendi' and similar series, and secondly morality and politics, as in the political and moral satires referred to above. A large proportion of these satires, the number of which far exceeded what most people suppose, were executed on wood, first in Germany, next in Holland, and thirdly in England. The diffusion of such things was one of the leading causes of the rapid development of xylography in Transalpine countries. Popular political satire had but limited use in Italy.

NOTES FROM ATHENS.

OWING to the constantly increasing interest felt in archaeological research in Greece, the Greek Archaeological Society may claim peculiar attention at the hands of foreigners, for not only may it be considered the doyen of the learned archaeological institutes that have their headquarters in Athens, but—a thing of more advantage to it—its close relations to the Greek Government place it in a position to move in many matters on parallel lines to the Inspector General of Antiquities. A lottery authorized by the State has of recent years added largely to its means; and in consequence not only are its collections increased and better arranged than they used to be, but, owing to the advances of funds that it has made, the building of the Central Museum has been considerably hastened and promoted. Thanks to a reorganization of this lottery, owing to an agreement between the Government and the Union Bank of Vienna, much larger funds would have accrued to the Society—something like 8,000*l.* a year—which would have enabled it to make much more extensive purchases and undertake excavations on a far larger scale than hitherto. But since the Bill forbidding lotteries was passed in Austria, the bank has been obliged to draw back, and the Archaeological Society is left in its former position. But that, even in this state of affairs, the receipts of the lottery form one of the most important sources of the Society's revenue is clear from the accounts issued for the year 1888. I have just received the balance sheet for that year, in which the lottery yielded, after the deduction of payments and other expenses, 1,355*l.* Together with the interest on investments, annual subscriptions, and other sources of income, the receipts amount to about 5,900*l.* (183,088 drachmas). Of the expenditure, which amounts to 175,803 drachmas, 21,638 have been devoted to the museums, and 86,342 to the excavations. From the tables which accompany the report we learn that the Society has spent between 1858 and 1888 on salaries, museums, purchases, and excavations, about 36,140*l.* (1,120,158 drachmas).

In 1888 the Society made excavations in Athens, Eleusis, and Mycenæ. Of these the largest and the most fruitful of results were those on the Acropolis, of which the General Inspector of Antiquities took charge. They cost something like 1,870*l.* The object was to clear the Acropolis down to the natural rock from the eastern side along the southern wall as far as the Propylæa, whereby the whole work of laying open the Acropolis—a small portion excepted—was completed. Several highly valuable finds occurred during the progress of the works. The most notable are mentioned by M. Cavvadius in his unfortunately very brief report to the Society, three great groups of Poros stone: one of Hercules slaying the Triton, one of a bull torn by two lions, and one a monstrum trifforme, below a serpent, above a bearded man with wings.

The second series of excavations at Athens occurred in outer portions of the north side of the precinct of the Temple of Olympian Jove, where there had already been exploration carried on in 1887. The most important discovery made was that of the rather large and richly decorated floor of a Roman bath, some 40 metres long and about 26 metres wide. This ruin has been cleaned out, and has been left uncovered, while the other remains brought to light—which were of less consequence, and formed a hardly distinguishable complex of various dates—have been again covered up, after a plan of the whole of the remains, as well as of the bath, had been drawn up by a German architect named Kawerau. A copy of this is appended to the report of the Archaeological Society. Thirty-seven inscriptions and fragments of inscriptions were met with, in one of which Jupiter Elicius is mentioned, in another Æsculapius Xenius, and 185 separate objects, such as reliefs, statues (most of them defaced), terra-cottas, and Byzantine coins. Of peculiar interest is the group, half finished, but perfectly preserved, which represents Dionysus with the vine or a bunch of grapes, and which was engraved in the first plate of the Archæological Ephemeris for 1888.

Outside Athens the Society undertook explorations at Eleusis and Mycenæ. Dr. Philios, whose name is identified with the discoveries made at Eleusis, supplies a short account of the work done, which during 1888 cost 510*l.* I cannot, any more than he does, dwell on the details, which, indeed, would be scarcely intelligible without the plan issued with the accounts of the year 1887. Besides, much still remains doubtful, and will remain so till the excavations are completed. The most important results achieved were the discovery of the site of a large building of the Roman period to the south of the Propylæa, which was decorated with wall pictures that have since been engraved in the Ephemeris, and the laying open of the foundations of a wide triumphal arch, as well as of another structure—the pedestal probably of an equestrian statue—and of a bath. Finally, an investigation of the little church of St. Zacharias led only to the negative discovery that it did not occupy the site of the Temple of Triptolemus mentioned by Pausanias.

At Mycenæ Dr. Chr. Tsuntas opened six-and-thirty tombs, in which various objects were found, and made further excavations in the anaktoron discovered in 1886.

The report of the Society is marked by two improvements. For the first time a list is given of the antiquities presented during the year to the Society, and also one of its purchases. The gifts consist of an inscription on stone published in the Bulletin de Correspondance Hellénique for 1887, p. 364, and its subject is the emancipation of slaves of the town of Halus in Phthiotis; of nine terra-cottas, two bronze urns, &c. Forty-nine reliefs, statues, and tombstones have been bought, a number of vases, terra-cottas, and bronzes, and a quantity of other things, among them a silver bezel of a ring (pala annuli) and a cock of ivory-coloured glass.

SPYR. P. LAMBROS.

Just-Int Sosisy.

THE picture Mr. Alma Tadema has lately finished for the next Academy is named 'In the Frigidarium.' It is on a smaller canvas, and the effect is entirely different from that of the 'Apodyterium' of a few years back. The composition, too, is exceptionally complex, difficult, and successful. The scene is the interior of one of those magnificent baths for women which distinguished the later Empire, and the foreground is occupied by a chamber entirely lined with marble of various colours, charmingly harmonized as to tints and tones, and full of light, shadows, and reflections, delineated with all the art of the painter. Near the front, and standing close to a pilaster, with her hands clasping her abundant chestnut hair, is a tall and beautiful dame of noble presence, clad in rich warm grey. An attendant adjusts a white girdle at her mistress's waist. The latter has recently quitted the bath, and towels and a sponge lie at her feet; on a shelf near the pilaster are her bracelets and amber beads, ready to be replaced. The maid is dressed in white delightfully differentiated from the grey dress of her mistress, the complexions of both, and the surrounding marbles. The scanty furniture of the frigidarium does not encumber the scene nor reduce the size of the room; breadth and dignity are not at all lost, although the chamber is by no means large. Additional spaciousness is gained by the open vista of the background, consisting of an intermediate room and the bath proper, where a ruddy damsel stands erect in the water, counterbalanced by brilliant green lights which come through an opening in the roof, and darker spaces where the shadows fall. Near this bather is a girl amusing herself with a sponge, while seated on a bench beyond is yet another girl armed with a towel, who joins her comrades in lively chatter. A lady, who has just left the water, and wears a loose white robe, crosses the intermediate room, her figure telling against the lighted bath and contrasting with one of the dark green columns which divide the rooms, and her maid is about to draw a large curtain which will close the scene.

MR. C. E. HALLÉ has in hand for the New Gallery one subject picture and two portraits. The former depicts a damsel carrying a basket of roses designed to suit her flesh and dress and the wall against which she stands. In the wall is a door, and the girl has her hand stretched out to a bell which she is about to pull. A company of doves descending in the sunny air, and fluttering about the girl, add much to the charms of the picture. With this will be exhibited a fresh and spirited life-size, whole-length portrait of Mrs. Harvey Taylor, standing before us, and, with both hands clasped behind her, partly leaning against an oak chest, nearly in front view, so as to show to advantage her tall figure and graceful dress of the Empire period, of warm, almost golden white, fastened at the throat and girt close under the bosom. The third work is a life-size, three-quarters-length portrait of Sir C. Russell seated at a table, an admirable and characteristic likeness.

THE private view of the pictures for the forthcoming spring exhibition at the Manchester Art Gallery will take place on Tuesday next, and the exhibition will be open to the public on the following day.

THE twelfth annual exhibition of modern pictures under the auspices of the Corporation of Southport will open on Monday week. Next Thursday is the varnishing day, next Friday the press day, and the private view takes place on Saturday.

LORD CATHCART, who is a relation of the Hon. Mrs. Graham, writing to a friend, protests against the misnaming of the beautiful picture, No. 3, now in Gallery I. at the Royal Academy:—

"I am sorry they have given at Burlington House a most unmeaning, misleading name to that very wonderful unfinished Gainsborough portrait of Mrs. Graham—'The Housemaid'! Mrs. Graham was not a maid, but the happy wife of an altogether devoted husband. Why not 'The Housewife,' or 'The Cottar's Wife,' or better still 'The Dairywoman'? Please observe she stands in the doorway of her dairy 'by Lynedoch's lovely rill.' To her left hand you may observe in the shade an indication of flat milk vessels set on edge, to the right on a square stone you see plainly a Scotch milk-pail, and note, the implement in the lady's hand is not a house broom, but the little bosom of the Scotch farmyard. Since I saw you I have found Graham's heartbroken letter announcing his wife's death—the angel that has gone!" The date is Hyères, June 17th, 1792.

"I have a letter from Gainsborough's executors, offering my grandfather his unfinished portrait (which you know) for a certain sum, and he obtained it. The executors no doubt did not recognize the unfinished 'Housewife,' 'Cottar's Wife,' or 'Dairywoman,' as you please, consequently it probably went in the sale you are aware of. Gainsborough's remaining pictures and drawings, or some of them, were exhibited and sold privately, and afterwards the rest were sold at Christie's in June, 1792. My instinctive impression is that some one said to Gainsborough, 'Your beauty is all very well in a hat and feathers, but what would she be in a cottage?' This tour de force picture was the response. Gainsborough was fond of these tour de force efforts, 'Blue Boy,' &c. As for the surroundings, Mrs. Graham was very clever with her pencil. I have a nice sketch of a lady, presumably the artist, feeding hens; on the back, in my grandmother's hand—'Done for ye Children by Mary.' Again, as you know, David Allan was very 'tame' about all the family, and there may have been a previous sketch by his hand; anyway the surroundings recalled to me David Allan's 'aquatint' illustrations of the 'Gentle Shepherd' of Allan Ramsay, and generally his pictures and prints of the Scottish peasantry. Mary Cathcart married 1774, David Allan died 1796. Gainsborough's picture in question, you mention, was painted 1778. Mrs. Graham died 1792. Consequently the picture in question was painted four years after Mrs. Graham's marriage. I have only seen this Castle Howard portrait once, but it haunts me, and gives far the best idea of her (Mrs. Graham's) disposition and character. As a boy I lived much with her contemporaries, my grandfather, my grandmother, and Lord Lynedoch himself; I also heard much from my father and my aunts, and all have agreed that Mrs. Graham was most amiable, most lovable, and in the family absolutely adored.

"You know the reference in Sir Walter Scott's 'Don Roderick's Vision': 'Lynedoch's lovely rill,' &c. Burns in his letters also mentions, at the time of his poem 'Bruar Falls,' the three lovely sisters, Jane (Duchess of Athole), Mary (Mrs. Graham), and Charlotte Cathcart. The poet appears to have lost his heart, a sort of thing with him easily mislaid! The letter is given in Dr. Currie's four-volume edition (London, Allason, 1819) of Burns's works, vol. ii. p. 94:—

"Rhyme is the coin with which a poet pays his debts of honour or gratitude. What I owe to the noble family of Athole, of the first kind, I shall ever proudly boast; what I owe of the last, so help me God in my hour of need, I shall never forget. The little "angel band"—I declare I prayed for them very sincerely to-day at the fall of Eyars. I shall never forget the fine family-piece I saw at Blair—the amiable, the truly noble Duchess [Jane Cathcart], with the smiling little seraph in her lap; the lovely "olive plants," as the Hebrew bard finely says, round the happy mother; the beautiful Mrs. Graham [Mary Cathcart]; the lovely sweet Miss Cathcart [Charlotte]. I wish I had the powers of Guido to do them justice!.....In short, the recollection of all that polite, agreeable company raises an honest glow in my bosom." Inverness, 5 Sept. 1787. Covering letter to poem 'Petition of Bruar-water,' addressed to Mr. Walker of Blair Athole."

THE Chronique des Arts, quoting the Archives Historiques, adds to the very small number of names of artists of the eleventh century who painted on glass, that of one "Walterius vitri artifex," who is so mentioned in a cartulary of the Burgundian Abbey of Molême, c. A.D. 1100, about which time the abbey was built. Discovered in the archives of the Côte d'Or, it is welcome. The same authority has recovered the name of "Regnauld de Cambray, tumbier," living in Paris, April 28th, 1380, on a quittance for seven livres "pour la tumbie de Jean de Neuchâtel, Chanoine de Saint Mery," counsellor to the Duc de Bourbon, ob. March 30th, 1380, the inventory of whose goods is in existence to prove that he was wealthy and possessed of various books, which seem to have been added to the library of Charles V. of France.

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—London Symphony Concerts. Sir Charles Halle's Concerts.
CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—The Popular Concerts.

THE presence of large audiences at all the principal concerts last week proves that the number of performances is not of the least consequence provided that they are such as meet the tastes of amateurs. Mr. Henschel's programme on Thursday was a kind of approximate commemoration of the death of Wagner, which occurred on February 13th, 1883. Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony was selected as usual on such occasions, and was sandwiched between some familiar items by the Bayreuth master. The performance commenced rather unsatisfactorily, the Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger' suffering by the excessive loudness of the brass, while in the 'Parsifal' Prelude the wind and strings were alike coarse and wanting in homogeneity. After this there was a marked improvement, the symphony being, on the whole, exceedingly well played. Wagner's delightful little sketch 'Träume' was rendered to perfection, and the performance of the prelude and finale from 'Tristan und Isolde' would also command unqualified praise but for the slowness of the tempi. It is only fair to Mr. Henschel to say, however, that even among acknowledged Wagnerian conductors, such as Herr Levi, Herr Mottl, and Herr Richter, considerable difference of opinion prevails concerning the correct pace to be adopted in the rendering of much of the master's music. We understand that Mr. Henschel intends to give a more extensive series of concerts next season if the requisite number of subscribers can be obtained. There should be no difficulty in this when publicity is given to the scheme.

Sir Charles Halle's programme on Friday was varied and attractive, though it did not include any novelties. It was, of course, merely a coincidence that the symphony was Beethoven's 'Eroica,' and it was interesting to make comparisons between the successive renderings of the work. These were greatly in favour of the Manchester band as regards the strings, and of Mr. Henschel's orchestra as regards the wood wind. An excellent performance was given of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins, by Madame Néruda and Herr Willy Hess, the leader of the orchestra. It cannot be said that full justice was rendered to Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' the performance being somewhat cold and mechanical. Perhaps the unsatisfactory impression was caused by the remembrance of the magnificent interpretation of this piece under Herr Richter. On the other hand, there was nothing left to desire in the performance of three movements of Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite and Cherubini's 'Anacreon' Overture, which completed the programme. Now that Sir Charles Halle has successfully gauged the tastes of London audiences, it is to be hoped he may be induced to give another series of concerts next season.

The excessive devotion of the pupils of Franz Liszt to the memory of the deceased virtuoso is at once a touching and an irritating feature of musical life at the present time. The mantle of Walter Bache seems to have fallen upon Herr Stavenhagen; but the latter's zeal outruns discretion to a greater extent than it did with the lamented English musician. That the young German pianist should have insisted upon playing the horribly cacophonous 'Todtentanz' at the Crystal Palace last Saturday instead of a concerto by one of the great masters was an error of judgment not too strongly to be condemned. It is possible, of course, that he thought previous pianists had not presented the work in a proper light, and we may admit that as a display of "virtuosity" his performance was simply phenomenal. But the predominant feeling in the listener's mind was one of profound regret that gifts so remarkable should be wasted on pernicious stuff, destitute of every quality that goes to make up a musical work of art. We are told that the final chords represent "the crushing strokes of the inexorable scythe of death." Possibly, but it does not require a magnificent orchestra to produce the effect here indicated; a dozen full-sized gongs would make as much noise and as much, or rather as little, music. Mr. C. H. Couldery's new overture, 'To the Memory of a Hero,' is an advance on the composer's 'Richard I.,' performed five years ago (Athen., No. 2991). The similarity of subject is more nominal than real; but Mr. Couldery has given a decidedly martial character to his new work, though the fanfares of brass are interspersed with strains of a gentler character, the second subject being particularly suave and melodious. The form of the work is symmetrical and the working out is perfectly clear, but it is made rather than inspired music. The scoring is full and rich, and, in fact, the overture has every good quality save that which is most essential, freshness of style. Mr. Mann's orchestra was at its best in Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, No. 4, and in Gluck's Overture to 'Iphigénie en Aulide,' with Wagner's appropriate ending. Madame Hope Glenn, the vocalist of the afternoon, introduced the air "Sweet rose and lily" from Handel's 'Theodora.'

An illustration of the peculiar conservatism which characterizes the management of the Popular Concerts is afforded by the fact that until last Saturday Brahms's Trio in E flat for piano, violin, and horn, Op. 40, had never found a place in the programmes. If a reason be sought for this neglect, we shall not find one in the work itself. It is not only worthy of Brahms, but is one of his finest examples of chamber music. The gift which this composer possesses of welding his materials so as to form a homogeneous entity is shown in the first movement, in which, notwithstanding changes of time and key, there is no effect of patchiness. The scherzo is not remarkable, but the slow movement in E flat minor is impressive in the highest degree. The performance was worthy of the work, and the superb rendering of the horn part by Mr. Paersch was especially worthy of praise. The remaining concerted works in the programme were Mozart's Quartet in D minor, and Bach's Sonata in A for piano and violin, No. 2; and Sir Charles Halle played two rather hackneyed pieces by Chopin. Mr. Hirwen Jones was the vocalist.

On Monday Brahms's trio was repeated, and Sir Charles and Lady Halle made their last appearance previous to their departure for Australia. The pianist rendered Beethoven's fanciful Sonata in F sharp, Op. 78, a work for which he seems to have a special predilection, and which certainly suits him exceedingly well. Spohr's melodious Quartet in A, Op. 93, and three of Heller and Ernst's 'Pensées Fugitives' for piano and violin, completed the programme. Madame Hope Glenn sang Lieder by Meyer-Helmund and Raff, and revived an old song, "Primroses deck the bank's green side," by Thomas Linley.

Musical Gossip.

WE believe that Mr. Augustus Harris has now definitely decided to produce 'Tristan und Isolde' in Italian during his forthcoming season at Covent Garden. M. Jean de Reszke will be Tristan, and Madame Albani may possibly be Isolde, but this is not decided. The issue of a rash, not to say desperate, experiment will be watched with interest.

THE arrangements of the Wagner Society for the present season include an orchestral concert under Herr Richter at St. James's Hall, the programme of which will include some selections from the master's works not usually given at other concerts.

It has been decided to give an orchestral concert on behalf of the Beethoven House Society in St. James's Hall. Herr Joachim will conduct, and the programme will include the 'Eroica' Symphony; the 'Elegischer Gesang,' Op. 114; and the violin concerto.

'ST. PAUL' is the work selected for performance this year at the Crystal Palace on the Handel orchestra. A wiser choice could not have been made, for the massive choruses in which Mendelssohn's earlier oratorio abounds would prove more effective performed by a force of 3,000 executants than those in 'Elijah.' An extra choir of 500 boys will take part in certain of the chorales, and the directors hope to secure the services of Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley as the principal vocalists. Saturday, June 21st, has been fixed for the performance.

THE first of two chamber concerts was given by Miss Geisler Schubert and Miss Fillunger at the Princes' Hall on Wednesday afternoon. It was scarcely wise to include two such lengthy works as Schubert's Trio in E flat, Op. 100, and the Sonata in B flat in the same programme, though both are masterpieces of the first order. The dreamy beauty of the sonata suited Miss Geisler Schubert, who is heard at her best in music requiring a quiet, reposeful style, rather than vigorous execution. The other executants in the trio were Herr Strauss and Mr. Whitehouse. Miss Fillunger sang with much taste several Lieder by Brahms, Schumann, and Clara Schumann.

ON the same afternoon Miss Marian Bateman gave a pianoforte recital at the Steinway Hall, and made a highly favourable impression by her refined and intelligent rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in D, Op. 10, No. 3; Grieg's suite, 'Aus Holberg's Zeit'; Bach's 'Chromatic' Fantasia, &c.

An extra chamber concert was given at the Royal College of Music on Thursday last week, the programme including Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, Op. 12; Beethoven's in E flat, Op. 18, No. 6; and Brahms's Quintet in F, Op. 88.

ORATORIO performances on a large scale are becoming more and more frequent in the outlying districts of the metropolis. Within the past fortnight 'The Golden Legend' has been given at the Assembly Hall, Mile End, and 'The Creation' at the People's Palace, the audience on each occasion numbering several thousand persons; and on Monday last an admirable performance of Sir A. Sullivan's work was given at the Hampstead Conservatoire Hall. Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Marian Mackenzie, and Messrs. Lloyd, Stanley Smith, and Watkin Mills were the soloists, and there was a first-rate orchestra, with Mr. Carrodus as leader. The choir was noteworthy for the brightness and freshness of the voices and the clear enunciation of the words; and though Mr. Geaussen's tempi differed in some parts of the work from those adopted by the composer, he must be congratulated on the general excellence of the performance.

A NEW operetta, 'Love's Magic,' written by Major Jocelyn, R.A., and composed by M. Zaverthal, bandmaster of the Royal Artillery, will be produced on Tuesday next at a matinée in the Royal Artillery Theatre, Woolwich. The chief parts will be taken by Miss Clara Perry (Mrs. Ben Davies), Mr. Ben Davies (by permission of Mr. H. J. Leslie), and Mr. Ernest Delsart; whilst the orchestra, of the Royal Artillery band, will be conducted by M. Zaverthal.

THE Wind Instrument Chamber Music Society announce three concerts at the Royal Academy of Music on February 28th, March 28th, and April 25th. The programmes will be exceedingly interesting, and will include little-known works by Spohr, Beethoven, Lalo, Lachner, Herzogenberg, and Charles Wood, the winner of the prize offered by the Society for a quintet for wind instruments.

THE exact number of performances of Wagner's works in Germany and Austria during the season ending June 30th last was 939, against 794 in the previous season. The largest increases are shown in 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' and 'Das Rheingold.'

IN consequence of the prevalence of influenza in Madrid Herr Neumann has decided to defer the proposed visit of the Richard Wagner Company until next year.

GERMAN papers report that this year's festival of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein is expected to be held at Eisenach towards the end of June.

THE WEEK.

VAUDEVILLE.—Afternoon Representation: 'Clarissa Harlowe,' a Drama in Four Acts, founded on Richardson's Novel. By Robert Buchanan.

NOT the least interesting dramas presented before the public are the adaptations of last century novels which are in fashion at the Vaudeville. Occupied necessarily with modern work, the critic finds the time he can devote to re-reading past masterpieces diminish from year to year. Heroic, indeed, or happily dowered with time, would be he who could sit down and read from cover to cover the seven volumes of Richardson's masterpiece. It is pleasant, then, to see a version of 'Clarissa Harlowe,' both for what it presents and what it recalls; for the graces of Clarissa and the persecutions she withstood linger in the background of the memory, and are easily recalled. It is needless to stir the embers of controversy concerning Richardson. Diderot's famous outburst: "On m'interroge sur ma santé, sur ma fortune, sur mes parents, sur mes amis. O mes amis! Pamela, Clarisse et Grandison sont trois grands drames!" the fact that his works were translated by men such as l'Abbé Prévost, and that 'Clarissa Harlowe' was abridged by Jules Janin (as it was in England by Dallas) are unanswerable pleas in his behalf. France, which produced a whole literature imitative of Richardson, was the first country to put 'Clarissa Harlowe' on the stage. "Clarisse Harlowe, drame en trois actes, mêlé de chant, par MM. Dumanoir, Clairville, et Guillard," was produced at the Gymnase Dramatique on the 5th of August, 1846, with Bressant (subsequently of the Comédie Française) as an unsurpassable Lovelace, and Rose Chéri as a delightful Clarissa. This is an old-fashioned work, to which Mr. Buchanan admits his indebtedness. It has saved him some trouble, and though he has departed far from it, the scenes in which he follows it most closely are the most effective. An adaptation of this, with Mr. C. J. Mathews as Lovelace, and Mrs. Stirling as Clarissa, was given at the Princess's, August 28th, 1846.

Mr. Buchanan's treatment does not wholly commend itself. One or two characters that he introduces are insincere and out of keeping, and his termination is clumsy and ineffective. None the less he has crowded into four acts very much of a huge plot, and has produced a work that is intellectually and emotionally stimulating. A first act serves for the escape of Clarissa in company with Lovelace from domestic persecution that loses something of its acerbity by the disappearance of Arabella, with whom goes Mrs. Harlowe. Col. Morden, the avenger of the heroine, is also banished, and his functions are assigned to Philip Belford, the correspondent of Lovelace, who is shown as his creature, and, rising in mutiny against his employer, constitutes himself an inefficient protector of the heroine and a thoroughly efficient instrument of vengeance on the hero. Against this there is little to be urged. When, however, in the closing act of apothecsis, Clarissa, endowed with prophetic inspiration, consecrates Belford to God, and he bows his head to receive the chrism, one is scarcely prepared to see him go out instantly to slay a man, however richly the victim may have merited his fate. Clarissa, moreover, in the last act, fine as this is, is too divine and not human enough to create her full effect. There is a suggestion of the teaching of Wilkie Collins in the 'New Magdalen,' that the removal of blemish is indispensable to the highest purity. In Clarissa's case, of course, there is no moral taint. We should prefer her a little less sublimely perfect, and with the humanizing weaknesses Richardson is at the pains to depict.

The characters generally are fairly played. Miss Winifred Emery shows with much sweetness and power the angelical character that Mr. Buchanan has developed, and in her rejection of Lovelace and her communing with Belford touches inspiration. Mr. Thorne, at all events, plays earnestly as Belford, Mr. Cyril Maude is clever as Mr. Solmes, and other characters are creditably presented. Mr. Thalberg is, however, not strong enough for Lovelace; and the character of Hetty Belford, played by Miss Banister, is out of keeping with the play. Mr. F. Thorne gives a clever sketch of character as Capt. Macshane. 'Clarissa' was warmly received, and seems likely to take a strong hold of the public.

The Lady from the Sea. By Henrik Ibsen. Translated by Eleanor Marx Aveling, with Critical Introduction by Edmund Gosse. (Fisher Unwin.)—Henrik Ibsen: Rosmersholm, a Play in Four Acts. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)—While waiting for the promised translation of Ibsen's dramatic works, the English reader must be content with the possession of single plays. Both the works now given belong to the more mystical and didactic studies of Ibsen. 'The Lady from the Sea' is happy in termination, and is so distinguished from the dramatist's later work, of which 'Rosmersholm' is a characteristic specimen. The renderings are in both cases fluent. Mr. Gosse's preface adds to the value of Mrs. Aveling's translation.

Louis XI., a drama by John Arthur Coupland (Stock), is a not very successful rendering in blank verse of scenes from 'Quentin Durward.'

Le Théâtre Contemporain. Par Paul de Saint-Victor. (Calmann Lévy.)—In this volume, which is the first of a series of posthumous works of Count Paul de Saint-Victor, are two studies of Émile Augier and M. Alexandre Dumas fils. They show all the ease and luxury of style which characterize Saint-Victor, and are good specimens of elaborate analysis and criticism.

Dramatic Gossip.

'NEW LAMPS FOR OLD,' the new farcical comedy of Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, with which Miss Grahame begins her management of Terry's Theatre, is an amusing piece, but is cumbrous in workmanship and not very pleasant in idea.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

MON. Concert in Aid of St. Mary's, Horseferry Road, 8, Princes' Hall.
— Popular Concert, 8.30, St. James's Hall.
TUES. Miss Marguerite Hall and Mr. W. Nicholl's First Vocal Recital, 8, Steinway Hall.

Miss Grahame plays successfully in it, and is supported by Mr. Penley (very droll as a solicitor), Miss Kingston, Miss Houston (an excellent soubrette), Mr. Kerr, and Mr. Bernard Gould. The play may be seen with interest, but visitors will do well to follow the example of the first night's audience and dismiss from their minds all thought of the satire on Ibsen which Mr. Jerome is said to have attempted. 'The Parting of the Ways,' by Messrs. Bowyer and Edwards-Sprange, a not very original or happily conceived comedietta, was also given.

MR. TOOLE'S farewell performance took place at his own theatre on Tuesday evening, as Robert Spicer Romford in 'Artful Cards' and Spriggins in 'Ici on parle Français.' An audience including the Prince and Princess of Wales assembled, and greeted the departing comedian with much warmth. A short and characteristic speech brought the season to a close.

'OUR BOYS' was revived on Tuesday at the Criterion, with Mr. David James in his original character of Perky Middlewick, with Mr. Leonard Boyne and Mr. E. W. Gardiner as the two juvenile heroes, and Miss Olga Brandon and Miss Frances as the heroines. Mr. James's performance was delightful in unison. In other characters the representation scarcely passed mediocrity.

TOOLE'S THEATRE has reopened for evening performances under the management of Mr. Horner, who has transferred 'The Bungalow' to the evening bill, and produced a poetic play from his own pen, entitled 'Isalda.'

FEODOR VON WEHL, who was a most prolific writer in nearly every branch of literature, and occupied the post, first of director and then of general intendant of the Stuttgart Theatre, died recently at Hamburg. He was born in 1819, in Silesia.

LITERATURE

Problems of Greater Britain. By the Right Hon. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, Bart. 2 vols. With Maps. (Macmillan & Co.)

THESE stout volumes are none too large for the task the author has taken in hand. The 'Greater Britain' which he published two-and-twenty years ago was a record of travel, though in it political and economical questions were discussed to an extent not usual in books of the kind. Those questions have in the interval become far more numerous and complicated, and, using the experience of three later tours, as well as of his first journey round the world in 1866-7, to explain and justify his conclusions, Sir Charles Dilke has had ample material for filling 1160 pages with a more searching and comprehensive study of colonial affairs than has hitherto been attempted. As "a treatise on the present position of Greater Britain, in which special attention has been given to the relations of the English-speaking countries with one another, and to the comparative politics of the countries under British government," the book is unique. Unfortunately it treats so largely of changing conditions, and of contemporary affairs which are necessarily being influenced and altered by fresh incidents arising from day to day, that parts of it, especially those relating to countries which, like South Africa, are in a state of violent fermentation, will soon be out of date. We do not see how the difficulty could have been overcome; but it is a pity that a work containing so much of permanent value will have to be repeatedly added to and corrected if it is to continue as helpful as it should be in the formation of sound public opinion on questions of the hour.

In his second volume Sir Charles Dilke treats fully of India, and groups his views on several extremely interesting "problems" common to, but varied throughout, all our colonies, leading up to highly suggestive chapters on "future relations between the mother-country and the remainder of the Empire" and on "imperial defence." In the first volume he surveys almost exhaustively, from the statesmanlike standpoint he has chosen, the condition of affairs in three great clusters of our possessions, North American, Australasian, and South African. What we have done and what we are now doing in these three clusters, yet more, what is being or has been done in them by people of our race, loyal to the institutions of their fatherland, but zealous in adapting them to their own requirements, go far to justify the bold anticipation that the future management of the world's affairs, outside the comparatively narrow limits of German and French sway in Europe, will be divided between Russia and Greater Britain, including in the latter term the United States as well as our own empire; and that, while the English-speaking races will vastly outnumber and outweigh in influence the dominion of Russia, there must be, in so far as any antagonism exists between the United States and our own empire, an overwhelming balance on our side. It is not clear to us whether Sir Charles Dilke cares much or little, though it is evident that he cares something, about "the integrity of the Empire," as it is called—that is, about the maintenance of such nominal authority of the Crown over the "daughter-countries" as still prevails; but there can be no doubt as to his desire that everything good and adaptable in English influence, as distinct from French or German or Portuguese or other influence, should continue and expand, and the facts he explains warrant the faith that is strong in him.

From the imperial point of view Canadian questions are more momentous than Australian questions. These latter are supremely interesting as evidence of the working out of democratic institutions—the machinery of government, the relations between capital and labour, protection of native industries, methods of land tenure, State control of education and religion, and so forth—about some or all of which our Australian cousins are offering us instruction by examples that it is important we should understand, whether we approve them or not. But for the most part, and with only slight exceptions, the Australians are already so completely independent of Downing Street, and by their geographical position they are so little liable to dangers or temptations by which other colonies might be alienated from us, that Canadian politics far more concern us at present. The Canadian Dominion is in area nearly as large as the United States, and, though a considerable part of it is ice-bound and rocky, there is no reason why the rest, more favourable to trade and cultivation than the corresponding portions of the great Republic, should not contain at least ten times as many people as the 5,000,000 who now inhabit it. One of the most interesting problems of which Sir Charles Dilke treats is as to the likelihood of the Dominion remaining for long, and even in name, British territory. As he points out, the boundary line between the two countries, except where the St. Lawrence and the great lakes provide a natural, but not very safe frontier, is too artificial to be maintained if the people on both sides choose to unite; and a much larger military force than he recommends would be useless against an American invasion of Canada, designed for the annexation of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, should the Washington authorities attempt it at the risk—not a particularly serious one—of a war with England. The bluster occasionally indulged in at Washington, or rather at New York or Chicago, need not, however, cause alarm. For a long while yet there will be ample space for the expansion of the United States within their own area, and without any of the trouble that a raid on Canada might lead to; and while this expansion goes on the great prairie part of the Dominion, which the Americans are supposed to covet, is pretty certain to develop into a vigorous commonwealth, by no means inclined to surrender the liberty which it enjoys, and may continue in larger measure to enjoy, under the British flag, and which is already more complete than could be hoped for under the stars and stripes. For grain-growing and cattle-producing this district has almost unlimited resources, and as these are utilized the demand for free trade, strong even now, will gain in force. Notwithstanding the present attitude of Sir John Macdonald, the demand is likely to be listened to in Ottawa long before it can find favour with the more firmly established Protectionist interests in the States. Manitoba and the North-West threaten to outweigh Ontario, as Ontario has outweighed the province of Quebec; and in view of that the Ontario Protectionists will have to make terms which will be for the benefit of all, even among themselves, who do not draw temporary profit from the heavy import duties that cripple enterprise in the Dominion as a whole. It is in Ontario that there is, perhaps, most leaning towards absorption by the United States; but even in this province the leaning is slight, and it is more than neutralized by deeply rooted sentiments or prejudices which show no signs of decay. Any one who spends a few days in comparing the habits, yet more the ways of thought, that distinguish the people living on either side of Niagara Falls will be able to understand how marked and profound are the differences between the two communities—differences which are all the greater because the communities spring from the same English-speaking stock, and speak their English with pretty much the same twang and admixture of slang. As for the occasional threats of secession from the Canadian Dominion which are uttered by the people of French origin in Quebec and Nova Scotia, these are manifestly nothing but cheap efforts to frighten the Government into concessions which those who seek them are well aware they would never get from Washington. The French Canadians have a much more thorough system of Home Rule in the province of Quebec than they could retain if it were one of the United States. They also exert more than their fair share of power in the Dominion Parliament. Such harmless sedition as they now and then indulge in is merely an exorcism of their loyalty to political institutions which they know to be exceptionally favourable to them.

The progress of the several portions of British North America since they were grouped in one Dominion proves the remarkable wisdom of that arrangement. The French province has made least progress, and, when compared with the others, it seems to have almost retrograded. It has really, however, gained much by being allowed to follow its own traditions with the least possible friction, and absolutely without interference from the go-ahead neighbours with whom it was formerly yoked. The French majority in Quebec is allowed to do as it likes, to stagnate or to jog along, without hindrance, and the English and Scotch are free to thrive as rapidly as they can in Ontario and elsewhere. Ontario has still good right to call itself the premier province, and in its system of municipal as well as of provincial self-government, its admirable educational machinery, its harmonizing of ecclesiastical differences, and much else, even the elasticity with which in it the Scott Act is applied or not, according to the accurately ascertained wishes of the people, it brings out all the merits of the Canadian Constitution. But there are tokens that even Ontario is in the way of being outstripped by the enterprise for which there is a boundless field on the other side of the great lakes. Manitoba is as yet in its headstrong youth, and the North-West Territories are waiting to be shortcoated. In due time, however, this prairie realm—more than four times as large as Great Britain and Ireland, and better suited than any other of our colonies for settlement by English, Scotch, and Irish farmers, as well as by the thrifty Scandinavians, who are going to it in shoals every year—must, though it may not take the lead in political power, be the main source of Canadian wealth and the great producer of food for European as well as American consumption. The excellence of the Canadian Act of 1867 appears in the ample provision it made for the orderly development of self-governing communities, as quickly and as easily as they can grow, throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion.

Some readers of Sir Charles Dilke's book may think that he has too high an opinion of Sir John Macdonald, on whom chiefly has devolved the superintendence of affairs in Canada since it became the Dominion; but, whatever faults can be found with Sir John's administration, it has been good and successful enough to afford excuse for all the "gerrymandering" with which he is charged by his critics. Of the "gerrymandering" said to be incident to the construction, and to the subsequent utilization for political purposes, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Sir Charles Dilke makes no mention; and one point in connexion with the commercial value of this great engineering achievement, which we have nowhere seen noticed, is worth referring to. For passenger traffic and for the carrying of mails the railway is of great value, and by the running of several trains a day in each direction, instead of only one as at present, it may be able to meet all the requirements of the future. But it is already quite inadequate for the demands made upon it for the conveyance of goods, especially during the season in which wheat has to be sent eastward. Across the prairies this defect can be remedied by adding to the single pair of rails now laid down. But much widening of the line over the thousand or more miles in which the railway climbs up and down the Rockies and the Selkirks, and crosses the Kicking Horse and other rivers at frequent intervals, is next to impossible; and if it were possible, the working expenses would be prohibitive for the freight of grain, cattle, or all but the daintiest articles of trade. This is a matter worth considering in view of the expected development of the Dominion. For political purposes the Canadian Pacific Railway has joined British Columbia to the old "Canadas," and one iron thread, more than three thousand miles in extent, links the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. But, commercially, an insuperable barrier between east and west exists in the Rockies. From the eastern slopes of that magnificent range there may hereafter be an uninterrupted flow of Canadian produce rolling down to Manitoba, to be conveyed thence by rail or water to Montreal and other marts; but the great trade route to British Columbia will always be by way of Cape Horn, unless M. de Lesseps's successors contrive some day to cut their canal through the Isthmus of Panama.

Though we have only touched on a few of the questions raised in Sir Charles Dilke's very suggestive chapters on British North America, these have detained us longer than we intended. In South Africa he has another set of problems to deal with. There is some resemblance, but not much, between the circumstances under which the two sub-empires were built up, the one from our capture of Quebec, the other from our acquisition of Cape Town. In the old Canada we mastered a French population, which, with great difficulty and after many blunders, was allowed to remain peaceably in its own quarters, and to keep up all its quaint institutions. In the old Cape Colony we found a Dutch population which has never yielded meekly to English rule, and the sturdiest members of which, so soon as they found it impossible to do as they wished in their original settlements, began the "trekking" that has led to the establishment of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal Republic. The Boers who have acquired independence are still unsatisfied, in the Transvaal, at any rate. They regard all South Africa as theirs by right, and there is sufficient discontent among the kinsmen whom they left behind them in Cape Colony, or who migrated to Natal, or who by mixture with the natives became "Bastards" in South Bechuanaland and other frontier districts, to make the Afrikaners, as they now call themselves, only friendly to English rule in so far as it is friendly to them, and as they are strong enough to have pretty much their own way. Again, whereas in Canada the French colonists found but a sparse Indian population, of which they exterminated a part, and, after a fashion, converted most of the residue, the chief result of the exterminating wars that the Dutch waged against the Hottentots in South Africa was that they were brought in contact with hordes of Kaffirs, of whom they are willing to tolerate as many as are useful to them in a mild form of slavery, but in whom they recognize no right to any sort of independence, and whom they regard as mere soulless bipeds. These Kaffirs, of various branches, moreover, vastly outnumber all the people of Dutch and English origin, and may be expected always to form the great bulk of the dwellers throughout South Africa, however much European colonization or influence may spread. As we encroach upon them more and more—and now all the area south of the Zambesi is either "within the British sphere of influence" or claimed by Portuguese, Germans, and others—the greater will be the disproportion of race. South Africa will certainly in due time become almost exclusively British property; but it will always be mainly peopled by blacks, more troublesome to deal with than the North American red man, and our rule will be complicated by the presence of a great many more Boers or Afrikaners than Englishmen.

This race-question furnishes a stupendous "problem" in South Africa, and many other important problems grow out of it or are mixed up with it. Into nearly all of them Sir Charles Dilke makes a searching inquiry, and most of the conclusions he arrives at will commend themselves to his readers, who may be grateful to him for throwing so much light on the subject in its various ramifications. Those who think that, as in the case of Sir John Macdonald in Canada, he too heartily supports the policy of Sir Hercules Robinson at the Cape, are impartially supplied by him with materials, brought up to the very latest date, for testing his views. As has already been hinted, this part of his subject is necessarily so confused by the new movements that are taking place from week to week that it is a more appropriate theme for ephemeral journalism than for the writing of a durable treatise. But we have here a mass of sound information, and of judicious inferences therefrom, brought up to the close of last year, which must be most helpful to the student of current politics.

Sir Charles Dilke does not ignore the recent developments of colonizing work by chartered companies. He gives some account of the British South African Company, as well as of similar organizations of rather earlier date, the British East Africa Company, the Royal Niger Company, and the British North Borneo Company. We should have been glad, however, had he treated more at length on the general question. This recurrence to the original methods of English enterprise in the opening up of new territories to trade and settlement, so successfully pursued long ago by the East India Company, the Hudson's Bay Company, and many more, is really the most remarkable novelty in modern colonization. A year or two hence, if not to-day, there will be occasion for a solid treatise on colonization by chartered companies.

Each of the eight sections into which Sir Charles Dilke has divided his weighty work would deserve a separate article. The limits of our space compel us to leave unnoticed more than half of them. Among these the chapters on British India, on imperial defence, and on the various political and social problems in which our colonies are providing examples or warnings for the guidance of social or political reformers at home, will especially repay perusal.

Acrobats and Mountebanks. By Hugues Le Roux and Jules Garnier. Translated from the French by A. P. Morton. (Chapman & Hall.)

Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL have conferred a favour on the English-reading public by publishing a spirited translation of M. Hugues Le Roux's delightful book, 'Les Jeux du Cirque et la Vie Foraine,' published by

M. Plon at the end of last year. Why they should have chosen to put the name of M. Jules Garnier, who is simply responsible for the "233 illustrations," side by side with the name of M. Hugues Le Roux, as if the two were joint-authors, it is hard to say. M. Garnier's illustrations, however, are an important and welcome adjunct to M. Le Roux's narrative. They are practical, and at the same time agreeable; not mere decoration, but yet succeeding in being decorative. How, indeed, could it be otherwise in these representations of the disciplined human body where it is most effective and beautiful—in the exquisite poise of the equilibrist, in the strong and swift precision of the gymnast? The art and science of what may be called acrobatics have never yet received really adequate treatment. The book before us, despite certain deficiencies, is by far the best attempt which has yet been made to write the history of one of the most interesting of races.

One needs to be something of an artist to understand the whole charm of the fair, the circus, the wandering life of tents and caravans. To the frivolous it is frivolous, to the vulgar it is vulgar, but to the artist it is always attractive. "We go to only one theatre—the circus," write the De Goncourts in their journal.

"There we see clowns, vaulters, men who jump through paper hoops, all following their profession, all doing their duty: in reality the only actors whose talent is incontestable, absolute as mathematics, or, better still, as the saut périlleux. For, in that, there is no false show of talent; either one falls or one does not fall."

M. Le Roux has constantly before his eyes this artistic conception of his subject. He has the proper respect for it as well as the right point of view. He has diligence, the enthusiastic diligence of the dilettante; he has prepared for the writing of his book by years of study from the life; he can speak from personal and sometimes intimate knowledge of the heroes and heroines of his always entertaining pages. He obtains the confidences of clowns and contortionists, he interviews dwarfs, he learns the secrets of the ring, he enters a lion's den. He is present at the marriage dinner of one of the daughters of the great lion-tamer Jean Baptiste Pezon—who, it will be remembered, had so narrow an escape quite recently at Brussels.

"All the tamers in the kingdom had been invited to this festival. They had not felt it a duty—and I secretly regretted it—to wear either their trunk-hose or their riding-boots, but were all in evening dress and lavender kid gloves. We sat down, thirty to dinner, including myself. On my right was a very dark man with a moustache like that of Victor Emmanuel; he has since been eaten in a fair in the south of France."

The bride's dowry (she was marrying in the profession) consisted of four lions, a panther, two rattlesnakes, and "an adult rabbit without any hair, a curiosity never seen before." M. Le Roux has much that is novel to tell of names often enough familiar to English ears. How many of those who have seen the Hanlon-Voltas in their trapeze performances and their performances on fixed bars are aware that the brothers Volta are of a good English family, and can read Greek? How many of those who have seen the Craggs, "gentlemen-acrobats" professionally, are aware that the seven brothers, as they style themselves, are in reality father, five sons, and one daughter? M. Le Roux is never indiscreet, but he is most communicative. "This publication," he says,

"is really the monograph of an unknown people, related by the pen and pencil. Its laws, its customs, its traditions, its secrets, its hopes, have been seized, defined, in spite of reticence, evasions, wavering, and contradictory witnesses. It describes the organization of the banquiste people, the foundation of its agencies, newspapers, and syndicates, it follows the mountebank from his birth in the wandering caravan to his apotheosis in the friezes of the circus. And at the same time it penetrates into the stables to explain the secrets of the trainer, the tamer, and the ring-master; into the booths to ask the clown for the story of his life—and by what chance, having become a gentleman himself, he one day met in the land of whims a gentleman who had become a clown!"

This, indeed, is what M. Le Roux has done in a series of twelve chapters on the organization of la vie foraine, the fair, the permanent shows or entresorts, the theatre booth, the trainers, the tamers, the equestrians, the hippodrome, the equilibrists, the gymnasts, the clowns, and M. Molier's private circus. Perhaps the most thorough and instructive chapters are those on the equestrians and the gymnasts. They are full of definite and interesting details. It might be idle to expect that any brief treatment could seem really to do justice to so large and fascinating a subject as the fair; nor does M. Le Roux quite satisfy us in the chapters devoted to the fair in its general aspects. He fails to bring before the reader the whole movement and charm of the thing; he is at the same time not always full and precise enough in his details. Here and there, in other parts of the book, one is inclined to complain of certain omissions. There is no mention, for instance, in the too brief pages on the "antipodeans"—the jugglers who work with their legs—of the Torikata troupe of Japanese, whose performances of this kind are distinctly notable. Nor is Vonare, the "only female contortionist," honoured by a mention. Is it possible that a lady of the accomplishments of Madame Vonare should never have found her way to Paris? A word, too, might have been given on the barbarous yet fascinating exercise of knife-throwing—rarely seen at all, and impressive only in the close circle of a little canvas booth in a country fair. M. Le Roux is rather disdainful of the mere athlete—the strong man—and perhaps a little unjust. The strong man has his own points of interest; he has before this been immortalized, one may hope, by a perfectly epic little narrative of M. Léon Cladel, 'L'Hercule.'

M. Le Roux holds out the hope of a sequel. His book is so novel, so instructive, so entertaining, that many people would be delighted to have some further chapters from him upon the subject he has made so thoroughly his own. As has been intimated, he has by no means exhausted that subject. What interesting researches might be made into the early history of the acrobatic art, its rise in antiquity, its developments and distortions in the Middle Ages, its progress in modern times! Its physiology might be still further studied; its resources in the way of picturesqueness are illimitable; there are yet oceans of inedited gossip from which to draw. It is therefore to be hoped that the success of his present book may encourage M. Le Roux in his—may we say historical studies?—studies, certainly, in the most difficult and valuable branch of historical research, the shifting, perplexing, disconcerting history of one's own times.

The Law of Libel in its Relation to the Press.

By Hugh Fraser. (Reeves & Turner.)

Even if we were not otherwise aware of the multiplication of actions for libel, especially against newspapers, there would be little difficulty in inferring it from the number of works which have appeared within the last two or three years with the object of enlightening those connected with the press on their liabilities and privileges. What is required in such a work is, as we remarked in criticizing one of them a short time ago, a clear and accurate summary of the law intelligible to the lay mind, not overloaded with cases or the technicalities of practice and procedure, and Mr. Fraser may fairly be congratulated on having produced a book which satisfies these requirements. It does not profess to be an exhaustive treatise on the whole law of libel, and the author has wisely omitted all except incidental reference to procedure and those parts of the subject which concern private individuals alone; but although the body of the book does not extend to seventy pages, we have not found that any point of importance to those for whom it is intended has been passed over. The leading principles of the law are stated in a series of articles or propositions, with notes showing, by reference to decided cases, how those principles are applied. The articles are clear and accurate, and the notes, without going into unnecessary detail, supply all the information which can reasonably be desired. There is also a good index, and an appendix containing the text of all the statutes connected with the subject. The most important part of the work is, of course, that which deals with the Act of 1888, and the result shows that the author has considered its provisions and the questions which arise on their construction with some care. He is of opinion that under the third section reports of proceedings in a court of justice are absolutely privileged, however malicious their publication may be, provided only that they satisfy the provisos contained in that section. There can be little doubt that this was not what Parliament intended, and, although the reasons given for coming to such a conclusion are entitled to considerable weight, we should not advise any one to act on the assumption that it is correct until the matter has been judicially decided. On the question whether, under the fourth section, reports of proceedings at public meetings are privileged only if the matter is of public concern and the publication thereof is for the public benefit, or whether it is sufficient for one of these conditions to be complied with, Mr. Fraser agrees with what we believe to be the opinion of the majority in adopting the latter alternative. The difficulty has in truth only arisen from its not having been sufficiently kept in mind that the proviso on which the question turns is framed in the negative, and Mr. Fraser's note on pp. 35 and 36 seems to be practically conclusive.

A handbook of this sort is not a great achievement, but it is easier to produce a bad one than a good one, and enough has been said to show that Mr. Fraser has produced one which is not only good in itself, but shows that he is capable of even better things in the future if he should attempt them.

A Trip through the Eastern Caucasus, with a Chapter on the Languages of the Country. By the Hon. John Abercromby. With Maps and Illustrations. (Stanford.)

MR. ABERCROMBY in the summer of 1888 made an interesting month's tour from Tiflis through the heart of the Eastern Caucasus. From Nucha he crossed the chain by a frequented pass to Ahti, rode through the hill country to Gunib, Schamyl's stronghold, and thence to the edge of the northern steppe. In place of returning by the hackneyed Dariel highroad, he wisely crossed the mountains by a by-road further east, through the district of the Chetchen, passing close to the heights of Shebulos. In snowy heights, however, Mr. Abercromby is only slightly interested. Indeed, the sentence in which he sums up the impressions made on him by a range he believes to have been that of the famous Kasbek might stand for a naïve summary of many chapters that have been written on the relations of men to mountains. "It was a grand spectacle," he writes, "and we had seen nothing like it before. Now that I knew we had not to pass over it, it looked sublime; before it had looked simply terrific and horrible." Few travellers, surely, have leapt so lightly from the point of view of a mediæval "Romer" to that of a nineteenth century pilgrim of the picturesque! But, on the whole, either Mr. Abercromby saw very little fine scenery, or he has failed to describe it. We incline to think that the fault does not lie entirely with the writer. Photography, so far as it has gone, confirms the report of competent judges as to the comparative aridity and tameness of outline—except in certain out-of-the-way corners such as the Shebulos and Basardjusi groups—of the mountains of Daghestan. Mr. Abercromby's journey was made along roads or horsepaths. It was consequently free from serious difficulty or adventure. He received everywhere what aid he required from the Russian officials, and he seems, on the whole, to have enjoyed himself. We cannot say he has written an enjoyable book. His notes are curt and dry, and he has not been at sufficient pains to collect and emphasize his impressions, and he consequently fails to communicate to his readers any very distinct general ideas of the region traversed. But the work is given a raison d'être by the fact that Mr. Abercromby makes a special study of languages, and writes with knowledge on complex questions of grammar which affect the source and relationship of the mountain tongues. He may also claim, we believe, to be the first English traveller who has described in detail the great wall of Derbend, twenty-five miles in length, and defended by numerous forts—a work ascribed to Chosroes I. and the sixth century. He paid also a visit to Kubâchi, an interesting village near Derbend, the inhabitants of which have long been famous as artificers in all kinds of metal work, earthenware, and stuffs.

The map of the Eastern Caucasus which accompanies the volume is much above the average, and does credit to its compiler, who shows a rare and sound appreciation of the characteristic features of the region portrayed.

Leaves of a Life: being the Reminiscences of Montagu Williams, Q.C. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

ANOTHER series of reminiscences! But in this case the author is a man who has something to recollect, and therefore something to tell. Mr. Montagu Williams, Q.C., has had a curiously chequered career. An Eton boy, a schoolmaster at Ipswich, a soldier, an actor, a dramatist, a brilliant advocate, a useful metropolitan magistrate, he has seen many sides of existence. His 'Leaves of a Life' are sufficiently varied and sufficiently crowded with matter to offer something of interest on almost every page. But though a variety of subjects is handled, the experiences which Mr. Williams has offered to the public are mainly drawn from his practice as a criminal lawyer.

"I think I may safely say that I have defended more prisoners than any other living man." This observation, which no one who is conversant with Mr. Williams's career will venture to challenge, gives the key-note of the book. All the causes célèbres of the past twenty years are discussed, and as a record of leading criminal prosecutions the volume has value as well as interest. Here, for instance, are the Hatton Garden murder, the Clerkenwell explosion, the trial of Madame Rachel, Rick Allah v. the Daily Telegraph, the Penge murder, the cases of Lefroy, De Tourville, Lamson, Hannah Dobbs, the strange matrimonial case of Lord Euston and Kate Smith, the alleged libel upon the sculptor Belt in Vanity Fair, and numerous other trials which would afford a stock-in-trade for many years to the composers of "shilling dreadfuls." The atmosphere of crime hangs heavily over the book, and is, perhaps, too little relieved by brighter gleams. Advocates are apt to forget that what interests them from a personal point of view has not the same interest for those who only read the recorded facts. Yet of all professional conversation, law affords the best, because the most general, material. Doctors talking of their cases, engineers of their constructions, soldiers of their drill, sailors of their rigging, scarcely tread on common ground with their auditors. It is different with lawyers so long as they do not discuss technical points of law. Above all, it is different with criminal lawyers, since they deal almost exclusively with human nature.

Mr. Montagu Williams has many stories to tell, and he tells them excellently. Dramatic power and the experience of advocacy both come into useful play. Mr. Justice Byles was evidently possessed of a considerable store of dry humour:—

"He was once hearing a case in which a woman was charged with causing the death of her child by not giving it proper food or treating it with the necessary care. Mr. F—, of the Western Circuit, conducted the defence, and while addressing the jury said: 'Gentlemen, it appears to be impossible that the prisoner can have committed this crime. A mother guilty of this conduct to her own child! Why, it is repugnant to our better feelings'; and then, being carried away by his own eloquence, he proceeded: 'Gentlemen, the beasts of the field, the birds of the air suckle their own young, and—' But at this point the learned judge interrupted him, and said: 'Mr. F—, if you establish the latter part of your proposition, your client will be acquitted to a certainty.'"

There are many amusing anecdotes related of the best-known figures among contemporary barristers. Mr. Poland is described as causing his family great anxiety by the bad fit of his clothes. He was persuaded by Mr. Underdown, Q.C., to go to Poole's and be measured. But the new suit fitted the wearer worse than the old. The tailor was interviewed by Mr. Poland's friend:—

"It is not my fault, sir, I assure you. Every care was taken, as you desired, but how could we fit a gentleman who would insist on being measured sitting down? Underdown did not know what to make of this, and at once proceeded to the Temple to solve the mystery. On learning the object his visitor had in calling, Poland said, with the imperturbable manner peculiar to him: 'Well, it's my business and not yours. I like to be comfortable. I spend three parts of my life sitting down, and I prefer to be measured so.'"

Here is a story of Mr. Waddy and Mr. Lockwood, in which the latter, for once, got the worst of an encounter of wits. Mr. Waddy, who is not only a lawyer and member of Parliament, but a preacher, was about to officiate in a chapel in an assize town on the North-Eastern Circuit.

"Lockwood at once resolved to attend the service with two or three fellow barristers in order that his learned friend might have a surprise. Arriving at the chapel, they took up their positions immediately underneath the pulpit and well within the vision of the occupant. It was the custom for the officiating minister, before he commenced his discourse, to nominate one of the congregation to give out and lead a hymn. Waddy, without moving a muscle of his face, pointed towards the tall, stalwart form of Lockwood, and said: 'Brethren, Brother Lockwood will give out and lead our hymn.' I need scarcely say that, upon this, my dear friend Lockwood, and his associates, beat a hasty retreat."

Two incidents in his professional career Mr. Williams narrates with evident gusto; and we can well imagine the pleasures of his revenge. When a very young man, his confiding nature was taken advantage of by a money-lender named Cook. Years afterwards it fell to his lot to prosecute Cook for defrauding a widow. In the interval Cook had become a man of considerable wealth, and drove down to the Old Bailey to stand his trial in a magnificent carriage to which were harnessed a pair of splendid horses. Mr. Williams had his opportunity and made the most of it. "Cook was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment." There is still a ring of delight in the concluding words of Mr. Williams:—

"The trial finished late in the afternoon, and, as I retraced my steps through the courtyard to proceed home, I again saw the magnificent carriage standing there. The coachman had been instructed to return and fetch his master. The vehicle, however, drove empty away."

The other occasion arose out of the loss of a favourite dog. Mr. Williams offered many rewards for the recovery of Rob, and at last negotiations were opened with him for its restoration. The dog-stealers met him at Shoreditch Church, and after long delays, many precautions, and much haggling, gave up the dog for 20l. The transaction concluded, Mr. Williams offered the men something to drink. In the course of conversation

"I modestly remarked, that, knowing who I was, I thought it rather too bad of them to steal my dog. 'Ah! that's the best of it,' said one of them. 'Lord, sir, you should have seen how my pal Bill here did laugh. 'Ain't it rather hard,' says I, 'to take the counsellor's dawg?' 'Not a bit, Jim,' says he, 'he's had a good lot out of us, and why shouldn't we get a little out of him?'"

The fates were propitious. Two years later Mr. Williams had to prosecute his friend. The prisoner was convicted, and as he was hurried off to the cells he was heard to mutter, "Thought he'd have me some day. He's made me pay d— dear at last for those pieces."

No one can fail to be interested in these volumes; and no one will, we think, put them down without a kindly feeling towards the author. The terrible misfortune which fell upon him in 1886 is told with a manly simplicity which makes the story truly pathetic. And it may be fairly said that there is not throughout these volumes a harsh or unkind word uttered of any of his professional contemporaries. Nor would it be just to explain this by saying that Mr. Williams only speaks of himself, since there is hardly one of the prominent figures at the bar for the past twenty-five years who does not appear in these 'Leaves of a Life.'

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

A Lady Horsebreaker. By Mrs. Conney. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

Broughton. By A. S. Arnold. 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

The Gold of Ophir. By Elizabeth J. Lysaght. 3 vols. (Same publishers.)

Duchess Frances. By Sarah Tytler. 2 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)

Cœurs Inquiets. Par J. Ricard. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

'A LADY HORSEBREAKER' is on a par with so many other novels that the same often repeated comments apply with equal force to it and to all and sundry of the class. It may be read quite easily, and forgotten still more easily; and that is about the most one can say for it. It is a little tantalizing, too, and would be more so did one care at all about any of the characters and the course of their true loves. The female horsebreaker seems to be a feature now in three-volume novels. It is just a fashion, of course, like another, and will pass like other fashions, leaving nothing behind. In the mean time it has its uses.

Broughton is the name of a remarkable village of Mr. Arnold's own creation, peopled by a variety of peculiar personages. The quantity of good done, or intended to be done, in this favoured locality by the upper stratum of society—only from the use of such a word as "upper" it would recoil in scorn and loathing—is portentous. Sympathy with the masses rather than the classes is pronounced. "Gentleman!" ex-claims the village doctor—or somebody else—"Gentleman! there is no evil deed a gentleman is incapable of committing." The hero Arthur "had a decided bent, but that was not earthly ambition." It takes him down a mine, however (Broughton is in the mining districts), where, provided with biscuits and sherry (he dines late), he makes it his mission to propagate politeness amongst the miners. The Miners' Joy has a brother Reginald, carefully called Regie, not Reggie, who for a time holds aloof from the movement, but is presently "roped in." "The bearish manners of the poor struck him [Regie] as almost singular," and a cottage death-bed scene "left its impression on his statuesque countenance. They fetched him a glass of wine, but he declined it—he had become a total abstainer." Arthur, on the contrary, "took the floor" for drinking—moderate drinking only. Happily for themselves the parents of these young reformers "did not attempt to penetrate into the interior working of the minds of their children." Nor shall we. Suffice it to note that "their conduct jarred upon the susceptibilities of this gradually prosaic growing couple." The village squire seems to be quite the most mysterious and unaccountable of all the "wicked squires" we remember in fiction. He is a scoundrel of the "fascinating" type, with a touch of Rochester and more of the fool about him. Strangely disguised persons are harboured in his home, and he contracts marriages under false names with hopeless levity. At length, having been "too near the fire and become frightfully singed," he turns over a new leaf, and makes a bona fide marriage with his daughter's governess. The mysteries it is impossible to tackle—they are beyond any critic's understanding, and seemingly beyond that of everybody else. As the author of 'Broughton' is in his logical and luminous way has it—"Revelations would have been disastrous, so revelations there were none, though there was not a coward amongst them."

It is unfortunate for the large class of novels which depend upon personation and the like for their plot, and upon the plot for their interest, that the experienced reader invariably detects the insidious claimant or other villain at the very outset of his career of duplicity. In Miss Lysaght's novel, which is quite well enough written (she has plenty of fluency), the reader is distressed at discovering the nature of the mystery involving the fortunes of the Menæchmi or Ardells as soon as he finds the unusual conveniences for resuscitation provided by the munificence of the Sieur de Longueville. It becomes clear in the first chapter, or at any rate in the second, that John Ardell's intended heir is only suppressed, that he is "lying low" only in a metaphorical sense, and will "dop up," if we may use the latest phrase, at the proper dramatic period. Otherwise the schemes of the wrong James Ardell are successfully pursued, and with an effrontery which naturally prevailed with his credulous uncle, and almost enlists the sympathy of the reader. Peggy is a pleasant heroine, and the unhappy Clara Vibert a very womanly woman.

It is hard to fancy court dames of Charles II.'s time speaking of "glamour," or using the vulgarity "I'm agreeable" for "I agree," or the colloquial elliptic "to." In other respects Miss Tytler has attempted the diction of the century with fair success, though it cannot be said her characters move easily under the burden. In fact our author's experiment is more or less a failure. She is too well informed to pervert the facts connected with her characters, but she surely underrates the education of her public if she thinks many people will find novelty in a hasty sketch Bowdlerized from Grammont or founded on the well-known memoirs of the time, and dealing with a subject so trite and so comparatively unimportant as the court life of Charles II. Frances Jennings is certainly a good typical personage on whom to centre such a story, if it was worth writing at all, and the contrast between the fortunes of the pair of duchesses forms a sufficient antithesis to give point to the narrative. Miss Tytler has touched with a light hand such matters as the Plague and the Great Fire, and has done, on the whole, what she could with what we must think rather ill-chosen materials.

M. Ricard, the author of 'Secret de Femme,' has produced in 'Cœurs Inquiets' a novel which will confirm the good opinion of him entertained by those in Paris who watch for new writers. The book is slight, but well written and readable, and has for its only artistic fault the imitation of the custom of the two Daudets in introducing real characters under that "thin disguise" which is no disguise at all. The story is not one suited to English taste.

RECENT BIOGRAPHIES.

MR. EDWARD WALFORD dedicates William Pitt: a Biography (Chatto & Windus) to Mr. Gladstone, "qui ipse per se ostendit opiniones adolescenti adhibitas multos post annos salvo honore posse mutari." The book, we grieve to say, is scarcely critical, consisting to a considerable extent of extracts from Wraxall and William Wilberforce, Lord Stanhope and Mr. Lecky, which are connected by a somewhat rambling narrative. The chapters dealing with the Union and the formation of the Addington administration are unfortunately confused. Thus there are given two different lists of Addington's cabinet (pp. 212 and 221) and two accounts of his budget (pp. 217 and 233). And what does Mr. Walford mean by saying, "It is asserted by Pitt's friends, and probably the assertion is true, that he always intended the boon of the Union to be accompanied.....by the boon of Catholic Emancipation"? A page or two afterwards he describes the actual announcement of the scheme to the king and Pitt's consequent resignation. After this it is not surprising to be told, on Addington's authority, that Pitt was hardly ever seen with a book in his hand after his accession to power (p. 303), and on p. 306 to find a statement that he was fairly fond of reading. As to some of the debatable points in his career—for instance, the recall of Lord Fitzwilliam and Pitt's sudden change of front during the debates on the prosecution of Warren Hastings—little information is to be found; indeed, the latter incident is passed over in absolute silence, though Mr. Walford might have gathered from Macaulay that it was important. Even upon the crucial question whether there were one or two Mr. Pitts the writer does not seem to have made up his mind. In the introductory chapter the reader is told that there were two, "less from a change of political opinions in the abstract than from a conviction that there are times when it is wise to keep in abeyance questions which are not likely to be widely dealt with in certain circumstances." On

p. 160 it is declared that after the French Revolution he took up "a retrograde position not easily reconcilable with that forward attitude which he had hitherto occupied." There are few absolute blunders; but Lord Grenville, not Mr. William Grenville, became Premier on the death of Pitt, and Mr. Walford speaks of him as if he thought that he joined the rest of the clan in their secession of 1789, a slip which is all the more strange because later on he mentions Grenville's elevation to the peerage and acceptance of the leadership of the House of Lords.

MR. T. F. THISELTON-DYER is a prolific writer. Some six months ago his two volumes on 'Great Men at Play' were reviewed in the Athenæum. Now he publishes two more volumes on The Loves and Marriages of some Eminent Persons (Ward & Downey). The subject lends itself readily to moralizing; but Mr. Dyer refrains from any advice to eminent persons about to marry, and perhaps he is wise. On the whole, it may be gathered from his volume that the great have been fortunate in affairs of the heart. Another point which Mr. Dyer might have attempted to settle is which of the professions has been most happily married; have great divines been better off than great soldiers? and so on. But here again it would have been difficult to establish a thoroughly sound generalization. Mr. Dyer is content to classify his subjects under "Married Happiness," "Unhappily Married," "Eccentric Marriages," and similar headings. His present book is considerably more methodical than his last, though one would hardly expect to find Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, under "Early Loves," or Rogers under "Early Flirtations," since there is a chapter on "Unmarried," to which he would have been consigned far more appropriately. The account of Sheridan's elopement with Miss Linley is inadequate, as no mention is made of the fact that he fought two duels with Capt. Matthews, and very nearly fought a third. In dealing with Nelson and Lady Hamilton Mr. Dyer, oddly enough, omits all mention of Lady Nelson; and in his description of the unhappy marriage of William Lamb, Lord Melbourne, the dates are wrong, Lamb's separation from Lady Caroline having occurred after, not before, Byron's death. Shelley and his Harriet were, perhaps, inevitable, but Mr. Dyer tells the story in a straightforward way, without bothering his own head or his readers about the rights and wrongs of the case. "Lord John Hervey" and "Lord Charles Metcalf" are still talked about by Mr. Dyer where Lord Hervey and Lord Metcalf are meant; but the style is an improvement on that of 'Great Men at Play.' It is rather astonishing, however, to learn of Mrs. Siddons that "she was seized with an attack of illness, and died on the 11th of March, 1808; in allusion to which mournful event she wrote.....to Mrs. Piozzi."

CANON OVERTON'S volume, John Hannah: a Clerical Study (Rivingtons), is free from the obvious defects of most of the biographies that have reached us of late. It is not a mere collection of letters and sermons, thrown together with a slight thread of narrative to connect them, but it is an honest attempt to tell the story of Dr. Hannah's life. It is free from gush, and is written in plain, straightforward English. It is also short, and no effort has been made to lengthen it needlessly. Canon Overton's main defect is, we think, a tendency to introduce testimonials from various quarters to Dr. Hannah's merits. This was hardly necessary.

DR. GARNETT'S Life of John Milton (Scott) is an able book, like most of Dr. Garnett's writings, and contains much sound sense and good criticism. At the same time, on the main question raised by our author, whether it was a benefit to Milton to spend some of the best years of his life in acrid controversy, we must disagree with him. On that point the view of the late Rector of Lincoln was unquestionably correct.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MADAME CARETTE has published another work about the fall of the Second Empire, of which a translation, under the name of The Eve of an Empire's Fall, reaches us from Messrs. Dean & Son. Madame Carette had not enough to say to make out her new work, and the book is not of value. The translation, however, is well executed, and such is the interest taken by the public in all books of personal gossip that very probably this volume may command a sale. It is illustrated by some cuts of varying degrees of merit. The likenesses of Prince Bismarck and of the Emperor Frederick are excellent, but those of General Trochu, Marshal MacMahon, and M. Thiers are singularly bad, that of the Marshal being so unlike that no one could possibly recognize it as being meant for him if the name were not appended. The account given of the outbreak of the war is singularly incorrect. The reader is invited to believe that war was declared by the French Cabinet at the end of an eight hours' sitting, against the opinion of the Emperor and the Empress. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister was not even present at St. Cloud at the time when the decision was taken. The writer is most unfair to M. Thiers, and attacks him for having "waved the brand of discord" on the 5th of July, when all he did was to call upon the Government to make a statement which no Parliament in the world could have abstained from demanding, while she at the same time denounces him for not having warned the Government in time of the inadequacy of its preparations for war, on "the 15th July." According to the author, by his speeches of the 5th of July and of the 12th of August M. Thiers gave encouragement to the enemy. We wonder what she would have said of him if on the day of the declaration of war he had said that which she now suggests he should have uttered from the tribune. M. Thiers is not the only Republican statesman attacked. M. Jules Favre is charged with having forgotten the French Army of the East in the armistice negotiations, and we suppose that Madame Carette is unaware of the fact that the whole negotiations turned upon the position of that army, and that the one point upon which the Germans insisted above all others was that Bourbaki's force, which was at the moment on the brink of destruction, should be kept outside the armistice and consequently destroyed.

WE have received from Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. The Colonial Year-Book for the Year 1890, edited by Mr. Trendell, and introduced to the world by an admirable preface from the pen of Prof. Seeley, the only faults of which are that it is too completely historical and too short. The advertisement of the 'Year-Book' is not quite fair to its predecessor the 'Colonial Office List,' and when it is stated that the 'Year-Book' supplies a want in giving systematic information about the colonies not previously to be found in any single publication, and with a completeness not before attempted, it is necessary to point out that the 'Colonial Office List' is, on the whole, the more complete, although there are a few things in the 'Colonial Year-Book' for which the reader of the 'Colonial Office List' would have had to turn to other works, as, for example, to the 'Year-Book of the Church of England' for the bishops' commissaries, while the lists of the Roman Catholic hierarchy given by the new book have hitherto not been easy to find. The 'Year-Book' adopts the same form of alphabetical order which is adopted in the 'Colonial Office List,' and which is the best. The maps which have been prepared by Mr. Stanford for the 'Year-Book' are perfect, although in some of them the scale is necessarily so small as to be a little trying to the eyes. The railways are not given in the maps, and, indeed, it would have been difficult to have marked them without confusion to the eye. The maps in the rival publication are far less good in a general sense, but they they have the advantage of indicating the railways. The new work is a little uncertain as to its lists of ministries, which is a defect. It would probably have been better to print the ministry of every colony, but as a fact some ministries have been completely given, others partly given, and others, again, not given at all. When one thinks of Newfoundland, for example—the self-governing colony, possessing responsible institutions, to which most attention is called at the present moment—one recalls the Prime Minister, Sir William Whiteway, and the late Prime Minister, Sir Robert Thorburn, yet, while the Governor, the English bishop and his commissary, three Roman Catholic bishops, the Chief Justice, the Colonial Secretary, and the President of the Legislative Council are named, neither the present nor the late Prime Minister is, so far as we see, mentioned; and the Colonial Secretary whose name is given belonged to the late Government, and has probably been superseded since the general election of last year and change of government. The Canadian provincial ministries seem to be omitted, and we have not found in the work even a list of the Dominion Cabinet, although the Canadian prelates of the Church of Rome occupy an entire page, and the Canadian bishops of the Anglican Church and their commissaries two whole pages. It is, however, possible that few persons using the book for reference in England need to know the names of the colonial ministers, especially when these serve under a Prime Minister whose importance is so overwhelming as that of Sir John Macdonald. Certain faults are to be found in this work which are inevitable in the first issue of a book of reference, and which can easily be corrected in the future. For example, a feature is made of the chartered companies; but while the directors of one are inserted, in a second case only the chairman is mentioned, and in a third case none of the directors named at all. At p. 645 we have the full dates of the first and second meetings of the Federal Council of Australasia, and an account of the matters discussed at the first two meetings; but nothing is said about the meeting of 1888-9. Details are given as to the excellence of the harbour at Aden, and the better natural harbour at Perim is not described; but this is, of course, a trifle. We somewhat object to the phrases "Lagos, which is the Liverpool of Africa," "the wealthiest and most populous city on the African seaboard,"—of course a joke, but a somewhat cruel one when we remember that that continent includes such ports as Alexandria, Port Said, Algiers, Cape Town, Durban, and Zanzibar, not to mention the flourishing ports of the Western Province of the Cape, some of which do a very large amount of trade. The trade of Lagos, in and out, is only about one million sterling. We are told, probably by a local Lagos writer, that this Liverpool of Africa is "entered by a somewhat dangerous bar." At p. 396 there is an account of an octopus which would be best omitted, for his body is 15 ft. in length, while his arms vary from 6 ft. to 11 ft., and constitute him a monster in whose grasp an elephant would have no chance. The 15 ft. must be a mistake, as the account goes on to state that the circumference was 6 ft.; but 15 inches seems too small for such a wonder. We notice that Lord Salisbury has gone too fast even for so intelligent a map-maker as Mr. Stanford, and that the light red of British protectorate has not yet spread in Mr. Trendell's useful book over the Shiré highlands in the map of British Africa. The 'Year-Book' will, no doubt, grow better and better year by year.

WE welcome the second issue of Cassell's excellent Metropolitan Year-Book, greatly increased in size in 1890 by the inclusion of new matter relating to the County Council. Among the few errors which we are able to discover in this useful volume we note the use of the term "Greater London" at p. 2 in the unusual sense of the metropolis or county of London, whereas on p. 3 the words are used, as in the returns of mortality, for the "Greater London" of the Registrar General. The phrase was invented by the latter, and should be applied as he applies it. We fancy that the author is wrong in telling us that the London postal district does not include the whole metropolis; at all events, districts are, we think, included within the London postal district which are not in the metropolis, as, for example, Chiswick. At p. 4 the Library Rate should be included, although by an Act of 1889 it is in future to be levied with the Poor Rate. The account of metropolitan assessment at p. 85 assumes that the system is the same in the various parishes. This is not the case. In some districts, under local Acts, the guardians discharge duties which in other parishes pertain to vestries. The book will be increasingly made use of by all who have to do with the local concerns of London.

A HERO OF 'THE DUNCIAD.'

SEEING that you have done Thomas Cooke—commonly called Hesiod Cooke—the honour of an elaborate notice under the above heading, you will, perhaps, allow me to point out a serious omission in your article. Your writer with reason makes merry over Cooke's projected translation of Plautus, which was never completed, but forgets to mention that Cooke published in three volumes in 1734 the best translation of Terence in the language. This work is at all points admirable, and to suppress the fact of its publication is to do Cooke's memory a serious wrong. I should like to add that your writer represents Cooke as far more obsolete than he really is. I wrote the memoir of him for the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' and found almost all the facts recorded by your writer in very obvious authorities. If your writer had consulted my memoir, he might have added some other facts of interest, and would have avoided the common error of misdating Cooke's birth, which a reference to the Braintree parish register enabled me to correct. Cooke was born December 16th, 1703. SIDNEY LEE.

Felsted, Feb. 17, 1890.

YOUR note on Thomas Cooke is interesting; but may it be asked on what authority you give 1702 as the year of his birth? It is said that the date given in the Braintree parish register is December 16th, 1703. Again, should you not have mentioned Mark Pattison's contention that the Cook of the 'Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot' was not Thomas Cooke, but Roger Cooke? The context points rather to an allusion to Cooke's 'Detection of the Court and State of England' than to one to Cooke's 'Scandalous Chronicle.' May there be added to your note Dr. Johnson's anecdote of Cooke? The doctor said that Cooke "presented Foote to a club in the following singular manner: 'This is the nephew of the gentleman who was lately hung in chains for murdering his brother.'" J. SARGEAUNT.

* * * The purport of the notice of "Hesiod" Cooke in these columns was to show something of the life of a Grub Street author in Pope's time, not to throw new light on Cooke's career.

or to ignore Mr. Lee's article. Mr. Lee describes our notice of Cooke as "elaborate," and then with some inconsistency reproaches us for not having added to it "other facts of interest." December 16th, 1703, probably was the date of Cooke's birth, but Cooke himself appears to have believed that he was born in 1702. He writes (Gentleman's Magazine for 1791, part ii. p. 1090), "My acquaintance with him [Hammond] began in 1722, when I was in the twentieth year of my age." We were well acquainted with Boswell's anecdote about Cooke and Foote, but were pressed for space. Mark Pattison's ingenious suggestion, which, by the way, Mr. Courthope appears to have overlooked, we had forgotten for the moment.

ST. BERNARD.

MR. EALES writes to us regarding his translation of St. Bernard:—

"I should be glad, with your permission, to make a few brief observations respecting matters touched upon by the reviewer. (1.) Mabillon's 'Introduction' treats very fully of the various editions up to his time. Some further information is given at the end of it in the new edition, and the principal later editions are named in order on p. vii of vol. ii. The English bibliography is printed on pp. xiii, xiv of vol. i. I hope it will be conceded that my sins of omission have not been very serious in this respect. (2.) I know Dr. Georg Hüffer's 'Vorstudien' very well, and the letters he has discovered will be found to be included in the forthcoming volume. It would have been undesirable to disturb Mabillon's numbering for the sake of intercalating these nineteen or twenty letters under their dates, if even these could be determined with any approach to certainty. (3.) It is no easy matter to glean after the encyclopædic industry of Horst and Mabillon. But I have added between thirty and forty notes, some of them of considerable length, and I am not aware that I have left any important difficulty unexplained. Perhaps I may add that I have annotated Miss Norgate's 'Angevin Kings' throughout for the purpose of this edition; but the time is not yet to go into these matters. (4.) The differences in the numbering of the letters are invariably given at the foot of the page; but the suggestion to exhibit these in a tabular form is good, as is that of a synoptical table of contents, and I beg to thank the reviewer for them."

COPYRIGHT IN CANADA.

UNDER the Imperial Act of 1842, Canada, as a colony of Great Britain, is forbidden to republish works copyrighted here without a transfer of control from the holders of such copyrights. Seventeen years ago the Dominion Parliament passed an Act by which Canada practically took this matter into her own hands. The Act was disallowed in England, and the colonial House submitted without protest. But seventeen years, especially seventeen latter years of the nineteenth century, make a good deal of difference as to the wisdom of disallowing colonial Acts, and the Minister of Justice for Canada apparently understands this. For the "Bill to amend the" (present Canadian) "Copyright Act," introduced by him, brought to its third reading, and passed (with some discussion, but no opposition) towards the close of the past session of the Canadian Parliament, differs very slightly from the impotent Act of 1872.

Such legislation as exists in Canada upon the subject, apart from the Bill of 1889, is chiefly concerned with the regulation of Canadian copyrights, and is of no special interest to any but the publishers and the public of Canada. Its main provision is that works copyrighted in Canada must be printed as well as published there; but the British publisher, hitherto secure against unauthorized Canadian editions, has not cared much for authorized ones, preferring to keep the market for his own. This provision, therefore, affects nobody very much but the American author and publisher, who, unless they secure Canadian copyrights, are unprotected against Canadian piracy. The "printing and publishing" clause is not very inimical even to American interests, as almost all American books of any importance or popularity are now, by the laxity of the English law, copyrighted and published simultaneously in the United States and in England, their British copyrights protecting them from cheap pirated Canadian editions, and giving the holders command of the Canadian market.

The provisions of the new Bill, which now awaits the sanction of the Privy Council to become law in Canada on the day which shall be appointed by an Order in Council there, do, however, and very seriously, affect the interests of the British author and the British publisher, the American author and the American publisher. Briefly they are:—

That the conditions for obtaining copyright in Canada shall be, as before, the printing and publishing of the copyrighted work in Canada.

That unless a copyright be taken out in Canada by the British author or owner of any work published here within one month of its publication in Great Britain, the Canadian Government may grant a licence to any person or persons to publish it in Canada, upon condition that the said person or persons give bond for the amount of the excise duty imposed by the Government upon the book, the duty being a royalty of ten per cent. on the retail price of the book, collected on the whole edition authorized to be printed, for the amount of which the Canadian Government makes itself responsible to the British author.

That during the month allowed for arrangements by the British copyright-holder, and afterwards until the lawful term for preserving copyright shall have expired—if any licence has been applied for in Canada—the importation of American reprints of British copyrights shall be prohibited.

That these provisions are not retroactive in their character, but apply only to works copyrighted after the date upon which they come into operation.

Canada's position with regard to the book market is a peculiar one, and a statement of it may help to modify the views of those who consider this Bill a high-handed and unwarrantable interference with the sacred rights of authorship. With little literary activity of her own, both her public and her publishers are largely dependent upon English and American books. In the present state of the law a Canadian publisher may not reprint English books in the cheap form which is demanded by the Canadian reading public, or in any form, without an arrangement with the British copyright-holder which the British copyright-holder will not make. There is nothing to prevent the American publisher from so doing, however, and therefore, in spite of a double tax at the frontier, the American reprints of English books take entire possession of the Canadian market. The Canadian publisher cannot assuage his wrath and fill his pocket by pirating American books, because so large a proportion of those that would make it worth while are protected from him by their British copyrights. On the other hand, the English author or his representative may sell, and does sell, his Canadian rights to American publishers, who are thus enabled to publish at home and introduce their enormous editions in Canada at will. The Canadian book market is controlled, therefore, by everybody and anybody but the Canadian publisher, a state of things which he cannot reasonably be supposed to like. This Bill is a long-delayed, oft-discussed blow in his interests; and undoubtedly, if it becomes law, it will afford an enormous stimulus to the trade. Its benefit to the Canadian public will not be so marked. In case of copyright being taken out by the British holder, the prohibition of American reprints will deprive the Canadians from any cheaper edition than the British author cares to arrange. In case no copyright is taken out and licences are granted it probably means that the public will be condemned to the cheapest copy that it is possible to issue profitably in Canada, with no alternative but the high-priced English editions, which may, of course, still be imported. The Canadian reader will probably pay as much for the licensed Canadian copy as he formerly did for the pirated American one, in spite of the fifteen per cent. book tax and the twelve-and-a-half per cent. author's tax which the latter paid at the frontier; for the Canadian publisher carries a considerable weight in the author's royalty exacted by his Government and the twenty-five per cent. duty he pays on all the paper he imports. The reader, however, while he may lose all chance of cheap editions of English books which he now enjoys in the imported piracies of the Americans, may gain, in the event of licences being taken out, cheap issues of American books now available only at English prices.

From the author's point of view it is difficult to see anything but pecuniary gain, though his dignity may find some affront in the rather arbitrary way in which it is offered him. He is absolutely certain, not of a percentage on the Canadian publisher's returns, if he allows the month to lapse and the licence to be given, but of a very fair royalty on the entire edition risked in the market. If more than one licence is given to print his book, his profits grow and his responsibility does not increase. Canada becomes practically, by the exclusion of the American reprints, a new market for him. True, the conscientious Canadian Government has for many years collected an author's tax at the frontier on these pirated editions, at a cost considerably higher than the collection ever amounted to, and forwarded it, properly proportioned, to the defrauded copyright-holders in Great Britain; but it is generally admitted that the scrutiny exercised is listless and inadequate, and that a good many more pirated copies find their way into Canadian book-shops than are accounted for in the authors' returns in the Canadian blue-books. The English author, moreover, has now something definite and tangible to offer his publisher in the shape of a reading public in Canada, safe from the tampering influences of conscienceless American neighbours. In his publisher thinks it worth his while to arrange for a Canadian copyright and edition, the author may reasonably expect consideration for giving him the chance. If, on the contrary, the publisher is indifferent, the author can well afford to let the matter rest for a time, and wait for the licence and the royalty. The most objectionable feature to the author is naturally his loss of control of his work after the month has expired, since he is powerless to prevent his own appearance in a form possibly least suited to his idea of his consequence and the decorum of things. In this respect, however, the situation will remain as it is at present—for the British author is not now consulted as to the style of the American piracies which flood Canada—with the slight amelioration of the guaranteed royalty.

Sympathy on the score of the Bill is doubtless properly divided between the British publisher and the American pirate, both of whom must lose a proportion of what the Canadian publishing houses gain. The American loss will doubtless be the greater one, for Canadians, while they are a reading people, have all a hurried young nation's liking for editions that cost little and may be left in the railway carriage or dropped into the hospital-box, once read and done with. If the English publishing trade had recognized this years ago, and permitted some sort of an arrangement to mutual advantage with Canadian houses, it is not probable that the pressure necessary to get this Bill through the Canadian Parliament would have been resorted to, at least for some time to come. Nor, to the outward eye of the buyer, have the high-priced volumes with which it has been the policy of the English book trade to try to coerce the Canadian market ever seemed popular. I have not seen a novel in three volumes on Canadian shelves for ten years—they may have been there, but not in conspicuous numbers. We are very fond, though, of the little, cheap, fat, green and white American stories published by Mr. David Douglas.

From a moral standpoint the Bill is excusable, but not defensible—a questionable thing done with every regard to decency and propriety. By its licensing clause the Government sanctions a qualified piracy; and in its month of grace a limit is put upon the actions of a people who still dictate laws to Canada, which they may fairly be disposed to resent. On the other hand, the difficulties and anomalies of the colonial situation are undeniable; and it is evident that the Dominion Government has taken this step circumspectly and with every reasonable provision against injury to the person it most intimately concerns—the British author.

As to the legal right of the colonial Government to deal with the matter by a measure conflicting with an Imperial Act, that is claimed among the ample powers bestowed upon the Dominion lawmakers by the British North America Act. Exercising those powers, the Parliament at Ottawa has repealed, according to Sir John Thompson in his speech upon the Bill, "sometimes by implication and sometimes directly, scores of Imperial enactments in addition to volumes of the Common Law of the United Kingdom; and, if the objection were sustained in regard to the exercise of our powers on the question of copyright, it would strike off at least one half of the Revised Statutes..... I would feel some hesitation in asking Parliament to take a course contrary to Lord Carnarvon's opinion" (expressed in 1872) "if we did not necessarily act from day to day on the principle that we can legislate on subjects of this character, which are given into our control by the British North America Act irrespective of anterior legislation of the Imperial Parliament, and if my views were not supported by three cases which have been decided since that date. The Privy Council has declared, in the most emphatic terms, that the Dominion legislature has power to repeal an Imperial statute."

The Canadian Government is evidently sanguine that the Bill will be allowed to come into operation, and Canadians generally will watch its fate with the special interest that attaches to all their relations with the mother country at the present time.

SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN.

SIR JOHN HAWKWOOD.

THE publication of the English edition of the 'Life of Hawkwood' has met with just approval, but, as might be expected, there are incidents in his career still requiring further elucidation. Among them must be placed foremost the uncertainty in which the authors of the book have left us as to whether the great Condottiere was at any time in captivity and put to ransom. As I have found incontrovertible proof in the affirmative contained in the archives of Perugia I will lay it before your readers.

In the battle which took place near Arezzo on July 22nd, 1365, between the partisans of the Pope, helped by the German company of Bongarden in the pay of Perugia, and Hawkwood, helped by his Pisan allies, the English suffered almost annihilation. One account says "all were taken prisoners with Giovanni Acuto." We are told by the Siena chronicles that Andrea Belmont and fifty other officers were carried to Perugia, but that Augud escaped. The chronicles of Perugia name Belmont and three other notable prisoners, who were soon liberated on condition that they would respect its territory for five years. This promise was not kept, for on March 29th, 1367, Belmont and Hawkwood fought the Perugians at Ponte San Giovanni, slew 1,500 men, and took their commanders prisoners. The room where the magistrates of Perugia resolved to free Belmont was after this bloody defeat called the "Room of Evil Counsel." It is now called "Sala del Catasto."

After their description of the battle generally known by the name of San Mariano (1365), and the revenge in 1367, Messrs. Temple-Leader and Marcotti say they consider Hawkwood's capture in 1365 as "exceedingly doubtful," but rightly enough remark, in a foot-note, that the mistake of attributing it to that battle was owing to his subsequent defeat and actual captivity on June 15th, 1368, when, having changed sides, he marched to succour Perugia from his former employers.

However, while believing in his capture and ransom on this last occasion, they are content to base their opinion solely on a prolonged silence of historians at this juncture concerning his other feats of arms, and argue that if at liberty he would not have been so inactive. I quote from the Italian edition their description of this second defeat of Hawkwood—again near Arezzo.

"The English, encamped in the plain near the city, a mile from Porta Buja, were attacked by the Arezzo horse and foot, supported by the army of the Pope under Simone di Spoleto, and by two German companies under Flaxen di Riebach and Giovanni di Rieten; the fight was long and furious, and many of the leaders were killed, but at last the English were defeated, and nearly all made prisoners, including their captain, Giovanni Haud (Hawkwood), many officers, and the unfortunate Dinolo di Bindo Monaldi, ambassador of the Perugians."

Two of the names mentioned in this account of the battle are prominent in the extract I now translate from the Latin 'Annali Decemviri' of the city of Perugia, and render Hawkwood's capture in the same absolutely certain, viz., that of the German captain Flaxen and that of the Perugian envoy Dinolo ('Reformationum Liber,' No. 85, Carta 11):—

"January 18th, 1371. In a council held by the Priori and Camerlinghi of the Art Guilds of Perugia by order of the noble Signor Michele Bonoguidi of Volterra, Captain of the People of the City, in the Palazzo, all the Priori and thirty-one Camerlinghi being present. Imprints the German magnificus miles Signor Flack di Riebach [sic], Captain of War of the Commune of Perugia, asserts to be owing to him by the commune 500 gold florins, which he declares were promised to him on behalf of the said commune by Luca d'Angelino and Angelino di Ceccolo on the occasion of the release and liberation granted of Signor Giovanni Hawkwood [sic], formerly in their pay, and captain of the English engaged in the service of the Commune of Perugia, and of Dinolo di Bindolo [sic], a Perugian citizen, who had been taken prisoner in the district of Arezzo, in which release he affirms that he and his brother had much occupied themselves; and with much urgency he demands that the 500 florins should be paid by the commune, otherwise he does not intend to give any receipt to our commune for the payment of any future stipend; and the said Luca and Angelino attest what he says to be true."

The deliberation ends with an order to the public treasurer to pay the 500 florins without any deduction for tax of any kind, prudently adding it is done chiefly lest Flack may recede from the pay and service of Perugia, for whose advantage he labours greatly.

It is evident from this document that Flaxen had changed sides once, and was ready to do so again; indeed, I read in Pellini's 'History of Perugia' that in 1368, after his victory, he deserted the Papal army, and enlisted under the vanquished Hawkwood, his captive. When Hawkwood and Dinolo were his prisoners he was opposed to the Perugians, and, as we now know, relied on the promise of two of their agents to pay the ransom in question. He waited from June, 1368, to January, 1371, two years and a half, for payment, and then adopted effectual means to secure his long-standing debt in the new capacity of a friend and doubtful ally. As your reviewer writes, "the captive of one battle was the captor of the next."

I find in Curzio Patrizi's (1620) MS. compilation of Siena chronicles the anecdote of Belmont's gallant conduct to Madonna Tancia, the beautiful wife of Guido della Foresta, but his breach of parole to Perugia is out of harmony with his reputation and the rules of chivalry.

I possess a list of the references (extending from 1369 to 1383) made to Hawkwood in the Annali of Perugia, given to me by the ex-librarian, Prof. Adamo Rossi; perhaps it may be of use to the biographers in any further edition of the life they may issue.

Some allusion is made in the new book to Hawkwood's supposed ignorance of the Italian language; at any rate, it is interesting to note the various handwriting of his different secretaries, and his mention of two of them, Dionysio della Strata (1382) and Jacobo di Pietrasanta (1385). The Siena letters are written by secretaries in his name, one as captain of Company Rosa, and another as of Company Anglicorum, but usually as Captain General.

I transcribe a receipt for pay given by another secretary, Nicholas de Metis, in 1367, showing that nearly a year previous to his ransom he was in the service of the Perugians. I give it as a specimen in the original form:—

"Ser Nicolaus de Metis Cancellarius domini Johannis Aguti capitanei generalis societatis Anglicorum fuit confessus, et contentus habuisse et recepisse nomine dicti domini Johannis, et dicte societatis a dictis conservatoribus monete comunis Perusii solventibus uti supra pro compositione et pactis factis et initis inter comune Perusii et dictum dominum Joannem capitaneum et alios caporeales dicte societatis et dictam societatem quatuor millia flor: auri de quibus fecit eis refutationem."—Archivio della Computisteria Comunale di Perugia, Liber exitus Conservatorum monete, 1 Semestris, 1367, No. 44, Carta 19 tergo.

Having seen (through Signor Lisini's kindness) all the Siena Hawkwood letters, I remark none sealed with a hawk or the three shells of his coat of arms. One bears, in dark green wax, a chimera, or, to speak more exactly, an owl with outstretched wings and the head of a woman; under one wing is a shield blazoned with a cross; above is engraved the word "Fortuna." Several others show very imperfect fragments of the same seal.

I have an inventory, taken from a MS., of a Siena knight's equipment of weapons and armour, &c., in the time of Hawkwood; but it is too long to quote, and chiefly remarkable for its linguistic peculiarities.

Literary Crossip.

THE death of Lord Lamington has brought to a sad and premature conclusion the series of articles which has been appearing in Blackwood's Magazine entitled 'In the Days of the Dandies.' The proofs of the third instalment, which will appear in the March number of Maga, and will treat of the political personages of the period, were in the author's hands during his fatal illness. They were finally corrected for press by his lifelong friend and relative the Duke of Rutland. A good deal of curiosity has been excited regarding the authorship of those very charming papers, and numerous guesses, more or less happy, were made on the appearance of the first instalment. The form in which the articles were cast was, we believe, suggested by the circumstances of their origin, which arose from conversations between the editor of Blackwood and the author which occurred during various visits to Lord Lamington's beautiful home on the banks of the Clyde, facing the famous hill known as Tinto Top. It had been intended, had the author survived, to continue the series, but all chance of further reminiscences of a highly interesting period from the same pen must now be abandoned, as Lord Lamington had not prepared material for further instalments. Lord Lamington had been for many years an occasional contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, which contains a considerable number of interesting articles from his pen, though none which excited anything like the widespread interest of these his latest contributions.

MISS OLIVE SCHREINER has sent from Cape Town the complete MS. of a small volume of allegories, including several that have not yet seen the light. The volume will be published by Messrs. Blackwood & Sons, if we mistake not. It is said that it will be called 'Dreams.'

THE third part of the calendar of the Marquis of Salisbury's family papers, prepared under the direction of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, will be published in a few weeks. The documents to be described in it extend from 1583 to the end of 1589, and will include some more letters relating to the Anjou marriage; the despatches of Sir Edward Stafford when ambassador in Paris; and numerous papers on Scotch affairs, including letters illustrative of James VI.'s difficulties with his turbulent subjects, and the entertaining correspondence of Archibald Douglas when Scottish ambassador in London. These, with a variety of other material for biographical and social history, should make up a readable volume.

THE report on the manuscripts of Mr. S. H. Le Fleming, of Rydal Hall, is also nearly complete. The chief interest of this collection centres in the papers of Sir Daniel Fleming, who was M.P. for Cockermouth in the Parliament of James II., and for many years an active justice in the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland. The election of the members for those counties, the arrest of suspected persons, the disarming of Papists and recusants, and the suppression of conventicles were proceedings in which a magistrate of those days had ample scope for his energy; and it is to such subjects that many of the papers relate. Sir Daniel had, however, considerable literary tastes, and his correspondents at London, Oxford, and elsewhere kept him fully informed of what was going on in the political and other worlds.

THE March number of the English Illustrated Magazine will contain an article by Mr. Grant Allen, who, under the title of 'A Submerged Village,' describes Llanwddyn Glen, in Montgomeryshire, which has lately been dammed up and turned into an enormous artificial lake, in order to form a reservoir for the water supply of Liverpool. A number of illustrations of the neighbourhood thus destroyed have been engraved after drawings by Mr. Biscombe Gardner. The magazine will also contain an article on 'Rugby Union Football,' by Mr. H. Vassall, the treasurer of the Rugby Football Union; and contributions by Mrs. Panton, Mr. W. E. Norris, and Mr. Adrian Stokes.

MR. MURRAY is about to publish a series of manuals for popular use, but specially designed to meet the requirements of students attending the University Extension Lectures. These manuals will be written by University professors and Extension lecturers belonging to Oxford, Cambridge, London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and St. Andrews, as well as by other recognized authorities in literature and science. The series will be edited by Prof. Knight, of St. Andrews.

The venerable Dr. Martineau is going to publish through Messrs. Longman next month a work 'The Seat of Authority in Religion.' It represents the author's attempt to make clear to himself the ultimate ground of pure religion in the human mind, and the permanent essence of the religion of Christ in history. Its scope is best indicated by the titles of the books into which it is divided, viz.: Authority implied in Religion; Authority Artificially Misplaced; Divine Authority intermixed with Human Things; Severance of Undivine Elements from Christendom; the Divine in the Human. The work is addressed not to philosophers or scholars, but to educated persons interested in the results of modern thought.

THE Senate of London University has had conferences with King's College and University College, and now understands that its own proposals have no chance of acceptance, and also what is the minimum that will content the colleges, that is to say, a separate side for their students, apart from the miscellaneous crowd who flock to the existing examinations. The colleges are united, and unless the Senate yields there is a fair chance of their obtaining a university of their own. Prof. G. C. Foster's proposal that the students of both colleges should be required to pass the present Matriculation Examination of the University does not, we believe, meet with support, and will certainly not be accepted by the colleges.

THE third volume of the "Old Welsh Texts" is now at the binders', and will be issued in March. This work is called 'The Bruts,' and contains the texts of Brut y Tywysogion, Brut y Saesson, Geoffrey of Monmouth, Dores Phrygius, &c., all but the first never printed before. The work has been withheld for ten months in order to examine different MSS. which are now classified and described in a preface by Mr. Gwenogvryn Evans. Prof. Rhys contributes an introduction dealing with Geoffrey's 'Brut.'

AMONG forthcoming volumes of the "Canterbury Poets" is a selection from the works of Owen Meredith (the Earl of Lytton). The editor is Miss Betham-Edwards, who has Lord Lytton's sanction for the reprint.

MR. FISHER UNWIN is going to reprint Trelawny's 'Younger Son' under the editorship of Mr. E. Garnett. The volume will be accompanied by a facsimile of a letter of Trelawny's, a copy of D'Orsay's drawing of him, by portraits of Odysseus and Mavrocordato, &c.

A NEW volume of verse by Mr. Eric Mackay, author of 'Love Letters of a Violinist,' is about to appear in the "Lotos Series" under the title of 'A Lover's Litanies.' It will contain a portrait of the author.

MESSRS. WARD & DOWNEY will shortly publish a book of travel, chiefly in Germany and Switzerland, called 'Up and Down,' by Mr. Gilbert S. Macquoid, editor of 'Jacobite Songs and Ballads.' It will be illustrated by Mr. Thomas R. Macquoid.

A STORY by Mr. Bret Harte, entitled 'A Sappho of Green Springs,' will form the leading feature of Lippincott's Magazine for May.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW & Co. are about to go to press with the 'English Catalogue of Books for 1889,' which will contain a list of all books published in that year in the United Kingdom. It will also record the principal books which were published during the same period in America.

THE Delegates of the Clarendon Press have arranged for the publication of a series of half-crown volumes to be entitled "Rulers of India," to be edited by Sir W. W. Hunter, K.C.S.I. Each volume will take a conspicuous epoch in the making of India, and under the name of its principal personage will set forth the problems of government which confronted him, the work which he achieved, and the influences which he left behind. Thus the volume on Asoka will endeavour to present, for the first time, a comprehensive view of the political organization of ancient India. The rise and culmination of the Mughal empire will be briefly sketched under Akbar; its decay under Aurangzeb. The volume on Dupleix will sum up the struggle of the European nations for the possession of India. The volume on Dalhousie exhibits the final developments of the East India Company's rule, and so on. Among the writers will be Prof. Seeley, Prof. Rhys Davids, Capt. Trotter, Col. Malleon, Sir Lepel Griffin, Sir Owen Burne, Sir H. Cunningham, Mr. Boulger, and the editor.

A CHEAP and revised edition of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed's 'Dante: Six Sermons,' will shortly be issued by Mr. Elkin Mathews, of Vigo Street. The original edition, published in 1879, has long been out of print.

A WELL-KNOWN bookseller in Dundee, Mr. Alexander Maxwell, whose 'History of Old Dundee' we praised on its appearance, is passing through the press a monograph on 'Old Dundee, Ecclesiastical, Burghal, and Social, prior to the Reformation.' It deals with the history and condition of the burgh during an earlier period than that embraced in the 'History.' Mr. Maxwell has obtained much of the material for it by searching among the oldest existing records of the Burgh Court, and this he has supplemented and illustrated by other unpublished documents. The work, he hopes, will throw light upon the ecclesiastical state of the burgh and the dominating influence of Churchmen before the Reformation. It shows the efforts that were made to hinder and to forward the Reformation; and the changes, burghal and social, which resulted, and how Church revenues and property were appropriated. It also contains much that the author expects will help to elucidate the system of burghal government, the social condition of the people, and the circumstances of common life at the epoch of the Reformation.

THE 'History of the Gentleman's Magazine' is the title of a series of articles by Mr. W. Roberts, of which the first will appear in the March number of the Bookworm. The series will deal with predecessors, rivals, editors, and various other phases relating to the venerable periodical.

THE Benedictine monk Beda Dudik, an historian of repute in his native Moravia, died recently at Brünn. He was born in 1815, and besides being the author of several valuable works in German, he deserved well of Czech literature by his recovery in 1878 of upwards of fifty Bohemian manuscripts, which had been carried to Sweden during the Thirty Years' War. Dr. H. Hildebrand, town archivist of Riga, who was considered our greatest authority upon the history of the Baltic provinces, died the other day at the age of forty-six. He was the editor of the great Urkundenwerk referring to the history of Esthonia, Livonia, and Courland, begun by the historian Bunge. Yet another death to be recorded is that of M. Gaston Feugère, a literary critic of some note in Paris.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish during the present year an edition of the second book of Thucydides by Mr. E. C. Marchant, who has made a new collation of the British Museum MS. No. 11,727, lettered M, for the improvement of the text.

WE hear that Mr. Edwin Waugh, the Lancashire poet, has in preparation a work recording memories of the early period of his life.

THE twelfth volume of the "Minerva Library of Famous Books," edited by Mr. Bettany, will be Forster's 'Life of Goldsmith,' of which Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. possess the copyright.

WE regret to hear of the death of Prof. Lorimer, the accomplished occupant of the Chair of Public Law in the University of Edinburgh.

A CORRESPONDENT has pointed out to us that in reviewing Mr. Law's book a fortnight ago we gave the date of the Douai College as 1574 instead of 1568.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are Friendly Societies, Reports for 1888, Part B (8d.); Italy, Suppression of African Slave Trade, Treaty (1d.); Africa, Delagoa Bay Railway, Action of Portugal, Correspondence (8d.); Africa, Action of Portugal in Mashonaland and in the Districts of Shire and Lake Nyassa, Correspondence (2s.); Africa, West African Agreement with France (2d.); Samoa, Further Correspondence (10d.); Special Commission, 1888, Report of Judges (1s. 4d.); and Trade and Navigation Accounts for January (5d.).

SCIENCE

ZOOLOGICAL LITERATURE.

The Vertebrate Animals of Leicestershire and Rutland. By Montagu Browne. (Midland Educational Company.)—The author naturally begins this handsome volume with Homo sapiens, but, as he admits his inability to discover any implements of paleolithic man in the above counties, we may pass on to the most important animal in Leicestershire, namely, the fox, respecting which some very good stories are told. Still better is the account quoted from the Leicester Journal of April 22nd, 1887, of a badger which was captured and taken to Stanton, where he was purchased by Dr. Turner, "and that gentleman, thinking it a good opportunity to improve the occasion on behalf of the Church Restoration Fund, made a charge of 1d. each to see the animal, and thus realized over 1l. 5s. The badger has been hunted several times during the past week by a number of beagles belonging to Dr. Turner and others, and has afforded some capital sport." Many a church restoration committee has laid itself open to the charge of exceeding its means—a proceeding which in old and almost forgotten slang was known as "overdrawing the badger"; but never before did we hear of its making money out of that interesting animal. The pine-marten, which formerly inhabited the woodlands of Leicestershire, has not been met with there for nearly half a century, and the polecat, though formerly common, has become exceedingly rare owing to game preserving; but, on the other hand, increased attention to "such small deer" as voles and bats has resulted in the discovery of several species previously unknown in the district. Among the latter may be mentioned Vespertilio nattereri and V. daubentoni, a specimen of the latter having been shot in June, 1885, with a catapult by Master George Snood, and the fact deserves recognition as being the sole good work on record of that dangerous weapon in the hands of a boy. The articles on the remains of the mammoth, goat, roe deer, and whale contain the corrections of some amusing errors perpetrated by a certain F.G.S., whom we will not name, but whose ideas on paleontology appear to be rather vague. The presence of the jaws and other large bones of cetaceans in the Midlands is owing, of course, to their having been brought to Hull during the flourishing period of the whaling trade, and then sold to serve as gateposts, or often as mere curiosities. The greater part of this work (pp. 39-172) is devoted to the birds, and appears to be very well written, although a few species have been admitted on slight evidence. Among the fossil reptiles and fishes Mr. Browne has made some interesting discoveries; and as regards the latter, he obtained from the Barrow-on-Soar lias lime-pits the caudal portion of a Chondrosteus previously known from Lyme Regis and nowhere else. The book contains four plates and a map, and as only three hundred copies are issued (nearly half of which are subscribed for) we hope that a second edition may be in demand ere long.

The Habits of Salmon. By John P. Traherne. (Chapman & Hall.)—Major Traherne has written a little book about salmon, which shows that he has enjoyed and made use of various excellent opportunities for studying what he writes about. The author has not the common fault of believing himself to be what the Pope is only stated to be on a very solemn or special occasion; indeed, he goes so far as to say that he does not for a moment expect his readers to agree with all his conclusions. He very properly desires to "provoke practical and reasonable discussions upon many controverted questions." We sincerely hope he may get them; but we cannot open our pages to him.

The Dominion of Man. By Rev. J. G. Wood. (Bentley & Son.)—This posthumous volume of a well-known writer on natural history gives an account of such animals as man has made servants of his own. The dog, the cat, the horse, the ass, the ox, and others are treated of in the author's characteristic manner, which seems to commend itself to a number of readers. The book is well got up and excellently printed, while the figures are better than they often are in works of this kind. We should not be astonished to find the volume a popular present for young boys who are fond of zoology.

SIR ROBERT KANE, LL.D., F.R.S.

A CONVICTION that Ireland possessed in its natural resources the raw materials for considerable industrial development led the Professor of Natural Philosophy at the Royal Dublin Society to deliver, as far back as 1844, a course of lectures, which he afterwards published in a modified form under the title of 'The Industrial Resources of Ireland.' This work at the time of its appearance attracted the attention of Sir Robert Peel; and even now, though nearly half a century old, it remains a valuable magazine of facts for those who are interested in the manufacturing progress of the country. Its author, Dr. Kane, was soon afterwards commissioned, in conjunction with Sir Lyon Playfair and the late Prof. Lindley, to inquire into the potato disease. Other labours followed, and as a fit recognition of his endeavours to apply scientific principles to the material prosperity of his country, he received in 1846 the honour of knighthood.

Sir Robert Kane was born in Dublin in 1809, and commenced his scientific writings as early as 1828, when he contributed to the Quarterly Journal of Science a paper on the existence of chlorine in native peroxide of manganese. Although educated for the medical profession, his attention was early directed to chemistry—his father having been a manufacturing chemist—and he was appointed while quite young Professor of Chemistry to the Apothecaries' Hall of Ireland. Kane's 'Elements of Chemistry,' which appeared in 1842, was a work of great reputation in its day. Among his numerous scientific investigations may be mentioned those on the salts of platinum, on the constitution of the compounds of ammonia, and on the colouring matter of lichens. The value of some of these researches was attested by the award of medals by the Royal Society of London and by the Royal Irish Academy. But to the public he was best known by his persistent endeavours to utilize the natural resources of Ireland, and it was mainly by his advocacy that the Museum of Irish Industry was established—an institution which he developed and directed with much ability for many years. Sir Robert Kane was the first President of Queen's College, Cork; and in 1875 he was appointed one of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland. For some time past he had withdrawn from active life, spending his well-earned retirement in Dublin, where on Sunday, the 16th inst., he passed away, ripe in years and rich in honour.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

PROF. H. C. VOGEL, of Potsdam, has recently published the results of some interesting observations of the changes in the spectrum of Algol at the times of the diminution and recovery of its light. These, whilst fully confirming the view originally suggested by Goodricke, that the periodic variability of this star is caused by the revolution of a dark companion cutting off part of its light in the manner of an eclipse, and the calculation of Prof. Pickering that the diameter of the companion amounts to about eight-tenths of that of the principal star, have enabled Prof. Vogel to obtain approximate values of the mutual distance and actual sizes and masses of the two stars, as well as of their orbital velocities round their common centre of gravity. He finds, in fact, that their diameters are probably about 1,080,000 and 850,000 English miles respectively; that the distance of their centres from each other amounts to about 3,290,000 miles, and that the orbital velocity of Algol is about twenty-seven, whilst that of its companion is about fifty-six miles. The mass of the former he determines to be about double that of the latter, the one being approximately four-ninths and the other two-ninths of the sun's mass. It is not necessary, he remarks, to suppose that the companion is absolutely opaque, but only that its light is very much feebler than that of the principal star.

We have received the number of the Memorie della Società degli Spettroscopisti Italiani for December. The principal articles are an obituary notice of Prof. Respighi, and a paper on the variations of atmospheric refraction by Prof. Riccio.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Feb. 13.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'The Liquefaction of Gold and Platinum Alloys,' by Mr. E. Matthey, 'On the Unit of Length of a Standard Scale by Sir G. Shuckburgh,' by General J. T. Walker, and 'Note on the Spectrum of the Nebula of Orion,' and 'Preliminary Note on Photographs of the Spectrum of the Nebula in Orion,' by Mr. J. N. Lockyer.

ASTRONOMICAL.—Feb. 14.—Annual Meeting.—Mr. W. H. M. Christie, Astronomer Royal, in the chair.—Messrs. J. B. Forgan, R. A. Gregory, A. N. Harris, and P. W. Henkel were elected Fellows.—In the annual report it was stated that six minor planets have been discovered during the year, four by M. Charlois of the Nice Observatory, one by M. Palisa of Vienna, and one by Prof. Peters. Seven new comets have been observed, of which three certainly move in elliptic orbits. Of the three comets which were visible at the commencement of the year, one, discovered by Mr. Barnard of the Lick Observatory, has been shown to be moving in an hyperbolic orbit, and there is some reason to believe that its deviation from a parabola is due to the comet's approach to the planet Uranus in the year 1882. Amongst the obituary notices were lives of Prof. Respighi of Rome and Prof. W. Temple of Florence, Mr. De La Rue, Mr. Newall, Mr. Royston Pigott, and Father Perry. In the review of the progress of astronomy during the past year attention was called to Prof. Glasenapp's method of determining the orbits of binary stars; Prof. Auwers's 'Standard Catalogue for the Southern Zones of the Astronomische Gesellschaft'; Prof. Harkness's 'Researches on the Masses of Mercury, Venus, and the Earth'; Prof. Auwers's 'Investigation with Respect to the Diameter of the Sun'; Dr. R. Bryant's 'Investigation of the Orbit of Sappho'; M. Kadan's 'Essay on Astronomical Refractions,' and Prof. Spoerer's researches on sun spots, from which it appears that a little before a minimum spots are only seen in low latitudes, at about the time of minimum spots near the equator cease to appear, whilst a fresh series of spots break out in high latitudes, and from thenceforth to the next minimum the mean heliographic latitude of the spots tends to decline continuously, until at length spots are seen again only in the vicinity of the equator.—At the conclusion of the report Mr. Ranyard moved a resolution proposing that the by-laws should be altered so as to do away with the custom of giving medals by the Society. The motion was not carried.—Mr. G. F. Chambers proposed that the hour of the meeting should be changed to four o'clock in the afternoon.—After considerable discussion, this motion was also lost.—The following gentlemen were declared to be elected as officers and members of the Council for the coming year: President, Lieut.-General J. F. Tennant; Vice-Presidents, Capt. W. de W. Abney, Prof. A. Cayley, W. H. M. Christie, and Lieut.-Col. G. L. Tupman; Treasurer, A. A. Common; Secretaries, A. M. W. Downing and E. B. Knobell; Foreign Secretary, Dr. W. Huggins; Council, Prof. J. C. Adams, Sir R. S. Ball, Hon. Sir J. Cockle, R. Dunkin, J. W. L. Glaisher, G. Knott, Capt. W. Noble, W. E. Plummer, I. Roberts, E. J. Spitta, E. J. Stone, and H. H. Turner.

LINNEAN.—Feb. 6.—Mr. Carruthers, President, in the chair.—Mr. H. L. Stotham was admitted and

Mr. T. W. Kirk was elected a Fellow.—Referring to an exhibition at a previous meeting, Prof. Stewart communicated some interesting observations on the habits of certain seaweed-covered crabs. He also made some remarks on the "pitchers" of Nepenthes macleodiana, upon which criticism was offered by Mr. T. Christy, Prof. Howes, and Mr. G. Murray.—Prof. G. E. Boulger exhibited a series of original water-colour drawings of animals and plants of the Falkland Islands.—Mr. W. H. Beeby exhibited some forms new to Britain of plants from Shetland.—Mr. C. B. Clarke read a paper 'On the Stamens and Setae of Scirpææ' illustrated by diagrams, which elicited a detailed criticism from Mr. J. G. Baker, to which Mr. Clarke replied.—A paper was read by Mr. B. D. Jackson, which had been communicated by the late Mr. J. Ball, 'On the Flora of Patagonia,' prefaced by some feeling remarks by the President on the loss which the Society had sustained through the recent death of this able botanist.

CHEMICAL.—Feb. 6.—Dr. W. J. Russell, President, in the chair.—The following were elected Fellows: Messrs. E. W. Allison, J. M. T. Anderson, F. G. Ansell, G. F. Brindley, S. H. Collins, J. B. Coppock, T. S. Dymond, A. C. Farquharson, C. C. Gibbs, J. Grant, W. W. H. Gee, P. J. Hartog, J. H. Heywood, A. Hutchinson, R. Law, J. G. Macgillivray, A. H. McConnell, H. Marshall, F. H. Mason, W. S. Newman, E. P. Perman, E. Russell, W. C. Sayers, S. Shaw, H. W. Smith, H. H. Smith, J. Stokes, J. Wade, J. Walker, and S. R. Wells.—The following papers were read: 'Observations on Nitrous Anhydride and Nitrogen Peroxide,' by Prof. Ramsay, 'Note on the Law of the Freezing-Points of Solutions,' by Mr. S. U. Pickering, 'The Action of Chromium Oxide on Nitrobenzene,' by Messrs. G. G. Henderson and J. M. Campbell, 'Studies on the Constitution of the Tri-derivatives of Naphthalene: No. 1, The Constitution of Betanaphthol and Betanaphthyl-aminodisulphonic Acids, R and G, Naphthalenemetaldisulphonic Acid; No. 2, a-Amido-1:3'-Naphthalenedisulphonic Acid; No. 3, Alphanaphthylaminodisulphonic Acid, Dahl, No. III, The Constitution of Naphthol-yellow S,' by Messrs. H. E. Armstrong and W. P. Wynne.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Feb. 18.—Sir J. Coope, President, in the chair.—Three papers were read on water-works in China and Japan: 'The Shanghai Water-Works,' by Mr. J. W. Hart, 'The Tytan Water-Works, Hong Kong,' by Mr. J. Orange, and 'The Construction of the Yokohama Water-Works,' by Mr. J. H. T. Turner.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Feb. 17.—Mr. T. Bolas commenced a course of Cantor Lectures 'On Stereotyping.' The lecture was illustrated by practical demonstrations of the paper and other processes of stereotyping, and also by machinery and apparatus.

Feb. 18.—Sir F. D. Bell in the chair.—A paper 'On Ocean Penny Postage and Cheap Telegraphic Communication between England and all Parts of the Empire and America' was read before the Foreign and Colonial Section by Mr. J. H. Heaton.

Feb. 19.—Sir O. Roberts in the chair.—A paper 'On the Organization of Secondary and Technical Education in London' was read by Dr. S. Thompson, and was followed by a discussion.

MATHEMATICAL.—Feb. 13.—Mr. J. J. Walker, President, in the chair.—Mr. S. Roberts read a paper 'Concerning Semi-invariants,'—Mr. Tucker communicated papers by Prof. K. Pearson 'On Ether-Squirts,'—by Prof. G. B. Mathews, 'On Class-Invariants,'—and a note by Prof. Cayley on the imaginary roots of an equation.

NEW SHAKESPEARE.—Feb. 14.—Dr. F. J. Furnivall in the chair.—Mr. A. H. Bullen read a paper 'On Nicholas Breton,' giving such facts as were known of the life, and a brief account of the many works, of this prolific and versatile writer. It was in his lyric efforts that Breton was, perhaps, most successful, and the light, tripping measure which he used was the same as that which Wither, writing some years later, made so popular. As a satirist, his lack of the sera indignatio which characterized Marston and Donne allows him to give us, perhaps, a truer picture of his day. His devotional works were not of the best quality, and his naïve essay in romance, 'Mavillia,' a history of a most unfortunate young lady, provokes mirth unintended by the writer; but the extracts read by Mr. Bullen from the 'Packet of Mad Letters,' the 'Crossing of Proverbs,' &c., were good specimens of a crisp, natural humour.

ARISTOTELIAN.—Feb. 17.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. G. R. Farncombe was elected a Member.—Mr. J. S. Mann read a paper on the distinction between society and the State. Some difficulties were noticed attending the application to history of the antithesis first formulated by Hegel, but partially anticipated by Fichte. Society, it was argued, was not composed of clearly distinguishable classes, and tended to the effacement rather than the perpetuation of class distinctions. Nor were State and society ever coincident in area. The antithesis was derived from the political situation in Germany early in the present century. Its value consisted in applying working conceptions to the sociologist, similar to those of abstract political economy. The Hegelian conception of the State was regarded as obviating certain difficulties respecting the rule of the majority which arose from treating a State as a mere aggregate of atoms. Though the line between State and society could only be settled by experience, there were occasions when, either for convenience or for the protection of its members, it was desirable for the State to undertake economic functions usually assigned to the sphere of society.—A discussion followed.

Science Gossip.

PERHAPS the first Chinese translation from the English of a technical work on railway and harbour construction consists of eight chapters of Mr. Mattheson's 'Aid-Book to Engineering Enterprise.' The title of the translation would read in English, "Essay on Construction. Englishman Mattheson gave the idea. Englishman Fryer and Chang Tien translated it." Printed on fine thin rice paper, from large type, this book is enclosed in loose boards of polished rosewood, held together with silk ribbons, each chapter being separately stitched into a silk cover. The original engravings have been faithfully, though quaintly, reproduced on a larger scale.

MESSERS. LECROSNIER & BABÉ, the well-known scientific and medical publishers, have made arrangements with Mr. Walter Scott for the translation into French of the "Contemporary Science Series." Dr. Henri de Varigny will edit the French series. Arrangements are also being made, we believe, for the translation of the series into Italian.

THE 'Life of the Rev. J. G. Wood,' upon which his son, the Rev. Theodore Wood, has been for some considerable time past engaged, is now nearly ready for publication, and will be issued by Messrs. Cassell & Co. in a few days. It will give an account of the popular writer on natural history in his threefold capacity of clergyman, author, and lecturer, together with a full description of his private life, compiled from personal knowledge and from information furnished by personal friends.

A SCIENTIFIC work of travel of some magnitude will shortly be issued at Berlin under the title of 'Reisen in Kleinasien und Nordsyrien.'

Messrs. K. Humann and O. Puchstein, who undertook the travels by direction of the Prussian Academy of Sciences, will furnish the descriptions, which are to contain a number of illustrations, maps, plans, &c. The volume will be dedicated by the Academy to its most distinguished honorary member—Count Moltke.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION.

(Fifth Notice.—The Romneys, Gainsboroughs, &c.)

THE Romneys here begin with Mrs. Curwen (No. 9), a hard piece in Romney's ultra-classic mood, with which the Englishness of the face is out of harmony. The dignified sentiment of the background is to be admired. The Marchioness of Hertford (13) was Maria Fagniani, Selwyn's protégée, and when a child caused that hard and clever man of the world pangs of affection he never knew before. In tone and colour the picture greatly excels the majority of Romneys, and the face still charms the visitor with its sunny look and amorous eyes. Romney's Miranda in a Boat propelled by Caliban (43) is a capital illustration of the artist's peculiar vein of fancy, which was always original and usually happy. It looks like a bas-relief, and as a design it would not disgrace Flaxman. The Two Children of George, Second Earl of Warwick (121), a sketch of a portion of the charming group which was here last year, could not be more spirited, sunny, or natural. These Romneys are the more worth seeing because they have not been exhibited before. The ingenuous sweetness of the children's faces is immeasurably more precious than the specious charms of 'Cassandra,' 'Miranda,' 'Bacchante,' and other variants of Lady Hamilton. Had Romney painted nothing more than the lovely Warwick group, 'The Countess of Mansfield,' and 'Mrs. Thomas Carwardine and Child,' he would be entitled to a place in the foremost rank. How many of our readers know that, although Romney survived till 1802, i.e., until there had been thirty-three Academy exhibitions, no picture of his was hung on the walls of the Academy till the Winter Exhibition of 1871, when Sir C. Russell's 'Lady Russell and Child' was at Burlington Gardens? After his death the world did not learn much about Romney's art until 1817, when the British Institution borrowed three of his pictures. In 1832 another was shown at the Winter Exhibition of the Society of British Artists. These could hardly be called exhibitions accessible to everybody. In 1824 the British Institution borrowed from Petworth his 'Nursing of Shakespeare,' but till 1843 it took no further notice of him. The first time Romney came before the general public was when the Vernon Gift was made to the National Gallery in 1847. So little was his work known even within a recent period that when a Romney was wanted for the International Exhibition in 1862 'Admiral Hardy' was borrowed from Greenwich Hospital. It is very strange that oblivion of this sort came upon Romney, the more so because, although after 1772 his great reputation chiefly depended upon prints from his pictures, he really painted a very large number of the great, learned, and beautiful of nearly two generations.

At Romney's own sale in 1808 a whole-length 'Cassandra' (born Emma Hart) was sold for eight guineas, and when the pictures of the Hon. F. Greville (who had good grounds for knowing the difference between the lady and the goddess) were sold in 1810 only a hundred guineas could be got for a well-known 'Lady Hamilton as Diana,' 'Lady Craven,' which warmed Horace Walpole into poetry till he sang of

The witchery of Eyes, the grace that tips
The inexpressible douceur of lips,
Romney alone in this fair image caught
Each Charm's expression and each Feature's thought, was sold at Strawberry Hill in 1842 for 32l. It was not until 1875 that 'Lady Hamilton at the Spinning Wheel,' which was at the Academy in 1876, realized more than 800l. The 'Warwick Children' (121) was sold in 1880 for 273l. Since then astonishingly high prices are said to have been given for Romneys, and Earl Cathcart lately refused 12,000l. for 'The Countess of Mansfield.' We are at a loss to account for the monstrous price which somebody gave for the Portrait of Mrs. Stables and Two of her Daughters (154), as it is far from being one of Romney's masterpieces, and owes some of its interest to J. R. Smith's mezzotint. It was painted in 1778 for Mr. John Stables, a member of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, and engraved in 1780.

Gainsborough comes next on our notes, and we are glad to meet again the Portrait of Mrs. Graham (3). Earl Cathcart remarked last week in our columns how absurd it is to style it 'The Housemaid.' We described the picture in No. XXIX. of 'The Private Collections of England' (Athen. No. 2557), on Castle Howard pictures, thus: "The most interesting Gainsborough here is the large life-size, whole-length picture, or rather the beginning of a 'Portrait of the Hon. Mrs. Graham,' born [Mary] Cathcart, the wife of General Graham, afterwards Lord Lynedoch, whose finished portrait is now in the National Gallery of Scotland (333)." The Castle Howard picture was painted in 1778, and till now has not been exhibited. Mrs. Graham, after having been eighteen years married, died in 1792. It is said that Lord Carlisle (see No. 119) was so much enchanted with this portrait that he would not allow Gainsborough to do anything more to it. This does not agree with the account given by Earl Cathcart.

Most luminous, soft, and broad is Mr. Cavedish Bentinck's Landscape (4), by Gainsborough, which we prefer to any of the other landscapes by him now here, although some of them are far better known. It reminds us of Ruysdael or Crome. The Rev. B. Gibbons's Girl with Pigs (123) must not be confounded with the more famous picture of the same subject which is now at Castle Howard. No. 123 is most harmonious, soft, broad, and luminous; in coloration and tonality it is better than any Morland, but it is not so firm nor nearly so well drawn. The recumbent white pig is the best figure. 'A Girl with Pigs' was at the Academy in 1782; Lord Carlisle's picture is called 'Girl and Pigs'; the picture before us is, according to Fulcher, one of four repetitions of the work, and, as Fulcher said, "exceedingly fine." It justifies the praise of the countryman who, looking at No. 127 in the Academy, 1784, said, "They be deadly like pigs, but nobody ever saw pigs feeding together but what one on 'em had a foot in the trough." The picture was commended by "Peter Pindar" in his Lyric Ode to the Royal Academicians, 1782:—

And now, O Muse, with song so big,
Turn round to Gainsboro's Girl and Pig;
Or Pig and Girl I rather should have said;
The pig in white, I must allow,
Is really a well-painted sow;
I wish to say the same thing of the maid.

Lady Rodney (156), a capital Gainsborough, has not been exhibited before. The treatment of the blue dress is far superior to that of his much-admired 'Blue Boy,' and the execution of the bluish muslin sleeves is worthy of Gainsborough at his best. In fact, faded as the picture now is, it must originally have been most charming. The Catalogue does not say which of the famous admiral's two wives is here depicted, but the technique of the whole and the lady's costume leave little room for doubting that she was not Rodney's first wife, born Compton, but his second, Henrietta, born Clive, of Lisbon, who lived to be ninety years old. In the Market Cart (163) we recognize some of the motives, and even part of the design of the figures, in Lord Bateman's famous Gainsborough, 'Going to Market,' lent to Sir Coutts Lindsay in 1886. The girl climbing up to get into the cart and the men who assist her are alike in both pictures. That before us has darkened more than the other, and on the whole it is a mannered, unreal, and conventional piece of work. Mrs. Drummond (164), unless as 'A Lady,' has not been exhibited before.

Children (127) proves that the Rev. William Peters, R.A., was a much better painter than the world is disposed to think. There is a capital Portrait of a Man (8), lent by Mr. Hanson Walker, and comprehensively ascribed to the "English School." It is painted with fine firmness and impasto, and a good sense of style, but we see no reason for calling it English; it most nearly resembles a Sadler, but it is superior to anything we know of his. Copley's Miss Randolph (57), a whole length, in an awkward attitude, and as a picture curiously incompetent, was obviously painted in Boston, U.S., where he was c. 1771, and before he had measured himself with European artists, as he did with plenty of success after 1774. In spite of its harsh and uncultivated style, its lack of harmony, softness, and keeping, it is a striking example of what a strong man may achieve by training himself. It is amusing to notice the number of the year in which it was painted has been carefully erased from the inscription on this picture, in order, probably, not to betray the age of the lady. It is not mentioned in Mr. Perkins's catalogue of Copleys.

The plum-coloured coat and formal wig, and the set features enclosed by a skin which seems to have been dried and hardened by Time, while the eyes and lips are full of life, serve to distinguish Zoffany's Portrait of Thomas Hanson (50), which his descendant has lent to the Academy. The picture has darkened a great deal, and thus lost much of the brightness and clearness that originally characterized it. It is an early example, and its technique is so extremely primitive that few can believe Zoffany and Gainsborough, Reynolds and Lawrence, were all painting at the same time.

Before taking leave of the portraits of the eighteenth century we may give a few lines to two or three Reynolds we omitted to mention in our last notice. The highly characteristic Portrait of the Countess of Carlisle (122) was painted shortly after her marriage to the fifth Earl (see 119). She began to sit in April, 1770, and the picture seems to have been finished two years later. It has deteriorated less than many other Reynoldses, and illustrates the methods he described in a memorandum of 1769, according to which he modelled the solid forms in simple black and white, so that his work was a monochrome, advanced these forms with the same pigments and lake, and then finished the whole in lake, yellow, and black, with copal varnish. The result may be seen here. The lake has vanished and so has some of the yellow, and the black has faded. Accordingly the carnations and glazings have almost disappeared, leaving a somewhat dingy residuum over the permanent materials. No. 235, 'Portrait of a Lady,' in the Academy, 1775, is mentioned as representing the Duchess of Gordon; but Walpole, who ought to have known, said it was 'Lady Carlisle,' i.e., the work before us. If it was not exhibited in 1775, this picture has been unexhibited till now. It was finely engraved by James Watson "in Little Queen Anne Street," now Foley Street, in 1773. At the same time, September 6th, 1775, that he paid for his own portrait, a portentous piece in the attitude of the Apollo Belvedere, Lord Carlisle paid Sir Joshua 73l. 10s. for 'Lady Carlisle,' that is, no doubt, this very picture. The Bradford Family (124) is mainly interesting as comprising a portrait of that handsome lady, Jane, daughter and heir of Mr. Matthias Gale, of Cotgill Hall, Cumberland, and wife of Mr.

Wilson Gale Braddyll, of Conishead Priory and Highhead Castle, the representative of the ancient family of Braddyll, whom Sir Joshua painted in 1788 and February, 1789, on another canvas. Cotton speaks of the group as painted in 1788, and says that in 1856 it was in the possession of Mr. Labell, of Stonehouse, Plymouth. It was lent to the Manchester Art Treasures in 1857 by Mr. T. P. Smyth, at whose sale in 1859 it was bought in, as Mr. Redford's 'Art Sales' tells us, for 1,050*l*. Reynolds's cash-book records payments as follows: "July, 1789. Mr. Braddyll, 52. 10.—Mrs. Braddyll, 52. 10.—Feb., 1787. Mr. Braddyll, for his Son, 105. 0. 0." These are all under "Second Payments" in Cotton's version of Sir Joshua's notes. The boy was Thomas Richmond Gale Braddyll, born 1776. Reynolds painted him in 1784, and exhibited the picture, which in the same year J. Grozer engraved as 'Master Thomas Braddyll leaning on a Vase'; the plate was published in 1785, and the picture, now the property of Lord Rothschild, was here in 1886. Sir W. Chambers (126) hung in the old Antique Academy, still remaining on the top floor of Somerset House, and may be called Sir Joshua's diploma picture, painted in 1780, but apparently not exhibited till it was at the British Institution in 1813. It has since been frequently before the public. It was nobly engraved by Val. Green in 1780. Fortunately the picture remains in a practically perfect condition, or has been so wisely restored by the R.A.s that it shows no worse change than a little darkening. The massive handling is of the best kind. The autocratic character of Chambers, who dominated everybody he came in contact with, is manifest in this masterpiece.

NOTES FROM CYPRUS.

Salamis, Cyprus, Feb. 1, 1890.

THE prospects of the season's work at Salamis are, I am glad to be able to report, after an unpromising start, now extremely good. Work was begun on the 16th of January at the famous granite columns noticed by almost all writers since Pococke. Intersecting trenches were run across the site from north to south and east to west. After about a yard of fairly easy soil the excavation became very slow, and resembled nothing so much as an attempt to hack through bricks and mortar: 5 ft. or 6 ft. lower the earth was again looser and less mixed with rubble, until the virgin soil was reached at a depth of 10½ ft. to 13½ ft. in the centre of the site. Numerous ancient remains were encountered almost from the surface downwards. They were chiefly flimsily built walls, although partly constructed of large squared blocks, with frequent water-channels and pipes running here and there. Miserable graves were met with in abundance from about 2 ft. to 5 ft. down. The bodies had apparently been popped in wherever there was room between two stones. To the east, bordering on the north trench, a nest of large blocks was found, which seemed to represent the foundation of a small octagonal building surrounded by a water-course. Among the blocks were fragments of plain white marble columns and pieces of cornices, &c., of very poor late style. In the western trench, at about 6 ft. to 8 ft., lay a number of fragments of fluted limestone columns with stucco coating, a capital and base, and other pieces, dating, perhaps, from the Ptolemaic period. Under them is what looks like a solid wall, but further investigation is here necessary. At the extreme south a well-built wall, with topmost course of very large blocks, has been followed down to the virgin soil, and there is possibly a corresponding wall at the north end. We have probably here to recognize the wall which supported the great granite columns. The antiquities found are of little interest, and include nothing that need be dated further back than Hellenistic times. Nearest the bottom were a certain number of potsherds of a familiar Cypriote style. On the whole, this site may be condemned as scarcely likely to repay the immense labour of excavating it. Whatever earlier buildings there may have been seem to have been thoroughly turned upside down by later operations. Meanwhile another site had been started in the sandhills at the extreme north-east of the ancient city, close by the Forest Guard's house. A couple of Corinthian capitals had been turned out here some years ago in the search for water, and the spot seemed to offer opportunity of testing the quality of the contents of the sandhills. We have now laid bare the greater part of a wall, probably of a temple, running north-east and south-west. Upon it are a number of marble bases of various diameters set at different levels, and by them lie plain marble shafts and Corinthian capitals, just as they fell. The shafts vary in dimensions no less than the bases, and we have no doubt to recognize a late building constructed of materials from several earlier temples. But at each end of the wall and underneath one or two of the marble bases are others of superior workmanship in limestone, which Dr. Dörpfeld, who saw them this morning, has pronounced to be probably of the fifth or fourth century. Working in sand is difficult, and little can be done until our wheelbarrows arrive, but we now know roughly the lie and dimensions of the building. In a trench to the south-east a new set of columns has appeared of large diameter with late fluting. They seem to have fallen from another building occupying the site where the house now stands. A small marble torso of Eros, with remains of wings on the back, and a small figure of a river-god, also of marble, are the principal objects so far found on this site. The promise of the place lies largely in the fact that all seems to remain in situ, but little injured or disturbed.

Two days ago we started on a third site, a long depression extending some two hundred yards southwards from the late building known as the Λοιπρόν. This is a site which no explorer of Salamis can afford to overlook. It is very large, occupies a central position, and was apparently flanked by huge colonnades with great limestone columns, the drums and capitals of which lie in series along the sides. At the south end rises a hillock, which may have borne a small temple. Fragments of blue "inscription stone" are very plentiful, and we no sooner began to turn them over than we found five pieces with letters. One of these is an interesting and perhaps important Latin inscription:—

...Juli nepoti Aug. (filio
...tribunicij)ie potestatis...
...Sala]minorum (senatus
...ponen]dam curavit idem]que...
...C. Lucretio Rufo...

So far our results on this site are as follows. The interval between the colonnades is paved with stone blocks, and within each is a mosaic pavement. Behind the western colonnade has been found a small square foundation of late date, with water-channel round, formed largely of marble blocks and bases of statues. One of the blocks bears an inscription of Ptolemaic date. On the slope of the hillock are several marble blocks, which might be taken for steps, but are possibly remains of walls. Near the foot of the rise, close to the surface, lay an enormous marble capital, extraordinary in its decoration no less than its size. It measures roughly 3 ft. in diameter at the base and 4½ ft. at the top. From one side projects a colossal bull's head and neck, with wings springing from the shoulders and forming, as it were, volutes. On the other is a Caryatid, on a very much smaller scale, passing at the waist into a floral ornament. The remaining sides are, unfortunately, broken away, but no doubt repeated these. The bull's head and wings are of strong, effective style, while the other side is not unpleasing, but rather decorative than forcible. There can be little doubt that this site is some important centre of civic life, and only ample funds are necessary to reap from it notable results.

The weather is good, and the influenza has not hitherto advanced nearer than Famagusta.
J. ARTHUR R. MUNRO.

A SUPPOSED PORTRAIT OF LADY JANE GREY IN MILAN.

MR. RICHARD DAVEY writes:—

"In a recent issue of the Athenæum mention is made of an article of mine on Lady Jane Grey, which appeared in the Art Journal during the past year. Your reviewer takes exception to my venturing to differ from Mr. Scharf in his opinion concerning the authenticity of the so-called portrait of Jane Grey possessed by Earl Spencer at Althorpe. In this he mistook my meaning. I do not differ from Mr. Scharf as to the possibility of the picture being a likeness of Jane Grey or not, but I simply stated, in opposition to that great authority, that I saw no reason why the picture should be supposed to represent Mary Magdalene, for it contains none of the emblems which usually accompany presentments of that penitent.

"Be this as it may, the article has called forth from Milan a most interesting letter, which has been kindly entrusted to me by Mr. Huish, from Dr. Giulio Carotti, the Director of the Royal Brera Gallery. Struck by the excellent reproduction of the Althorpe picture which illustrated the article, he showed it to Count Luchino Del Mayno, who possesses a picture by an early German painter, supposedly a portrait of Jane Grey, so singularly like the Althorpe picture that Signor Carotti obtained permission to have a photograph of it sent us for inspection.

"The Milanese picture undoubtedly represents the same lady who figures in the one at Althorpe, only she has changed her position. She is no longer turned full face to the spectator, and apparently meditating upon what she has read in a book resting on a ledge before her, but is seated at a table, busily engaged writing in a MS., the rebellious pages of which she holds down with a penknife. She wears the same dress, identical in every particular, excepting for a gold chain which hangs round her neck. She is, moreover, shown amidst like surroundings. To her right is the window with its lozenge-shaped panes of glass. The elaborate door at the back of the Althorpe picture is, however, replaced by a bookshelf, upon which are two books and a candlestick. On the table is a still larger chalice than the one with which we are familiar, and which bears an extraordinary resemblance to the celebrated chalice designed by Holbein, and known as of Jane Seymour.

"The picture at Milan is about 2½ feet in height by 2 feet in width. It is delicately painted, and has been attributed to Barend Van Orley; but if it is, as its owner believes, a portrait of Jane Grey, this is impossible, for Orley died in 1541. Signor Carotti believes it to be the work of one of the numerous pupils of Holbein, and quotes in confirmation of this belief the opinion of Baldinucci, who says in his life of Holbein that this great master 'formed a school in England of pupils who imitated his style in a surprisingly perfect manner.'

"With reference to the chalice which figures so conspicuously in both the Althorpe and Milanese supposed portraits of Jane Grey, Dr. Carotti thinks it may possibly be intended for a very elaborate inkstand. It frequently appears in portraits of this period when the individual is represented as either reading or writing. In the Tudor Exhibition—No. 111—is a picture lent by the Marquis of Hertford, and said to be a likeness of Katherine Parr, who is represented reading a book resting on a table, upon which is a short chalice of similar workmanship to those already mentioned."

We judged of Mr. Davey's meaning by his own words. The picture at Althorpe has not a touch like Holbein's, nor is it in the taste of his school. The so-called chalice is more like a German covered hanap of the sixteenth century, and is supposed from similar instances to be the vase of Mary Magdalene's precious ointment.

Fine-Art Gossip.

TO-DAY (Saturday) will be marked with a white stone in the calendars of frequenters of Christie's, because they may see, and buy if they are rich enough, not only Wilkie's last palette, given by his sister to W. Collins, C. R. Leslie's beautiful copy of Titian's 'Entombment' in the Louvre, Sir J. E. Millais's portrait of Wilkie Collins, and other works belonging to the last by his father, brother, Mrs. Carpenter, and John Linnell, but four of the Romneys which belonged to Mr. John Carwardine, of Earl's Colne, including 'Contemplation' (born Emma Hart), which was No. 13 at the Grosvenor Winter Exhibition, 1888; 'Mrs. Butler' (born Carwardine, 110 at the same place), 'W. Hayley' (138), and 'A Woman and Child.' The supremely beautiful 'Mrs. Thomas Carwardine and Child,' 148 at the Grosvenor Gallery, which was mezzotinted by J. R. Smith, having already changed hands, is not now to be sold. It is, we understand, again in an engraver's hands. With the above will be sold pictures by Raeburn (of the Edgar and Glendouwyn families) Reynolds ('Mrs. Way,' 'Dr. Green,' and others), Romney ('Mrs. Wells'), Gainsborough, Wilkie, and Cotman.

THE French papers say that M. Meissonier has promised to contribute a picture or pictures to the forthcoming French Exhibition at Earl's Court.

THE managers of local exhibitions intended to diffuse taste for art among the people, impressed by an idea that the National Gallery was a sort of reservoir of fine works from which they could borrow, without regard to national as well as purely metropolitan needs, never rested till they obtained loans of pictures from that institution. Not all of the bodies thus accommodated have known what to do with the works they borrowed when they got them, but none, so far as we know, has so far neglected its opportunities as the Corporation of Liverpool, to whom three Turners were lent. One of these, the fine 'Rizpah,' the authorities on the Mersey have hung on high in the dark, over a very interesting Low Country picture of the seventeenth century, which deserved a much better place; the smaller 'Riva degli Schiavoni, Venice,' a mere faded wreck, unfit for exhibition, is placed where its defects are only too visible; while the famous 'Rome from the Vatican,' which is fast becoming a ghost of itself, hangs close to a window, and so that half its surface is in strong light, the other half in nearly as strong shadow. All these works are on the ground floor of the gallery, which is lighted from the side, while a very large portion of the admirable top-lighted galleries of the upper floor is devoted to pictorial trash, gaudy, ill painted, and vulgar, marked by false sentiment, and flabby, and therefore injurious to the public taste, on which the Corporation of Liverpool has been unlucky enough to spend its money. It might not be always possible for a public body to obtain masterpieces such as Rossetti's 'Dante's Dream' and Mr. H. Moore's 'The Needles, Isle of Wight,' which, with other good things, are well hung in these upper galleries, but prompt elimination of the rubbish is desirable to make room for the Turners, which, however faded, are not foolish.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish next week an elaborate essay on the 'Development and Character of Gothic Architecture,' by Prof. Charles H. Moore, of Cambridge, U.S.A. The aim of the book is to prove the French origin of Gothic, and in order to establish this view the author has, after a minute examination of the architecture of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, made a close analysis and comparison of the different pointed styles of Europe, a work which appears not to have been undertaken before. Prof. Moore's book will be fully illustrated, chiefly from drawings made by himself.

AMONG new books interesting to artists is the 'Chemistry of Paints and Painting,' by Mr. A. H. Church, F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry to the Royal Academy. It is dedicated to Sir Frederic Leighton, and Messrs. Seeley & Co. are the publishers. It treats of the methods and materials used by the painter as viewed from a chemical standpoint.

THE County Council has agreed to oppose Sir Whittaker Ellis's scheme for the destruction of Emmanuel Hospital, and so have the Commons Preservation Society, the Open Spaces Society, and the Kyrle Society. The Society for Preserving Ancient Buildings has taken the lead in rousing opposition to this atrocious proposal, and it is hoped that public opinion will save the hospital, as it saved the Charterhouse from its own governors.

MR. DUNTHORNE is exhibiting Mr. G. Natorp's medallion portrait, which was at the Academy in 1888, of Robert Browning, and will shortly publish by subscription bronze casts of it. This same publisher has on view a number of drawings by Mr. F. Hall illustrating, in what he calls "Sportive Shadows," the Devon and Somerset staghounds. Messrs. Dowdeswell have formed an exhibition of a series of pictures and drawings of "Royal Berkshire," by Messrs. Y. King, J. M. Bromley, and J. M. Macintosh. At Messrs. Boussois, Valadon & Co.'s gallery may be seen a collection of pictures by C. F. Daubigny.

THE Société des Artistes Français announces that the Salon in the Champs Elysées will be opened on the 1st of May next, and closed on the 30th of June following, and, as usual, comprise works of foreign as well as French artists. Pictures offered for exhibition must be delivered at the Palais de l'Industrie between the 10th and 15th of March inclusive, from 11 till 6 o'clock, and drawings of all kinds, enamels, porcelain, and works in stained glass between the 10th and 12th of March inclusive, from 11 till 6 o'clock. No artist may send more than two pictures in oil; diptychs or triptychs will be reckoned as two pictures, so that a painter may send not more than one of either kind. Gilt, black, and wooden (naturel foncé) frames are to be admitted; oil pictures must not be glazed; frames of a round form must be placed upon gilt, rectangular backs of wood.

THE Exposition de la Société Nationale des Beaux-Arts, i. e., the new Salon, will be opened in the Palais des Beaux-Arts, Champ de Mars, on the 15th of May, and closed on the 30th of June next. No limit will be set to the number of works sent by each artist, and foreigners as well as Frenchmen may contribute. Their works must be sent to the Champ de Mars between the 1st and 8th of March, and they will be subject to selection or rejection by a committee. So far as possible pictures will be placed in two lines only on the walls of the galleries. The leading members of the society are MM. Meissonier, Puvion de Chavannes, C. Duran, Braquemond, Dalou, Roll, Cazin, Gervex, Duez, Dagnan-Bouveret, Besnard, Rodin, J. Béraud, Rixens, Waltner, Billotte, Montenard, Lhermitte, Damoye, Barau, Courtois, Carrière, Boilvin, Renouard, Ribot, Guignard, Lerolle, Desbois, Friant, and Mathey.

A SMALL collection of Egyptian, Greek, and Roman antiquities, the property of Mr. W. Rome, F.S.A., has been kindly deposited by him for public view in the Library at Guildhall. The Egyptian objects comprise a number of choice scarabs and bronze figures of Isis, Osiris, and other divinities. The Greek collection contains coins representing respectively the period of archaic art, 700–480 B.C., the transitional period, 480–400 B.C., the period of revival, 400–336 B.C., and the period of decline, 336–200 B.C., ending in the very debased art of 200–50 B.C.; a number of terracotta figurines from Tanagra and other places; and some earrings, fibulae, and other ornaments from Capua, which are choice examples of goldsmiths' work of the period of 370–320 B.C. The Roman section comprises a series of gold, silver, and bronze coins, ranging from the time of Julius Caesar to the decline of the Empire, and some statuettes, including that of Jupiter Conservator exhibited to the Society of Antiquaries on the 30th of January, Bacchus, and others. The owner of the collection is anxious by this public exhibition to give the students who frequent the Guildhall Library the opportunity of studying some of the typical forms of ancient art.

NEAR Patras a sarcophagus has just been discovered richly sculptured. The bas-relief represents a wild-boar hunt, in which are the huntsmen divided in two groups, seven of them being without beard and one bearded. This last is in the act of stopping a boar, running at full speed, and has his left foot on the snout. The rest are pressing forward to slay the animal with hatchets and arrows. Another boar is seen making his escape in the opposite direction. On the sides of the sarcophagus are bas-reliefs representing on one side two prostrate corpses and a dog, and on the other a bull with, on its back, an owl. The work is highly finished and of the Roman period, but very probably copied from an original of Hellenic workmanship. Inside the sarcophagus a skeleton was found.

THE excavations at Lycosoura, interrupted by the winter season, will be now resumed, under the direction of the Ephor, B. A. Leonardos. The objects hitherto found have now been transported to Athens.

FROM Munich the death is announced of M. Angelo Quaglio, decorator of the royal theatres. He was born in 1829. The landscape painter M. A. Legeti is dead at Buda-Pesth, aged sixty-seven years; likewise the Viennese architect G. Petschacher.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—The Popular Concerts. M. and Madame de Pachmann's Recital.

AMONG the many German musicians of the century whose labours in the field of composition have failed to win widespread recognition is Jacob Rosenhain, who was born as far back as 1813, and who is still living in retirement at Baden-Baden. His connexion with this country can be summed up in a few words. In 1837 he played at the Philharmonic concerts; in 1854 one of his symphonies was performed, also at the Philharmonic concerts; and last Saturday his only Pianoforte Concerto, in D minor, was brought forward by Miss Fanny Davies at the Crystal Palace. If we may judge by this example of Rosenhain's talent, he is a disciple of the modern melodic or Mendelssohnian school. The principal merit of the concerto is its unaffected geniality. The themes are far from original, but they are bright and tuneful, and the treatment is natural and unlaboured, the accompaniments being full of interesting details. Though not in any sense a great work, the concerto is far more pleasing than many works of a later period in which complexity of detail is made to atone for poverty of invention, and Miss Davies, whose performance was, of course, admirable, deserved thanks for its introduction. Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, Sullivan's 'Overture di Ballo,' and some pianoforte solos completed the instrumental portion of the programme. The début of Mlle. Amelia Sinico can scarcely be considered a success. The young lady's high soprano voice is thin and hard, and not as yet under perfect control. Further study is evidently needed for its full development.

The leader at the Popular Concert last Saturday was Herr Kruse, who made a highly favourable impression by his bright tone and correct intonation. He has distinctly improved since he last played in London. The works in the programme were Mozart's Quartet in E flat, No. 4; Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata,' of which Mlle. Janotha was the executant; Schumann's Sonata in A minor for piano and violin, Op. 105; and Brahms's 'Gipsy Songs,' with Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marguerite Hall, and Mr. Shakespeare as the vocalists.

The return of Herr Joachim continues to arouse much interest among amateurs, and the enthusiasm that prevailed in St. James's Hall last Monday evening was striking from its evident sincerity. The musical importance of the occasion, however, was but slight, the programme being made up of familiar works. It would be superfluous to say a word concerning Beethoven's Quartet in C, Op. 59, No. 3, Haydn's in the same key, Op. 33, or Bach's Chaconne. The attentive listener could discern proofs of the advance of time in Herr Joachim's playing, an occasional false intonation being perceptible, but the breadth of style and artistic fervour which many years ago placed him at the head of violinists are still to be observed in their pristine perfection. In other words, no younger performer can approach the Hungarian violinist in the qualities we have indicated. The pianist was Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who played three of Scarlatti's pieces in a manner that may be regarded as perfect. Many players seem to imagine that the clavier music of the seventeenth century and the early part of the eighteenth needs the utmost rapidity of execution; but this is an entire mistake, as those who are acquainted with the capabilities and characteristics of the harpsichord and other instruments of the same genus are fully aware. Miss Liza Lehmann sang with charming expression an old French song 'Le Portrait,' and Lieder by Kjerulf and D'Albert.

An excellent, though somewhat overlengthy programme was provided by M. and Madame de Pachmann at their pianoforte recital on Thursday afternoon. Of the qualities which distinguish M. de Pachmann as a pianist it is scarcely necessary to speak. On the present occasion he contented himself for the most part with trifles, the only work of importance in his share of the performance being Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor. His rendering of this could scarcely be commended, the first movement being played too slowly and with exaggerated expression, while the last was flurried and indistinct. He will be heard to greater advantage in the Chopin recital which is announced for Monday week. Madame de Pachmann has only assumed a high position recently, but she is now entitled to a place among the best of our younger pianists. She gave a beautifully refined and expressive performance of Schubert's Sonata in G, Op. 78, a work of which she is naturally fond, as it suits her exceedingly well. The same refinement of style was shown in Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses and in Chopin's Étude in E minor, Op. 25, No. 3. The pieces for four hands or for two pianofortes included Schumann's beautiful Andante and Variations in B flat, Op. 46, and a little Fugue in D by Beethoven, originally written for strings in 1817. It is a mere curiosity of little intrinsic value.

Musical Gossip.

WE have throughout refused to credit the definite statements concerning an Italian opera season at Her Majesty's Theatre this spring, and it now appears that there is little chance of the scheme being carried into effect.

A NEW Pianoforte Trio in G, by Dr. Hubert Parry, was performed for the first time at Mr. Dannreuther's concert on Thursday last week. It would be rash to pronounce definite judgment on the work without the aid of the score or even an analysis, and we shall only offer a few general remarks. The first and last movements are characterized by great if not excessive vigour, the absence of contrasts in the subjects and of quiet episodes rendering the music difficult to follow at a first hearing. The second section, a 'Capriccio' in E minor, and the third, a passionate 'Lament' in C, made a more favourable impression, and, speaking generally, the trio is unquestionably worthy of the composer. More than that cannot be said at present. The other works in the programme were Beethoven's rarely heard Sonata in C, for piano and violoncello, Op. 102, No. 1; his Trio in D, Op. 70, No. 1; and Schumann's Sonata in G minor, Op. 22.

GOUNOD'S 'Redemption' was performed by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall on Wednesday before an enormous audience. The most noteworthy feature of the performance was the highly expressive singing of the tenor narrator's part by Mr. Iver McKay, whose improvement recently has been remarkable. The other soloists were Madame Dotti, Miss Eldridge, Madame Belle Cole (who has also improved), Mr. Henry Pope, and Mr. Watkin Mills.

MISS MARGUERITE HALL and Mr. William Nicholl gave the first of their three vocal recitals at the Steinway Hall on Tuesday afternoon. Some new songs by Dr. F. E. Gladstone and Mr. A. D. Duvivier were introduced, but the programme generally was not noteworthy for special features of interest. M. Tivadar Nachéz played some violin solos.

A NEW one-act operetta, entitled 'Love's Magic,' written by Mr. J. K. J. Jocelyn, and composed by Mr. Zavertal, was performed under the auspices of the Royal Artillery at Woolwich on Tuesday afternoon. There are only three characters in the libretto, and the plot is simple, though not uninteresting. Mr. Zavertal's music is extremely pleasing, though, of course, not ambitious. The characters were ably represented by Mr. and Mrs. Ben Davies and Mr. Ernest Deloart, and the fine orchestra of the Royal Artillery rendered full justice to the accompaniments.

A BRIEF new cantata, entitled 'In the Forest,' by Mr. J. F. H. Read, was introduced at the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society's concert at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening. The work, which is written for baritone solo and chorus, is studiously unpretentious, the best number being the opening unaccompanied chorus. The programme included Mr. MacCunn's overture 'Land of the Mountain and the Flood,' Beethoven's 'Leonora,' No. 3, and Haydn's Symphony in C, Letter V., all of which were excellently rendered by Mr. George Kitchen's well-drilled amateurs.

WE note that at the meeting of the Wind Instrument Chamber Music Society on April 11th Mr. G. A. Osborne will play the pianoforte part in a sextet for piano, wind, and strings of his own composition. The veteran pianist and composer is in his eighty-fourth year.

THE programme of Sir Charles Halle's Manchester concert on Thursday included Mozart's C minor Symphony, Herr Joachim's 'Hungarian' Concerto (played, of course, by the composer), and the overtures 'Turandot' by Weber, 'The Hebrides' by Mendelssohn, and 'Patrie' by Bizet.

M. REYER's new opera 'Salammbo,' produced last week at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, is said to be equal if not superior to his 'Sigurd,' a work which contains much that is clever and effective, and shows the ability of the composer to handle modern forms successfully, but which lacks the touch of genius which alone can render a work truly great. The impersonation of the principal character in 'Salammbo' by Madame Caron is said to be superb.

THE rehearsals of M. Massenet's 'Ascanio' have at last commenced in earnest at the Paris

Opéra, and we may shortly expect the production of that long-delayed work.

We spoke some time ago of a proposal to build a festival theatre at Salzburg, the birth-place of Mozart. The design has now taken root, and a site has been purchased on the Mönchsberg, a wooded hill overlooking the town. It is hoped to complete the structure in the course of next year in order to celebrate the centenary of Mozart's death. It is not intended, however, to confine the performances to the works of the Salzburg master, though the theatre will probably be inaugurated by the production of 'Zauberflöte' on a grand scale, after which 'The Nibelung's Ring' may be mounted. The theatre is to hold between 1,500 and 1,800 persons, and the stage will be fitted with every modern contrivance for the enhancement of scenic effects. The total cost of the undertaking is estimated at 400,000 florins, or about 35,000*l*.

GLUCK'S 'Armida' has been revived with much success at Vienna, with Frau Materna and M. van Dyck in the principal parts.

THE WEEK.

TOOLE'S.—'Isalda,' a Play in One Act. By F. Horner.
 COMEDY.—Afternoon Representation: 'The Home Feud,' a Drama in Three Acts. By W. Frith.
 GAIETY.—Afternoon Representation: 'My Brother's Sister (only in Fun),' a Play in Three Acts.
 GLOBE.—'A Midsummer Night's Dream.'

No idea seems more firmly rooted in certain minds than the conviction that the dislocation of prose constitutes verse. "I will go into the garden," for instance, is admittedly prose worthy of M. Jourdain. Substitute "Into the garden go will I," and you are supposed to have poetry. Most so-called blank-verse plays produced in modern days in London rest on this assumption. 'Isalda,' by Mr. Horner, given at Toole's Theatre on Friday in last week, is a terrible example of this delusion. When a line spoken as any human being would speak it would be faultless verse, Mr. Horner must torture it and invert it until the impression left is that of total want of harmony. Not too comprehensible is the story he tells. The scene is Spain in the last century. A Spanish maiden has by an indiscretion incurred the penalty of death. Impressed by her beauty, Don Antonio, the governor of the province, offers her pardon as the price of her favours, and is rejected. A more favoured lover, in the person of a French count, appears, forces a duel upon the governor, and slays him. Before dying Don Antonio, with great magnanimity, furnishes his enemy with the means to escape and carry off his sweetheart. Such sacrifice seems more than startling in the sombre, passionate man whom Mr. Horner has depicted. Miss Vane Featherston acted with much earnestness and some intensity as the heroine, and Mr. Bassett Roe and Mr. Brodie were painstaking. The piece, however, can scarcely be held to strengthen the bill into which it is introduced.

Beginning in pleasant and poetical, if not particularly original style, Mr. Frith's 'The Home Feud' ends in commonplace and conventional melodrama. A young officer suffering from blindness has been saved from accident and nursed through illness by the daughter of an organist, who has learnt to love her patient. Returning from abroad cured of his blindness, the officer proposes in mistake to a designing cousin of the heroine, whom he marries. This portion of the story, recalling Bulwer's 'Pilgrims of the Rhine,' is pretty in itself and well treated. A way out of the impasse is, however, required, and Mr. Frith hits upon nothing better than supplying the wife with a husband who returns and slays her. The scenes in which this portion of the action passes are ineffective, and the piece as a whole fails to impress. Its dialogue is much above the average, and with some alterations it might still delight an audience. Miss Gertrude Kingston, who has of late falsified all her pleasing promise, overacted sadly as the bigamist. Miss May Whitty played the heroine with much prettiness and grace. Miss Eva Moore, Mr. Nutcombe Gould, Mr. William Herbert, and Mr. Scott Buist took part in a fairly competent interpretation.

'My Brother's Sister (only in Fun)' is the title of a piece of American extraction, in which Miss Palmer has elected to show herself at the Gaiety Theatre. It is scarcely more than the framework of a variety entertainment, in which Miss Palmer has a monopoly of opportunities. As a girl brought up by her father as a boy, she personates a girl who again personates a boy. Many changes of costume are thus provided, and in various disguises Miss Palmer sings, dances, and exhibits her powers of coquetry and "cheek." The performance is slight, passably vulgar, and not unamusing. Mr. Maclean and Mr. Wallace Erskine are included in the cast.

Miss Dorothy Dene, who replaces at the Globe Theatre Miss Kate Rorke in the character of Helena, looks the part well, plays with pathos, and is generally satisfactory. Mr. Athol Forde, who appears for the first time as Bottom, if not very ripely comic, is more moderate than his predecessor. A great improvement in the general performance is now to be seen, and some impersonations—such as the Hermia of Miss Ferrar and the Puck of Miss Grace Geraldine—are intelligent and effective. Mr. Benson as Lysander, Mrs. Benson as Titania, and Mr. Stuart as Oberon are now at home in their parts, and what was at first only to be regarded as a poetical spectacle is now a meritorious representation. If Mr. Benson carry out his project of reviving a series of poetical plays he will do well to get a stage manager who will avoid undue multiplication of accents; a mistake greater than that of accentuating needlessly an adjective or an epithet in Shakspeare cannot easily be found. Almost alone among the company Miss Dene avoids the error. In answer to the threat of Demetrius,

But I shall do thee mischief in the wood,

she delivered finely the lines beginning:—

Ay, in the temple, in the town, the field,
 You do me mischief.

Idols of the French Stage. By H. Sutherland Edwards. 2 vols. (Reynolds & Co.)—Under this title Mr. Edwards has published what, without being announced as a translation, is in fact a rendering of 'Les Comédiennes Adorées' of Emile Gaboriau. There is no reason why this bright and sparkling work of the author of 'La Vie Infernale' and 'La Dégringolade' should not have an English dress. It would, however, have been better to announce 'Idols of the French Stage' as in part a translation. Two or three passages will show how close is the rendering. Of Mlle. Molière M. Gaboriau says, after quoting a scene from 'Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme': "Tel est l'amoureux et charmant portrait qu'après huit ans de mariage, Molière trace de cette froide et implacable coquette, qui fut le désespoir de sa vie, et peut-être aussi, hélas! le terrible aiguillon de son génie." Mr. Edwards, after quoting the same scene, abridges as follows the comments of M. Gaboriau: "Such is the portrait traced by Molière of the fascinating Armande Bédard after he had been married to her eight years." M. Gaboriau's life of Mlle. de Camargo begins thus: "Au commencement du XVIII^e siècle, le ballet était encore un divertissement solennel. On était si voisin de ce temps glorieux où Louis XIV, le roi-soleil, daignait descendre de son Olympe pour étaler ses grâces et danser, lui-même, devant ses courtisanes éblouies." This Mr. Edwards translates: "At the beginning of the eighteenth century the ballet in France was a solemn ceremony imposed on the public by fashion rather than a diversion in which they took delight. It still, indeed, remained in vogue; for Louis XIV. himself, in his moments of majestic buffoonery, had deigned to step from the throne and display his talents as a dancer to the jaded and yawning court." Mr. Edwards goes at times to other sources, which are abundant, and he omits much that M. Gaboriau inserts. Practically, however, the matter and very much of the manner are derived from M. Gaboriau, and a preliminary notice to that effect is requisite as a simple act of justice. For the rest the volumes are entertaining and agreeable, though disfigured with many misprints.

A BI-MONTHLY issue of the Costumes of the Modern Stage, with illustrations, hand coloured, by various French artists, and letterpress translated from the French of M. Mobisson, Secretary of the Direction of the Opéra in Paris, has been undertaken by Mr. J. C. Nimmo. 'Les Respectables' of M. Ambrose Janvier, Vaudeville, November 21st, 1889; 'Paris Exposition,' by MM. Blondeau and Monréal, Variétés, November 20th, 1889; 'Shylock,' as played in three acts and seven tableaux at the Odéon, December 17th, 1889; 'Jeanne d'Arc,' by M. Jules Barbier, Porte Saint Martin, January 3rd, 1890; and 'Margot,' by M. Henri Meilhac, Comédie Française, January 18th, 1890—five parts in all—have seen the light. Each play has four or more striking illustrations, principally of the female characters. These are very cleverly executed, and the rapidly growing series, besides constituting a pleasing record of the stage, is likely to be of genuine utility. The costumes in 'Shylock' will surprise those familiar only with English productions of the play.

Dramatic Gossip.

NEGOTIATIONS with a view to a representation in Dutch of 'The Middleman,' by the Amsterdam comedians, at the Shaftesbury Theatre, are said to be pending. If the Dutch management is wise, it will turn a deaf ear to all temptations. Fine as was the lesson in art conveyed by the Rotterdam company on its visit to London, the experiment was financially disastrous. There is small chance that the projected experiment will be more successful.

'QUICKSANDS,' a drama in four acts, adapted by Charlotte E. Morland from Mrs. Lovett Cameron's novel 'A Devout Lover,' was produced on Tuesday afternoon at the Comedy Theatre, and numbered among its interpreters Mr. Cantley, Mr. Gilbert Yorke, and Miss Robina. Its story is moderately stimulating, but ends unexpectedly in melodrama. 'Tabitha's Courtship,' by Misses Eva and Florence Bright, was also given.

AFTER a series of farewell entertainments unprecedented, it may well be supposed, in the history of the stage, Mr. Toole embarked on Saturday last for France on his way to Brindisi and Australia. The previous evening witnessed a large gathering to supper, under the presidency of Mr. Irving, in the beefsteak room at the Lyceum Theatre.

THE Lyceum closed on Ash Wednesday to permit of Mr. Irving giving at Wolverhampton his promised lecture on 'Hamlet' before the Literary and Scientific Society, of which he is this year president.

THIS evening witnesses at the Garrick Theatre the first performance of Mr. Grundy's 'A Pair of Spectacles,' in which Mr. Hare reappears at his own house. 'Dream-Faces' is also revived, with Miss Carlotta Addison in her original character, and with Mr. Forbes Robertson as the hero.

'OUR AMERICAN COUSIN,' with Mr. Graham Wentworth as Asa Trenchard, and Mr. George Turner as Lord Dundreary, has been given at the Novelty Theatre.

'A MAN'S SHADOW' is being given at the Grand Theatre by the company Mr. Tree has engaged to play it in the country.

THE long-deferred production at the St. James's, by Mrs. Langtry, of 'As You Like It,' is now fixed for Monday next.

Liverpool Mercury.—"In 'The Bondman' Mr. Hall Caine has produced a story which will be read not by his contemporaries alone, but by later generations, so long as its chief features—high emotion, deep passion, exquisite poetry, and true pathos—have power to delight and touch the heart."

Scotsman.—"A story which, for the lucidity of its plot, for its literary excellence, for its delineation of human passions, and for its intensely powerful dramatic scenes, is distinctly ahead of all the fictional literature of our time."

Speaker.—"We are so loth to let to good work be degraded by the title of novel, that we are almost tempted to consider its claims to rank as a prose epic.... Nor can we leave 'The Bondman' with any other feelings than those of gratitude for the book, and admiration for the genius of the author."

TWO ARCTIC BOOKS.

Journal of H.M.S. Enterprise on the Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin's Ships by Behring Strait, 1850-5. By Capt. Richard Collinson, C.B., R.N., with a Memoir. Edited by his Brother, Major-General T. B. Collinson. (Sampson Low & Co.)

The Skipper in Arctic Seas. By Walter J. Clutterbuck. (Longmans & Co.)

GENERAL COLLINSON'S memorial of his brother is a rather belated book, for it is now seven years since Sir Richard Collinson died, and upwards of thirty-five since he completed the voyage with the diary of which the greater part of the volume is occupied. But though it comes rather late in the day, this first attempt to do full justice to the merits of a modest man is not the less welcome.

Born in a Northumbrian vicarage, he entered the navy at the age of twelve by the summary process of being told to leave school and join the gun-room of His Majesty's ship Cambridge. From that day—now sixty-seven years ago—Collinson's life was spent in voyaging all seas and taking part in many surveying and scientific expeditions, such as those of the Chanticleer and Sulphur. But in the Chinese war of 1840-6 he shared in more perilous work, while the labours of his leisure hours and of those pauses in active life which come too frequently to a naval officer are embodied in the reports of the Holyhead Harbour Committee, the Royal Geographical Society, the Hakluyt Society, the United Service Institution, and other semi-professional bodies. At length the congenial post of Deputy-Master of the Trinity House, to which he was elected in 1875, offered ample employment for his energies. But the most important event in Sir Richard Collinson's career was his nomination in 1849 to the command of the expedition sent by way of Behring Strait to examine the Arctic shores for any trace of the vanished expedition of Sir John Franklin. Collinson as senior officer took command of the Enterprise, while M'Clure was appointed to the Investigator. The latter vessel proved the faster sailer of the two, and had penetrated far into the Polar Basin before the Enterprise arrived at Point Barrow, and, finding the season too late to proceed further, Collinson wintered at Hong Kong for the sake of the climate and supplies. Next spring he returned, and up to the autumn of 1854 doggedly forced his way through many channels, without, however, lighting on any tangible trace of the men he was in search of, though more than once very near the spot where some years later M'Clintock solved the problem of Franklin's fate by finding the remains of so many of the party.

Yet alone, and entirely on her own resources, the Enterprise remained "for more than three full years in these trying seas, and penetrated further in the true direction of the search than any other vessel."

In the course of these voyages and sledge journeys

"she had shown the practicability of navigating along the whole of the north coast of America, and had further demonstrated that to be the only probable line, difficult as it is, by which a North-West Passage can ever hope to be accomplished; then she had got herself nearer than any other vessel to the most advanced position of any ships from the other side, and, moreover, in two different lines of passage: first by Prince of Wales's Straits to Parry's ship (the Hecla, 1821); and second by Victoria Straits to Franklin's ship (1843); and lastly, after this long travel, she had brought herself home with her crew in good health, a result of no slight consideration when we know that in the course of these same years no less than five of Her Majesty's ships were abandoned in these same Arctic seas, and their crews conveyed home in other vessels."

This sober merit, however, availed little; for M'Clure, in the Investigator, had managed to communicate with the vessels which had entered from Davis Strait, and though he left his ship in the ice he returned to England by way of Baffin's Bay and the Atlantic. The result was that he was hailed as the "discoverer of the North-West Passage," and received a portion of the 15,000*l.* which had been so long offered as a reward for the accomplishment of a voyage along the northern shores of America. He was, moreover, knighted, and, in short, honoured as the great man of the expedition, while Collinson was received coldly by those who ought to have judged him more justly. Hurt at this unfair treatment, Collinson retired into private life, and never again sought official employment, receiving late in life only a partial reparation for the neglect with which a country blinded by superficial brilliancy and an Admiralty ready to swim with the tide had treated his arduous services.

Geographers, however, long ago appraised his merits more accurately, and the generation which have grown to manhood since 1855 will find in General Collinson's volume materials by which they, too, may be able to revise the hasty verdict of their fathers. The truth is admirably stated in a preface letter which Sir George Richards has contributed to the book. The "discovery of the North-West Passage," with which the country rang in 1854, was in reality no discovery. The Investigator never passed the 180 miles which separated it from Kellett's ships; and remarkable though M'Clure's run unquestionably was, so competent an authority as Sir George Richards is inclined to believe that Collinson's was the greatest of all the Arctic voyages. The neglect, amounting almost to contumely, with which it was treated,

"is only to be accounted for by one of those gusts of popular impulse which at times blind men's understandings, and obliterate their better judgment, until in the end injustice becomes more expedient than honourable recantation. Your brother [Sir George adds] was far too generous and unselfish not to concur and to rejoice in the honours which were bestowed on his second, who, but for his chief's unsuspicious and trusting nature, would never have had an opportunity of making himself famous. In awarding the palm for the discovery of the North-West Passage there were susceptibilities to be studied which the men of the time were not strong enough to disregard, and a compromise was offered which history will not ratify; but will probably pronounce the verdict that the Passage has not been accomplished at all; that the most Northern route between the two oceans was found to exist, but not navigated, by the combined efforts of Parry in 1819 and M'Clure in 1852, and the more Southern one by Franklin in 1846 and Collinson in 1853; two of the parties not living to know the completion of their labours."

We have only to add that General Collinson has performed his self-imposed task with good taste, and as much knowledge as could be expected from an editor not personally acquainted with the Polar Basin; and that his volume is illustrated by several excellent maps, a portrait of Sir Richard Collinson, and a coloured sketch of the Enterprise. He should, however, in any future edition cease to indulge in such eccentricities as "Eskimos" and "Esquimos," and make himself familiar with more modern views regarding the origin of the people so named than those which he seems to have imbibed.

Mr. Clutterbuck's volume is a much lighter contribution to the literature of travel. He and a friend chartered a Peterhead whaler for a cruise to Spitzbergen, and, on the whole, seem to have enjoyed themselves very much. They shot a number of seals and reindeer, one bear, and a host of sea-fowl, but met with no adventures worth recording. The reader will, however, learn what they ate and how they felt upon particular mornings and evenings, whether the bacon was fat or lean, what "Jack" said and what the "skipper" replied, how extremely stupid the steward was, and how good a fellow the captain turned out to be. There is also something—but not a great deal—about the Arctic seas, though the naturalist who searches the pages of Mr. Clutterbuck's volume for information regarding the habits of seals and whales or the nature of Polar ice will find little except what is contained in the quotations from Nordenskjöld and Lamont, who seem to be the author's sole literary authorities on a subject his entire ignorance of which is somewhat ostentatiously proclaimed. Altogether 'The Skipper in Arctic Seas' is an extremely inoffensive chronicle of small beer. The book, however, in spite of an occasional affectation of indifference, and a straining after "funniness" which was the bane of Mr. Clutterbuck's former volumes on Norwegian and American travel, is pleasantly written and well illustrated. His "process" photographs are, indeed, among the best of the kind which have appeared, the scenery of the Spitzbergen seas and the ordinary incidents of voyaging being portrayed with a fidelity which wood engravings from pencil sketches would fail to secure. The book is also laudably free from those blunders in natural history into which the unscientific yachtsman is so prone to fall. Only we must object to the statement that Peterhead is the port from which "nearly all" the British whalers take their departure. The very opposite is the case, as Dundee would be apt to inform Mr. Clutterbuck with something more than emphasis.

The Century Dictionary: an Encyclopædic Lexicon of the English Language. Prepared under the Superintendence of William Dwight Whitney, Ph.D., LL.D. 6 vols. —Vol. I. A—Cono. (New York, the Century Co.; London, Fisher Unwin.)

THE American characteristics of enterprise and thoroughness are conspicuously illustrated by the 'Century Dictionary,' which bids fair to be far and away the largest and best general and encyclopædic dictionary of the English language. The scope of the work is entirely distinct from that of the 'New English Dictionary' of the English Philological Society, the peculiar excellences of which the new venture does not attempt to emulate; while, on the other hand, its size and price (twelve guineas) will prevent any serious interference with other existing dictionaries. But though cheapness has not been aimed at, the intrinsic merits of the work make it one of the cheapest publications ever issued.

The vocabulary seems to be almost as large as that of the 'New English Dictionary,' since the American scheme admits a greater number of encyclopædic items than the English; but as far as the English language proper goes, it has been estimated that the great English work will eventually take the lead by several thousand articles, most of which will treat of obsolete or rare words. It is calculated that the 'Century,' when complete, in the latter part of next year, will comprise about 30,000 more articles than the complete work which now claims pre-eminence in this respect. Of course, several hundred of the new articles will treat of pure Americanisms, such as agostadero—"a cattle-pasture"; ante bellum—"before the (U.S. civil) war"; caba(s)—"basket," "work-basket"; cabrouet—"a kind of cart used in sugar-plantations"; chermamy—"a variety of the game of baseball"; chogset—"blue-perch"; clambake—"meal of baked clams," "a picnic on the seashore at which baked clam is the principal viand."

Unfamiliar spellings, such as ax, center, checkbook, neighbor, are not prejudicial to the value of the work in Great Britain, as the orthography of the mother country receives due attention and respect. For the forms color, favor, &c., which seem to be gaining ground in this country, there is more to be said than for the archaic spelling patronized by Johnson; but neighbor is in our opinion indefensible, and is, if possible, worse than the English favourite. It is to be hoped that in the article on neighbor Prof. W. D. Whitney will exert his great influence on behalf of neighbour or neighbour.

The first volume, which is now under review, has been evidently edited with all the care and skill to be expected from the supervision of one of the most distinguished philologists in the world. The qualifications of the staff may be indicated by merely stating that the departments of zoology, biology, and comparative anatomy are under the care of Dr. Elliott Coues; those of decorative art, mediæval archæology, and kindred subjects, in charge of Mr. Russell Sturgis; those of physics and mineralogy under the care of Prof. E. S. Dana. By selecting these three names we do not wish to imply that the other members of the staff do not deserve similar recognition, but we have not space to give a list of nearly forty names, and have therefore considered the nature of the subjects handled rather than the comparative merits of the editorial contributors. It may be taken for granted that the work of so competent a staff is independent, except where acknowledgment of indebtedness has been expressed, as, for instance, to the etymological work of Skeat, E. Müller, and (with regard to A and part of B) of the 'New English Dictionary.' As to vocabulary and illustrative quotations, the special acknowledgments of indebtedness to the 'New English Dictionary' bear testimony to the superlative excellence of that colossal work, which on one page of the 'Century' (p. 114) is credited with three fresh words and three quotations.

When the first part only had been issued, we took the trouble to reckon up as far as A—the words and phrases which only appear in the 'New English Dictionary' and the 'Century Dictionary,' or only in one of the two, and we found about 51 fresh articles of which the lemmas were common to the two dictionaries, with five of which the 'New English Dictionary' is duly credited, while over 60 fresh lemmas which appear in the 'New English Dictionary' have been omitted in the 'Century Dictionary.' The latter work has about 85 fresh articles all to itself, among which are the following English forms: Aaronite, Aaronitic, abactinally, abbey-counter, abdominally, abintestate, abiogenesisist, abiologically, abjuratory, ablative, abnervally, aborally, abox, abradant, abranthian, abranthious, abratonoid, absinthate, abvacuation. It will be observed that none of these words is likely to be heard near a tea-table, unless graduates from Girtton happen to be in force. Out of the 51 fresh words noted as common to the two dictionaries the 'Century' claims 46, and out of these 46 none seems unlikely to have been found by the 'Century' staff or their helpers, while at least 36 seem very likely to have been found by more than one set of workers. The 'New English Dictionary' novelties up to A—amount approximately to 120, while the corresponding 'Century' novelties (including the 46 which also appeared in the 'New English Dictionary') amount to about 65—a proportion so creditable to the English work that it would appear ungenerous not to give the American work all the credit which is claimed for it. Nor has there been any falling off in the number of fresh words in the 'Century' when the 'New English Dictionary' became no longer available. We have reckoned up the number of new words of English form given by the 'Century' between cloa- and coach, that is in fifteen pages beyond the limit of the available work of the 'New English Dictionary,' and find (not counting combinations) 37, which is at the rate of 66 for twenty-seven pages. In the first twenty-seven pages we found 64 such words, of which 46 were common to the 'Century' and the 'New English Dictionary.' It seems, therefore, clear, so far as the rough tests at our disposal can be trusted, that the 'Century' vocabulary is independent of the 'New English Dictionary' vocabulary, excepting in the few cases where acknowledgment is made. In the corresponding portions of the 'New English Dictionary' we may expect to find from 70 to 75 entirely new entries, together with about 60 which have as yet only found record in the 'Century.' We observe that the 'Century' supplies more compounds and combinations of air than the 'New English Dictionary,' though sixteen of the instances given in the 'New English Dictionary' are not included in the 'Century.' A striking proof of independence is shown by the number of cases in which the 'New English Dictionary' presents slight faults which are not found in the 'Century.' For instance, in the latter, abbreviator, abdicator, agitator, alienator, animator, antanaclasis, anticipator, antimetathesis, anxiolude, are not said, as in the 'New English Dictionary,' to be from Latin; nor is antependium said to be Latin, nor ἀντιβακχείος (s.v. antibacchius) to be recorded Greek, though the accentuation is doubtful; nor is apostolic said to be from French. Abrogator is not assigned to Sir E. Sandys on the strength of the posthumous versions of the quotation which illustrates abnegator in Richardson (the word abnegator not occurring in the edition referred to for it in the 'New English Dictionary'); the spelling abjuror is not ignored; the cross-reference abitate is not omitted; Davies's quotation for the verb abortive is not ranged as transitive; under abracadabra we do not read "Q. Severus Sammonicus," but "Q. Serenus Sam."; ablaunt, ante, and aphasia are properly explained; we are not told that antic is used as "equivalent to It. grottesco," which is quite modern, but the correct grottesca, a noun, is cited from Florio.

On the other hand, the etymological members of the staff have been misled by the 'New English Dictionary' as to apophthegm, of which the earliest recorded form in English is not apothegm, but Udall's apophthegme, which they ought to have got from Notes and Queries; also as to animal, which appears as an adjective in Chaucer. We may here mention that ablative case absolute is as old as the Wycliffite Bible, a fact which has not as yet, so far as we know, been recorded. The old mistakes as to abbassi, which derives its name from Shah Abbas I.; aliquot, which is from Late Latin aliquota (pars); almuten, which is manifestly not from Arabic al-mu'taz, as some forms have a b before the t; cheiranthus, the first element of which is not from Greek, but from Arab. khîrî, "the yellow gillyflower"—all these are still handed on by the 'Century,' which is, however, generally sound as to derivations, and is to be congratulated on the cogent arguments adduced in favour of connecting anvil with fold. The articles on bezonian and bisognio are not good, as the meaning "raw soldier" is not noticed, though it occurs in three writers on military matters about 1600, and it is clear that the Italian bisogno applied to persons is an adaptation of the Spanish bisoño. The derivation of chalet from Middle Latin castelletum has been shown to be untenable in the 'New English Dictionary,' but the suggested derivation from Late Latin casella, casella, is almost as bad. The word is clearly a diminutive from the Italian casale, to which Florio gives the meanings "a farm-house," "a dairy-house." The quantities of Latin syllables are not marked, though those of Oriental vowels are often indicated. We do not wish to say much against this treatment of Latin words as a rule, but when in three consecutive articles, caligate, caligated, caligation, we get caligatus, "booted," twice, and then caligatio from caligare, past participle caligatus, "be in darkness," we could excuse the "English reader" for concluding that caligation means literally "being covered over by a boot," or "blackness such as that of a boot," and on either supposition it might be further supposed that Messrs. Day & Martin had precursors in ancient Rome.

We are puzzled about cherisance, chevisance, as to which doctors differ seriously. The latter form is used by Spenser and an imitator as the name of a plant. The 'Century' evidently regards this as a mistake for cherisance, which is explained as: "1. Cherishment; comfort.—2. The wallflower, Cheiranthus cheiri, to which the name of heart's-ease was originally given." But under chevisance the 'New English Dictionary' denies the existence of the word cherisance. We cannot accept this denial, as the 'Romaunte of the Rose' has been quoted for cherisance in the sense of "cherishment," so that the denial of the word's existence ought to be supported by an exposure of the error in Cassell's 'Encyclopædic Dictionary' if there be anything wrong about the said quotation. Again, we are puzzled as to calcography. It seems strange that Webster should be followed in explaining this reprehensible word as "the art of drawing with black or colored chalks or pastels," when Cassell's 'Encyclopædic Dictionary' explains it as the art of engraving on brass, this explanation being borne out by a quotation from Spratt's 'History of the Royal Society,' while Bailey has an entry calcographist, "an Engraver in Brass." Now we dare not say that no one has used calcography as a hybrid, intending thereby "drawing with chalks"; but at any rate there ought to be a cross-reference for the other sense to the properly spelt chalcography. We should have liked a reference for the word chatteration, which is ascribed to Johnson, though it was not inserted in his dictionary during his lifetime.

The vocabulary includes foreign words and phrases, such as—à bas, ab initio, absit, absit omen, ab ovo, ad extremum, ad gustum, à outrance, casus belli, clare constat, confiteor; many technical terms of foreign source, such as—aftaba, aiguère (both daintily illustrated), abbozzo, abzug, aigremore, ankh, appel, ashrafi, batteria, batterie, baulea, bernesque, biod, bipennis, broché, catabasis, chotei, chous, cluddyo; and an abundance (almost, it is to be hoped, exhaustive) of scientific terms coined—often against all analogy—from Latin or Greek, or both. If such abominations as afebrile, asexual, are to be recorded, they ought to be labelled infandum.

The 'Century' managers have exercised a wise discretion in rejecting many ephemeral modern coinages, such as abusee, agitatrix, ailanthery, albumness, and also rare words of earlier date, such as abashedness, abstidential, adiaphoral, edittuate, agglutinize, antegredient, cabana, chueless, cloisterless, cloddiness; so that they may have found and passed over some of the following waifs, which seem hitherto to have escaped word-collectors: ale-bencher, amatrix, amildary, anaptycic, anicular, antesignane, antispase, antistatistical, antistoechon, appalliate, apostemous, apostlelike, allegate ("cited"), alligation ("something tied on"), appose ("repose"), arbolets (Notes and Queries, July 14th, 1888, p. 38), arboriferous, arch-presbytership, arganic, asponsage, assassinial, asyncretically, attenuating (verbal substantive), augurifical, averruncan, basage, beaver-maker, bedizener, bladdering (verbal substantive), blockhouse ("shambles"), bloody-hearted, bloistering, bombast ("to beat"), budgerigar, carriade, club-nail, comprime, concubinator, confector, configurator. This list is chiefly interesting as an illustration of the vast number of rare words which still lurk uncatalogued in the innumerable recesses of English literature, notwithstanding all the immense and most praiseworthy efforts of modern lexicography.

The important department of definition and classification of different uses and senses leaves little to be desired, the treatment of technical and scientific terms being surprisingly full and clear, while in many cases—e.g., adze, anta, anticlinal, calico-printing—the explanation is materially assisted by the remarkably clear cuts. Two technical uses of aerator and amortizement not recorded in other dictionaries are defined, and one of them is illustrated in each case. The articles on amæba, anatropous, anchor, antenna, blattida, bridge, chlorophyl, column, may be cited as specimens of fulness and useful pictorial illustration; that on action is one of the longest and best, and exemplifies the discussion of synonyms, for which see also adore, afflict, cherish. The article on angle is one of many which have especially impressed us. The botanical use of antenna, and the use of annulus in solid geometry—both duly given in the 'New English Dictionary'—are omitted. As an error on the side of excess must be reckoned the inclusion of the crazy title adenochirapsology, which might perhaps be defended on the ground that it contains fourteen different letters of the alphabet.

The few slight blemishes which have been pointed out are by no means palmary; indeed, the work, notwithstanding incalculable variety and difficulty, is singularly free from error of any kind. The typography is thoroughly satisfactory, and the general appearance of the volume is handsome and attractive. The selection of the subjects for the pictorial illustrations cannot be too highly praised. Many of the choicest works of art to be found in Europe have been reproduced in a style worthy of their excellence, and their introduction to the public through the medium of a popular dictionary ought to have an appreciable effect in elevating national taste both in England and America. The cuts appended to the zoological articles are first-rate, and the birds, monkeys, and snakes prove as attractive to the child as to the savant; while the numerous entomological illustrations, portraying insects in various stages, ought to be of practical use to farmers and gardeners.

To judge from the volume before us, this great work will be characterized throughout, and in every respect, by a lavish expenditure of labour and capital, of rare ability and technical skill, all turned to the best advantage by careful and capable attention to the uniform realization of a thoroughly judicious plan.

A New Pilgrimage, and other Poems. By Wilfrid Scawen Blunt. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

WHY should a writer publishing a book of poems weight them with a preface about his system of constructing them? Sometimes there may be good reason for a preliminary account of the historic events, the customs or the legends on which a plot is based, or for an avowal of fiction added to fact, of inexact chronology, or of some other manipulation which might puzzle the reader acquainted with the true data or mislead the reader unacquainted with them. And if a writer has obscured his poetry with mysterious symbolism and revealings of new patterns of things in heaven, or merely by perplexities of method and expression, we can understand his resorting to a preface to teach the interpretation of his dark sayings. But why should a writer who finds the orthodox sonnet form too difficult for him, and who therefore adopts a modified form, feel a call to put forth an introductory treatise on his metrical system? Mr. Blunt's prosody needs no elucidation; he who reads as he runs can see that the sonnets are not on the Petrarchan model, and can see that their author has taken, instead of the octave of Petrarch and all the most renowned sonnet-writers, Italian, French, and English, another Italian form, less highly sanctioned, in which the octave falls into two sections of alternate rhymes, yet keeps the law that there shall for the eight lines be but two rhymes—that he is not always able to adhere to this his chosen form and rhyme the two sections alike, but has sometimes to admit a third rhyme—that his octave eschews the orthodox octave's characteristic completion of meaning, and runs on unchecked into those six lines which if we were speaking of the Petrarchan sonnet we should call the responsive sestet—and that instead of the sestet he employs a quatrain and a concluding couplet. There is no novelty in all this; none of Mr. Blunt's deviations from the perfect form of the sonnet is without precedents—some of them even have very good precedents—and there is nothing recondite in his manner of combining them in his scheme of construction. He has nothing to reveal; and, as for defence, a poem must be its own defence. If it is beautiful and its form fits it well, its author has no need to argue about the model he has, or has not, chosen for it; it will be allowed to be its own model. And, indeed, why should not any writer, whether he has precedent for it or no, use that technical form in which he finds he can express himself best? Certainly, whatever system of versification he accepts, he should compel himself to obey its laws with entire fidelity, no matter what painstaking the obedience may sometimes require—for if he will not be at the trouble to do this he is little better as a poet than he would be as a pianist if he left out the difficult passages of his piece of music or played them slowly out of time to make them easy—but no literary principle requires him to work upon his predecessors' patterns.

If, then, Mr. Wilfrid Blunt had published his 'New Pilgrimage' series as he did his previous series in the same form, without exordium, we should have seen no need for other comment on his not attempting to fulfil the strict conditions of the sonnet than perhaps a passing reference to that fact. But he has taken it into his head to set forth in what his sort of sonnet excels the Petrarchan sort, and to teach all English poets present or future how the sonnet should be written; and he thus forces our attention to that inability to achieve full command over rhyme and rhythm which, unless he overcomes it, must perforce keep him among the awkward squad of the great regiment of modern sonnet-writers, and to his defective acquaintance with sonnet literature. It appears from the preface that Mr. Blunt thinks a sonnet according to the recognized laws is terribly difficult—well-nigh impossibly difficult—because of the rhymes. That is the reason, he instructs his readers, that Lord Tennyson, Mr. Browning, Mr. William Morris, Mr. Longfellow, and Mr. Lowell have not been sonnet-writers, and Lord Lytton and Mr. Alfred Austin have only given us a few good ones, and Mr. Matthew Arnold "has left us a bare half-dozen." Fancy the Laureate wistfully resigning the sonnet because blank verse, though less to his mind, was easier! Fancy Robert Browning pining for the Petrarchan symmetry and restraint, but afraid he could never do with only one rhyme for four lines! And, to say nothing of poets of an inferior order jumbled into the list, fancy the author of the Bigelow papers giving up anxious efforts as a sonneteer because words would not rhyme in as he wanted! But Mr. Blunt is in earnest. And he goes on to complain gravely that "our critics, like the Scribes and Pharisees of the New Testament, are placing on our shoulders a burden heavier than we English poets can bear"—the critics, it appears, insisting on the "mint and cummin of certain rhymes and endings," or, to take a previous phrase, on "the trammels of convention." It does not seem to enter his mind that sonnet is only the name for a particular form of verse, and that the mint and cummin and trammels are what constitute that form. Unconscious of what would seem to most people the obvious truism that a sonnet is a sonnet and not some other, perhaps preferable, verse, he proceeds to offer for the relief of English poets two forms of his own invention (or at least he thinks so) in which the sonnet shall henceforth be their customary mode of expression—and one of them is of sixteen lines. Now, however easier to write Mr. Blunt's sixteen-line stanza may be than Petrarch's fourteen-line one, and however valuable a model for the poets of this age, it is not a sonnet; because the primary definition of a sonnet is that it is a rhymed poem in fourteen lines. This is only a matter of nomenclature; but then nomenclature is not without importance in our human attempts to understand each other by words, and although "let him name it who can, its beauty would be the same," it is necessary for convenience that we should refrain from confusing speech by giving one thing the name of another because we consider it as good or better. Lord Tennyson puts forth his beautiful thirteen-line stanza in 'The Progress of Spring'—a stanza with a grace and rounded completeness that emulate those qualities of the sonnet—but he does not bid us call it sonnet.

Of Mr. Blunt's more normal sonnet we have already said that its construction does not present the features of independent invention with which he credits it. It was not possible that any reasonable combination for the sonnet should have been left untried till now, and this may be the only reason why Mr. Blunt is not the first inventor of his variations, but it is within possibility that he may have met with examples of them in the range of his reading. What is most probable is that he has met with such, but has not given heed to them, and so has not consciously remembered them. This oversight would be only natural in one who has so little perceived how sonnets have been written that he groups, as the English poets who have used the strict Petrarchan model, Milton, Wordsworth, Mrs. Browning, and Rossetti. One careless reading of but a few sonnets of each of these writers ought to have made him aware that his statement is true of Rossetti alone—that Milton, the most Petrarchan of the other three, frequently disregards the law which makes separate sections of octave and sestet, and welds the two—that Mrs. Browning's method absolutely requires their welding and also the use of frequent cæsuras which introduce a kind of staccato vigour, as of Elizabethan blank verse, in place of the regular lyric cadences of the Petrarchan sonnet—and that Wordsworth welds octave with sestet, uses blank-verse cæsuras, and arranges the octave rhymes at his pleasure as alternate or with inversions equally foreign to the orthodox sonnet. And even stranger than the want of perception which has allowed such a mistake as to three of our greatest English sonnet-writers is that betrayed by Mr. Blunt's remarks on the Petrarchan sestet—which he actually believes to permit only one arrangement, that of three rhymes thus, A B C, A B C. He had but to take the first dozen sonnets in his Petrarch, and, if the edition were one with the miscellaneous sonnets postponed, he would have found but four with this form of sestet; if the edition were one with the Laura sonnets and the miscellaneous sonnets intermingled, then six; while among the others of the dozen are several different arrangements, including one with that joy of Mr. Blunt's heart, the couplet, which he seems to think unknown to Petrarch, and which indeed Petrarch uses so rarely that he has, we believe, only two other instances of it. So little is the A B C, A B C sestet exclusively prescribed for the Petrarchan sonnet, as Mr. Blunt declares in his treatise, that it is not even the most frequent of the various sequences used by Petrarch. After this it may be thought quite in the order of things that Mr. Blunt's prescriptions for sonnet-writing are contradicted by most of his own sonnets, and that not merely in their versification (as to which he pleads the necessity for laxity because of the dearth of rhymes), but in the ways in which they are presented and developed. Decidedly the poets who become pupils of Mr. Blunt will have on many points to choose between their teacher's practice and his preachings.

If, unwarned by those preachings, we might judge of the practice as in the case of any other writer of sonnets, we should recognize great merits of thought and expression, together with those blemishes with which Mr. Blunt's readers are familiar—the faulty rhymes, betokening apparently not only a defective ear, but some peculiarities of pronunciation—the effort, often too obvious as well as insufficient, which drags in thoughts and images not for their own sake, but to meet the needs of versification—the occasional sins against good taste. As a whole we do not find the sonnet series 'A New Pilgrimage' of the interest of the 'In Vinculis' series; their connexion is too slight, and too guide-book like, and the Pilgrim, as such, is something of a Betsy Harris; but several of the poems have real value. Here is a good specimen:—

How strangely now I come, a man of sorrow,
Nor yet such sorrow as youth dreamed of, blind—
But life's last indignity which dares not borrow
One garment more of Hope to cheat life's wind,
The mountains which we loved have grown unkind,

Nay, voiceless rather. Neither sound nor speech
Is heard among them, nor the thought enshrined
Of any deity man's tears may reach.

If I should speak, what echo would there come,
Of laughter lost, and dead unanswered prayers?
The shadow of each valley is a tomb

Filled with the dust of manifold despair.
"Here we once lived."—This motto on the door
Of silence stands, shut fast for evermore.

'The Idler's Calendar,' in sixteen-line stanzas, one for each month of the year, is of higher order: one might call these poems vers de société but that their style is somewhat ponderous—too ponderous for the themes. Some poems meant to introduce asonante verse to English readers are spirited; but fail much in the assonance. Although the niceties of Spanish assonance are not attainable in our language, assonance can satisfy English ears—witness its frequent use, in mistake for rhyme, in attempts at verse by illiterate persons, and its familiarity in popular and nursery rhymes: e.g.,

Little Tom Tucker
Sings for his supper;

but Mr. Blunt's assonance very rarely appeals to the ear at all; it is mainly a matter of spelling recognized by the eye, and the semblance of assonance would vanish if the poems were written down phonetically.

On the whole Mr. Wilfrid Blunt would be wise to desist from reforming English poetry and content himself with trying to write his best. We believe he has enough poetic ability to make the labour worth while.

The Fables of Æsop, as first printed by William Caxton in 1484, with those of Avian, Alfonso, and Poggio. Now again edited and induced by Joseph Jacobs. 2 vols. (Nutt.)

THE learned and ingenious essay on 'The History of Æsopic Fable,' which occupies the first of these two volumes, deserves a cordial welcome from students of comparative folk-lore. It would have been better, however, if Mr. Jacobs had confined himself to this portion of the work, and had delegated the editing of Caxton's text and the preparation of the glossary to some more specially qualified hand. It is, no doubt, a much less difficult matter to transcribe a Caxton than to edit a MS. of the same period; but even this easier task can scarcely be satisfactorily performed without a greater degree of familiarity with fifteenth century English than Mr. Jacobs possesses. Although the glossary is extremely scanty, it contains an unusual number of serious mistakes. Aguyse does not mean "adorn," but is the Old French aguise (now aiguise), to sharpen; Spenser's aguise (from guise) is an entirely different word. The well-known word bouked, steeped in lye, is rendered "boiled." Lyuehode, explained as "inheritance," is an error for lyuelode, means of living. Caxton has the correct form in both the passages referred to, though in one of them Mr. Jacobs prints lyuehode twice over. Pyelarge is not "magpie," but an adaptation of pelargus, πελαργός, stork. Caxton, however, did not understand the pelarge of his French original, but in a table of contents, not reprinted by Mr. Jacobs, interpreted it as pie large, broad-footed. The verb myster, to need (derived from the adjective myster, necessary), is rendered "miss." Spæhawk, an obvious misprint for eparhawk, appears in the glossary with the strange rendering "deerhawk." The list of errata includes several words which the editor supposes to be misprints in Caxton's own text. Some of these really are such; but beaulte, lasse (less), none (moon), sacryfyed, and sechyng (seeking) are perfectly good fifteenth century forms, and the imagined corrections are alterations for the worse. There is no reason to suppose that Mr. Jacobs's text is seriously inaccurate, but it is evidently not to be regarded with implicit confidence.

Of the introductory essay we have little to say but in praise. Mr. Jacobs's style, indeed, would be the better for a certain amount of chastening; but at all events it is never dull. The fruits of modern French and German investigations into the history of the Æsopic fable are for the first time brought together; and the author has added not a few highly interesting and valuable discoveries of his own. It is lucidly shown that the greater portion of what in Western Europe has passed for "Æsop" is derived from prose versions of the fables of Phædrus, whose collection existed in the tenth and preceding centuries in a form considerably more complete than that in which it appears in modern editions; and it is argued with great plausibility that the immediate source from which Phædrus derived his material was an enlarged edition of the lost work of Demetrius Phalereus, Διόνυσος Φαλαρέου Συναγώγαι. One ingenious argument in favour of this conclusion is due to Mr. Jacobs himself. Phædrus, he points out, includes among his fables an anecdote relating to Demetrius, which has no appropriateness where it stands, but the insertion of which may be accounted for by the supposition that the Latin fabulist found it among the editorial additions to the work which he translated. The non-Phædrine portion of the modern Æsop descends chiefly from Avianus and from the mediæval Greek prose Æsop; and the former, and the greater portion of the latter, are to be traced back through Babrius to the lost 'Decamythia' of Nicostratus, a collection which brought together the "Æsopic" fables of Demetrius and the so-called "Libyan" fables ascribed to a certain Cybisius or Cibysses.

With reference to the last-mentioned name Mr. Jacobs offers a plausible conjecture which, if it be sound, will throw important light on the nature of the connexion between Greek and the Talmudic fable. The Jewish writers mention two kinds of fables as having been studied by their ancient sages, the 'Mishlé Shû'âlim' and the 'Mishlé Kôbsim.' The former of these names means "fables of foxes"; the latter, taking it as it stands, can have no other sense than "fables of the washermen." Mr. Jacobs, however, proposes to change the enigmatical כובסים (kôbsim) into כובסים (kûbsim), thus obtaining, by a scarcely perceptible alteration in a single letter, what would be a perfectly normal transliteration of the Greek Κυβισίος. If this suggestion be admitted, it becomes probable that the 'Mishlé Shû'âlim' and the 'Mishlé Kûbsim' of Jewish tradition correspond respectively to the Æsopic and the Libyan fables of Greek writers in the early centuries of the Christian era.

Although Æsop is mentioned in connexion with fables by Herodotus, Aristophanes, and Aristotle, there is no evidence that he was the author of any collection of fables. From the passage in which he is referred to by Aristotle, Mr. Jacobs conjectures that the association of his name with this form of composition may have arisen from his having employed it on a famous occasion as a method of political argument. That he was not the originator of the beast-fable in Greece is, of course, certain, since it is already found in Hesiod. But it is necessary to consider the question whether in Greece it was a native product or a foreign importation; or rather—since the fable in itself may well have originated independently in many different places—whether there is evidence of the borrowing of any specific fables from any foreign source. The resemblance between certain fables in Indian literature and certain of the Greek fables is altogether too close to be ascribed to mere coincidence. There must have been borrowing on the one side or the other; and although the classical Sanskrit literature is known to have derived something from Greece, the parallels which the Buddhist Jātakas show with Western fable do not admit of being thus explained. Mr. Jacobs has instituted a detailed comparison between the Greek fables and those Indian fables which, on chronological grounds, may with confidence be regarded as native. His general conclusion is that of the properly Æsopic fables a small proportion show marks of derivation from India, the rest, for all that is known, being possibly of native Greek invention. On the other hand, he endeavours to show that the original stock of "Libyan" fables was reinforced, shortly after the Christian era, by a Buddhistic importation from Ceylon. This is highly conjectural, but not intrinsically unlikely, and the arguments by which it is supported are worth consideration. It is difficult, however, to follow Mr. Jacobs in his assumption that the term "Libyan" in its earlier application to fables had the sense of "Indian," or in his audacious identification of Cybisius with Kāsyapa, the legendary Æsop of Buddhist India.

The chapter on "Æsop in England" contains one brilliant and, so far as we can see, highly reasonable conjecture. It has been proved that the Æsopic fables of Marie de France, which she professed to translate from the English of "King Alfred," were really obtained from a Middle English source. Mr. Jacobs proposes to substitute for the name of King Alfred that of the "Alfred the Englishman" who is mentioned by Roger Bacon as a translator of Arabic books. That this Alfred may have translated, amongst other things, the Arabic version of Æsop is likely enough; and, although he probably wrote in Latin, his book may afterwards have been rendered into his native tongue. Mr. Jacobs, taking a hint from Roger Bacon's statement that Michael Scot was assisted in his translations from the Arabic by a Jew, ingeniously conjectures that Alfred also had his "Jewish dragoman," and that this was no other than Berachyah ha Nakdan ("Benedictus le Puncteur"), the author of a Hebrew collection of fables bearing a close affinity to those of Marie. The arguments by which Mr. Jacobs seeks to prove that Berachyah and Alfred were contemporaries must be left to the judgment of experts in the chronology of Rabbinical literature; but it is difficult to believe that they will be refuted. There is a curious slip in one of the foot-notes to this chapter (the Old French hus=huis, door, being identified with the English house!), which, like some of the explanations already cited from the glossary, shows that in matters philological Mr. Jacobs is too prone to trust to guessing instead of making proper inquiry.

We have by no means touched upon all the noteworthy points in this singularly able essay, which ought to be read by all, whether learned or unlearned, who are interested in its subject. Those students who desire to pursue on their own account the investigation of the mutual relations of the various forms of the Æsopic fables and their analogues will find valuable aid in the laboriously compiled 'Synopsis of Parallels,' which, though consisting merely of references, occupies forty pages of small type.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- Part of the Property.* By Beatrice Whitby. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)
Among Aliens. By Frances Eleanor Trollope. 2 vols. (Spencer Blackett.)
Grandison Mather. By Sidney Luska (Henry Harland). (Cassell & Co.)

We are afraid Miss Whitby will prove a disappointing writer. Her first novel, 'The Awakening of Mary Fenwick,' gave great hopes of future achievements which 'Part of the Property' does little or nothing to justify. The main idea of her former story—that of a woman who begins by disliking the man she ultimately falls in love with—is repeated. But with this we should not quarrel much were it not that there is a complete absence of the lifelike character drawing which attracted us before. There is one bright moment in the book—when the heroine engages herself to two men in the course of the same evening—but with this exception the story fails in both incident and interest. We begin to fear, in spite of some pleasant touches here and there, that Miss Whitby lacks the saving grace of humour. But it may be that the tale was written, as certainly the proofs were corrected, in a hurry. Such slips as “precious” for precious and “obvious” for oblivious are much too frequent.

Given such time-honoured ingredients as those which go towards the making of Mrs. Trollope's new story, it would be difficult indeed to produce any very original result. The experiences of a pretty young English governess, belonging to the weakly amiable order of heroines, whose lot casts her into the hands of the usual noble Roman family with patrician prejudices and inadequate material resources, scarcely possess the excitement of novelty. The haughty and ambitious Princess Bastiani-Corleoni, her unusually unprincipled son, together with the priests full of orthodox priestly guile and subtlety, and the inevitable brigand, are almost as familiar to the untravelling English reader as are Roman churches, streets, peasants, ejaculations, and all the other properties, including the scenery of the Italian landscape. These items are, however, none the less attractive for being old friends, and, indeed, Mrs. Trollope has succeeded in investing them with a freshness which is quite surprising. Catherine Wilson, the elder sister, of robust character and considerable determination, adds greatly to the merit of the story in her telling of it. She is by far the most successful and least conventional character in the book, and her simple personality sheds a pleasant atmosphere of wholesomeness and reality over all its situations, even the most well-worn. Her model, the fiery Monica, is also a good sketch. Under Catherine's firm and rational guidance the melodramatic gradually becomes simple and pathetic, the crooked straight, while the helpless and consumptive Lucy is preserved from any worse calamity than an early death from natural causes, and an unobtrusive change of creed—a change that affords great satisfaction to herself, and little inconvenience, after all, to her friends. Catherine's own well-deserved happiness will give satisfaction to her well-wishers, as indeed her plain unvarnished tale may probably do to plenty of readers.

‘Grandison Mather’ is a clever and lively novel by an author who deserves to be better known in England. It is interesting to the world of novel-readers, so many of whom are also novel-writers, because it recounts the adventures of a novelist. The conclusion is highly ingenious. Having made a success with a short story, the author has contracted to finish a more elaborate work by a fixed day, but while the last chapter remains to be written he falls ill and becomes delirious. He wakes up to find that his book is published and is being reviewed enthusiastically, special praise being given to the last chapter. No more shall be said than that, of course, a novel is always the pleasanter for a charming heroine.

ANTIQUARIAN LITERATURE.

The Registers of Wadham College.—Part I. 1613-1719. By R. B. Gardiner. (Bell.)—There has of late years been a marked development of interest in school and college registers. Though varying considerably in the extent and value of the information they contain, there are few of which the appearance in print would not be welcomed by genealogists and biographical students. It is only, however, when support is forthcoming and an editor found who will approach the task as a labour of love that it can be undertaken with any success. It is to be hoped that others may be found, like Mr. Gardiner, to follow in the footsteps of Dr. Bloxam and Mr. Boase, and to take in hand the registers of colleges, tracing, so far as possible, the careers of their distinguished members. We entirely approve of the method Mr. Gardiner has adopted, namely, that of including all the names he could collect, “whether from university or college records, whether as matriculating, graduating, residing, or paying caution.” No other system would prove satisfactory in practice, even though it must of necessity include some who belonged to other colleges rather than to Wadham. Mr. Gardiner explains at some length the records, university and collegiate, on which his lists are based, but it may briefly be stated that, by combination, he has extracted from them all the information they contain. One is struck by the singularly capricious orthography adopted by the various scribes and by the necessity of collating records to secure the true form of a name. Glanville appears as “Glandfield,” Grave as “Gray,” Blackstone as “Blaxton,” Lechmere as “Leachmere” or “Leashmere,” Leigh as “Lye,” Knightbridge as “Knitbrich,” and so forth, while “Chensford” (p. 150), we suspect, represents the local pronunciation of Chelmsford. Although the benefits of the foundation were primarily intended for the counties of Essex and Somerset—those to which the foundress and her husband respectively belonged—the college has been chiefly connected with the West Country. Essex, however, contributed the well-known Sir John Bramston. This may have been largely owing to the fact that none of the wardens within the period comprised in this volume was an Essex man, while they mostly came from Somerset or Dorset. From the West came Monks and Drakes, Pitts and Bampfilds, Blakes (including the famous “General at sea”), Carews, Windhams, and other well-known names. Two men of singularly different character—Christopher Wren and John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester—entered the college as fellow commoners between the death of Charles I. and the accession of Charles II. By the way, Lord Rochester's caution-money is stated to have been paid “1 March, 1659.” Should not the “1659” in this and the preceding entry be 1660 (i. e., 1659/60)? Such entries might mislead as to the actual date of admission to the college. The mention of Lord Rochester reminds us that the Hon. William Greville, admitted 1711, was, we believe, his grandson, in which case Hearne's description of him as “a young, debauched, rakish man,” presents a curious instance of atavism. In an appendix on the Chamber Books the author reproduces a quaint numbered plan of the college in 1653-4, and gives the old names of the various chambers with some of the rents received for them. Among other miscellaneous information we may note the entries relating to early gifts of plate and its sacrifice in the Civil War, together with the notes on the portraits of its past worthies belonging to the college. Mr. Gardiner has made good use of the materials available for identifying his men and annotating their names, but he might have referred in his preface to Wood's invaluable collections, to which all writers on Oxford men are so deeply indebted.

MR. RYE's account of all that can be collected concerning the Norfolk nunnery of Carrow makes a most delicious volume (Norwich, Goose), and has been put together with great industry and care. Printed at the expense of Mr. J. J. Colman, M.P., who is now the owner of the old site, and of all that remains on it of this interesting religious house, the book has been got up regardless of expense and with excellent taste. The reproductions of the drawings of stained-glass windows, which Norris made more than a century ago, are excellent; the originals are the property of Mr. Rye, who acquired them when he bought the Norris MSS. a few years ago. The ground plan of the ruins is carefully executed, and Mr. Rye's attempt at a history of the house may be accepted as based upon all the known sources of information now at our command. It is not unlikely that the publication of this beautiful book may sooner or later lead to the discovery of many of those rolls, rentals, and registers which certainly were in existence at the beginning of the last century, and which are probably hidden away in some public or private collections, though their whereabouts is at present unknown. In the meanwhile the favoured few have here for their delectation and instruction a valuable book, and one satisfactory as far as it goes—a book with which we have only one fault to find: the index of names at the end takes no account of Christian names, and therefore gives the reader who wishes to use it quite needless trouble. In a volume which perhaps more people will wish to use and consult than to read—for it is strong meat—an imperfect or inefficient index is a serious blemish.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

It is a curious fact that one of the highest authorities in England on the art of war should be a “civilian” in the eyes of soldiers; but so it is. Mr. Spenser Wilkinson, of Manchester, the creator of the Manchester Tactical Society, already well known by his ‘Citizen Soldiers’ and his translations from the German, publishes through Messrs. Macmillan, under the title of The Brain of an Army, a popular account of the German general staff—the best manual that exists of the functions of a general staff. The appearance of the book is most opportune, at a moment when rumour has it that a new commander-in-chief is about to be appointed in the United Kingdom with a general staff behind him. It is to be hoped that Mr. Spenser Wilkinson may continue to turn his attention to a field of literature in which Great Britain is altogether behind most other countries, and in which our author occupies a high place.

To write stories in dialect is a very difficult piece of work, and to introduce them as incidental studies is even harder. The writer must have an intimate knowledge not only of the particular locality with which he deals, but also of many others, because he must have the means of judging whether the dialectal peculiarities he observes are local or general. It is a common fault of glossaries of county dialect to include numbers of words which are not peculiar; but the mistake is harmless, because it helps to show the opposite of what the compiler means to show, namely, that words thought to be local are in use over a much wider area. Mr. S. S. Buckman has not aimed at precision in this respect, but has attempted in John Darke's Sojourn in the Cotteswolds and Elsewhere (Chapman & Hall) to preserve some record of the dialect of the districts he writes of and its quaintness of expression. He has not succeeded in throwing his experiences into a particularly attractive shape. His stories want point; the topics are too commonplace. He has the gift of picking up the dialect, but not that of selecting with precision the aspects of life and character which are peculiar. He has not succeeded in doing for the Cotswolds what Mr. Barnes and Mr. Hardy have done for Dorset.

three-volume novels in rapid succession, and to amuse himself by writing short stories and articles. Seafaring life, of course, is always the subject, and it must be said that his invention is as illimitable and as varying as the ocean itself. The volume called The Romance of Jenny Harlowe (Chatto & Windus) is certainly not inferior to others of Mr. Russell's collected stories. He continues to write with that zest which has carried his readers through so many of his books and has riveted the attention even of those who hardly know port from starboard. The title story is justly put first; but the papers on various characteristics of sailors and nautical life are of more value. 'Jack according to Landmen' is an interesting piece of criticism from one who is able to speak with the highest authority.

MR. GEORGE BYNG GATTIE'S Memorials of the Goodwin Sands and their Surroundings, Legendary and Historical (Allen & Co.), is a painful instance of vaulting ambition overleaping itself. The author does know something about the Goodwin Sands, and describes, in an intelligent and interesting manner, certain of the tragic events of which they have been the scene, as well as some of the proposals to reclaim them, or of the attempts to lessen their danger by means of beacons and lighthouses. Unfortunately Mr. Gattie seems persuaded that his main strength is long-past history, and of that he is extremely ignorant. In no examination papers which it has been his evil fate to sit in judgment on has any examiner met with more monstrous "howlers" than crowd these pages. One specimen will suffice. Against the Invincible Armada, we are told,

"the Cinque Ports fitted out six very large ships.The commander of one of those vessels was a native of Deal, and being himself thoroughly acquainted with the numerous shoals and banks of the neighbouring waters, contrived to decoy one of the great Spanish galleasses on to one of the dangerous ridges of the Goodwin Sands, where she soon fell an easy prey to the well-directed fire of the Deal captain, by whom she was ultimately taken and burnt, and all her officers and crew either killed, drowned, or made prisoners."

In the whole passage, it may be pointed out, there is not one statement which is not entirely false, unless, perhaps, in a modified form, that one of the vessels in the English fleet was commanded by a native of Deal. If Mr. Gattie's book runs to a second edition—and there is much in it that makes us sincerely hope it may—he will do well to excise or get some friend to rewrite all that he now considers history. The volume may then have a distinct value.

Beneath Two Flags, by Maud B. Booth (Funk & Wagnalls), is not an imitation of Ouida's novel, but an account of the work of the Salvation Army.

We have received from MM. Hachette & Co. the second volume of La France et ses Colonies, by M. Onésime Reclus, containing Nos Colonies, illustrated by a great number of excellent plates and maps. One of the maps possesses a somewhat melancholy interest for us, namely that of Senegal, showing how the French have completely lapped round our colonies of the Gambia and Sierra Leone, and reached the frontiers of Ashanti and Dahomey, as well as Timbuctoo, passing through a district which lay more open to Sierra Leone than to St. Louis. When we talk about English colonial enterprise and French neglect of colonies we ought to remember this startling exception to the rule. M. Reclus follows most other French writers in attacking England with regard to Madagascar, and in ignoring the circumstances which led to the deceit practised on the Hova Government in the alteration of the French treaty so as to give France a protectorate, followed first by the Patrimoine letter and then by its repudiation. It is a somewhat unfortunate fact, if the volume is intended to have an English sale, that Messrs. Hachette should have permitted M. Reclus to include in it unjust and untrue attacks on English policy and action at several different points.

MR. WALTER SCOTT deserves our thanks for adding a selection from Spence's Anecdotes to the "Camelot Series." The editor, Mr. Underhill, has done his work carefully; but he is too fond of supplying information which is familiar to everybody and omitting a note when it is really needed. Surely the reader of 'Spence's Anecdotes' might be assumed to know the main facts of Pope's life. In the same excellent series Mr. Scott has included the Utopia and The History of Edward V., by Sir Thomas More. An introduction by Mr. Maurice Adams is prefixed. A new edition of Mr. Rolleston's version of Epicurus appears in the same series; while the "Pocket Library" of Messrs. Routledge has been increased by pretty reprints of Rogers's Poems and Rogers's Italy.—The Marvellous Adventures of Master Tyll Oulglass, Mr. Kenneth Mackenzie's expurgated version of 'Tyll Eulenspiegel,' has been reprinted in the "Lotos Series" of Messrs. Paul, Trübner & Co.

A NUMBER of novels are lying on our table in new editions: Mrs. Ward's Robert Elsmere (Smith & Elder); The Cætreans of Sir H. Cunningham; Greifenstein, Marzio's Crucifix, Zoroaster, and A Tale of a Lonely Parish, four of Mr. Marion Crawford's popular novels; and Aunt Rachel, by Mr. Christie Murray, issued in tasteful single volumes by Messrs. Macmillan. The first volume of the new issue by the same firm of Mrs. Craik's novels begins with Olive, the excellent type of which deserves praise.

OF works of reference on our table The Windsor Peerage of Mr. Walford (Chatto & Windus) deserves the first place as a new-comer. Its convenient size and clear arrangement ought to make it a favourite. Mr. Walford has had much experience in editing peerages, and profits accordingly.—The Clergy Directory (Phillips) is one of the cheapest of works of reference, and suits the modest purse of the country parson in these days of agricultural depression. It has many substantial merits besides.—Lockwood's Builder's Price-Book, a work of established reputation, has reappeared in a new and enlarged edition, handsomely printed under the superintendence of Mr. F. T. W. Millar.

COPYRIGHT IN CANADA.

February 25, 1890.

MAY I be allowed to correct some of the most glaring inaccuracies in Miss Duncan's letter in the Athenæum of the 22nd inst., to prevent British copyright owners being misled by them, and also avail myself of the opportunity to acquaint them with the real nature of the Act passed last year by the Canadian Legislature?

The Act of 1872 therein referred to was rejected because in the opinion of Lord Selborne and Lord Herschell it was ultra vires, and they held that the Dominion Legislature could only pass laws affecting its own provinces, and had not the power to repeal an Imperial Act. The legislation in England in 1875 sanctioning the Canadian Copyright Act of 1875, and also the International Copyright Act of 1886, sec. 8, strengthen this view, and there is no doubt whatever in my own mind that the Canadian Act of last year is also ultra vires.

The writer fairly states that this Act "very seriously affects the interests of the British author"—it should be British copyright owner. It certainly does so, for by sec. 1, subsec. 5, he would henceforth be obliged to register his work on publication in England at Ottawa, and reprint and republish in Canada within one month of that date, on pain of losing his copyright throughout the Dominion under the Imperial Act of 1842; nor may he, if he fails to do this, and a licensed edition is published in Canada, import at any time into Canada any copies of his own editions (see secs. 3, 5, and 6); nor has he power to keep the Canadian reprint from being imported into England to compete with his own editions in this country, for the licensed edition will be lawfully printed within the British dominions, and therefore may circulate in any part of them. True, he is to obtain, in exchange for these and other disadvantages, 10 per cent. on the retail price of the cheap Canadian edition, but the Canadian Government is not to be liable to account for any such royalty not actually collected.

By sec. 3, subsec. 2, the 10 per cent. is payable on the retail price of "each copy issued of the work." This is very different from Miss Duncan's statement that "10 per cent. is to be paid on the whole edition authorized to be printed." If this latter be the true interpretation of sec. 3, subsec. 2, of the Act, why is security necessary? I fear the author can only expect a royalty on the copies sold; but is it due on copies given away, and how is it to be assessed for a novel published in several numbers of a newspaper or periodical, or circulated gratis as a supplement to one?

Canada's "peculiar position" surely does not entitle her to take an author's work without his consent merely to improve the business of the Canadian printer, for it is to be noted that it does not much matter to the Canadian bookseller whether he sells American or Canadian editions. Surely this must be, as the writer remarks, "a high-handed and unwarrantable interference with the sacred rights of authorship," and, as the writer adds, "its benefit to the Canadian public will not be so marked." If "enormous American editions flood the Canadian market," it must be worth the Canadian publishers' while to make arrangements with the author. This, indeed, is already done by Mr. Bryce, of Toronto, and Messrs. Lovell, of Montreal, in several cases—at least forty or fifty within my own observation.

The writer grimly says: "True, the conscientious Canadian Government has for many years collected the author's tax at the frontier, and forwarded it, properly proportioned, to the defrauded copyright holders in Great Britain." I am sorry to have to say that this is incorrect. It is very imperfectly and spasmodically collected, and in many instances not so described as to enable the Imperial Government to send it to its proper destination.

I am extremely sorry to see the Canadian Government lend itself to such legislation. By the Imperial Copyright Act, 10 & 11 Vict. cap. 95, Canada was authorized to pass an act permitting it to import cheap foreign reprints for the use of its public on securing to British authors reasonable protection by imposing an ad valorem duty for their benefit. How has she carried out this Act? Practically she has disregarded it. In seventeen other colonies which acquired powers under this Act every copy is stamped on admission, and thus smuggling is prevented—not so in Canada; there it is too often ignored in spite of her earnest request to be allowed to pass it, and yet she comes forward and asks us now to trust her to carry out an impossible system of licensed editions. I earnestly hope no copyright owner will consent to part with control over his property, except by distinct written agreement with himself. As the writer says: "From a moral standpoint the Bill is excusable, but not defensible."

The real truth is Canada's proximity to the United States has given her an itching to follow their bad example. She obviously does not want cheaper literature for her people, because she imposes a 15 per cent. duty on all imported books, and, if she would honestly carry out her own undertaking and collect the author's 12½ per cent. royalty, she would quite efficiently stimulate and protect her own publishers. Even United States publishers make arrangements with authors for early sheets to enable them to be first in the field in issuing a new book, and why should the Canadian printer or publisher be too indolent to take the same trouble?

May I add that the tendency of every civilized country, possessing a literature or desiring to acquire one, is to give the author full control of his work, and to leave him to make his commercial arrangements in the way which he thinks best promotes his own interests? The law merely protects the rights of property, and the spirit of the recent Berne Convention is to make those rights as complete and uniform as possible. I do hope Canada will act towards authors in this spirit. If the Act of last year were to become law, Canada would thereby exclude herself from the Berne Convention, which she has already joined, deprive her own authors of their present rights in Great Britain and the colonies, become a by-word for literary plunder amongst civilized communities, and arouse a feeling in this country which would go far towards breaking that kindly sympathetic regard for her which we all desire to see extended and deepened.

'IN TENNYSON LAND.'

WE have received a long letter from Mr. Walters, the author of 'In Tennyson Land,' but we can only find room for a portion of it:—

"I should not ask to be allowed to make any public reply to the letter which the Hon. Hallam Tennyson has addressed to me in reference to 'In Tennyson Land,' had not your correspondent Z. offered some comments upon it which invite a rejoinder. It is very easy for Mr. Tennyson to assert that certain poems named have 'nothing of Lincolnshire about them.' I submit, with all respect, that Mr. Hallam Tennyson, who is only known to have paid one hasty visit to his father's home in his life, is no judge of this; while the poet himself can scarcely be accepted as a reliable critic of his own characteristics. I went as a stranger into the poet's land, and I have recorded nothing but actual impressions. Lincolnshire people, who may be expected to know something of the subject, confirm my conclusions.

"But lest this should appear inadequate, permit me to quote a few words from an article written seventeen years ago by the Rev. Drummond Rawnsley, who, I may say for the sake of those who are not 'matter-of-fact scholiasts,' was one of Lord Tennyson's most intimate personal friends and a poet of some repute. Even he was so 'irritatingly prosaic in his conception of poetry' that he wrote of 'Lincolnshire scenery and character as illustrated by Mr. Tennyson,' in which he said:—

"As a Lincolnshire man, and long familiar with the district in which Mr. Tennyson was born, I have often been struck with the many illustrations of our county's scenery and character to be found in his poems. What Wordsworth has done for the English Lakes and Scott for the Highlands our poet has done for the homelier scenes of his boyhood and early manhood in Mid-Lincolnshire. They live for us in his pages, depicted with all the truth and accuracy of a photograph."

"And what are the poems quoted by Mr. Rawnsley in support of this audacious statement? They are, inter alia, 'The Brook,' 'The Miller's Daughter,' 'The Palace of Art,' 'Locksley Hall,' 'The Lotus-Eaters,' 'The Northern Farmer,' 'The Dying Swan,' 'Mariana,' 'The May Queen,' and parts of 'The Princess.'"

THE SCOTCH EDUCATION CODE.

THE Scotch Education Department have submitted their revised code for 1890 to the two Houses of Parliament. It contains some very important alterations. The new articles 127-137 embody the rules prescribed for the distribution of the sum set aside by Parliament last year for the purpose of reducing school fees. Extensive changes are made in the schedules respecting specific and class subjects. From Schedule N (specific subjects) several subjects have been excluded. In practice it has been found that a long list of subjects encouraged superficial teaching and tended to induce teachers to undertake a variety of subjects, for all of which it is impossible that any one teacher should possess special capabilities. In place of this, managers are now permitted to submit a syllabus of any subject which they deem appropriate to their school and adapted to the teachers' capacity. In class subjects history and geography have been separated, and a wide option has been given in regard to elementary science. Perhaps the change which will most please the teachers is that with respect to the test of the efficiency of the scholars. This is in future to be mainly by class and not by individual examination. In the important circular of instructions to their inspectors the Scotch Department say that, looking to "the necessity of meeting a certain variety of educational aims, the time has come when efficiency need not in every case be tested by individual examination, and when the experiment of giving greater freedom of organization to the managers of schools may fairly be tried."

The individual test will generally be abandoned; but it will always be used by the inspector should he find it necessary as a safeguard against inefficiency. Consequently the grant on examination has been reduced to the limit necessary to cover the difference in the payment which may be made to a school according to the degree of its efficiency, and the fixed grant is proportionately increased.

These changes appear to be all good educationally, and their results will be watched with much interest.

LORD TENNYSON'S HEALTH.

As the somewhat conflicting reports of Lord Tennyson's health have caused universal anxiety, our readers will thank us for stating exactly what he has been suffering from, and what are now the hopes of his recovery. Though the weather in the Isle of Wight has been unusually cold, and fraught with danger even to the most robust people, Lord Tennyson has refused to yield to it—refused to give up his daily two hours' walk along the cliff. On Monday, the 17th ult., however, he was visited by a sharp attack of bronchitis with high fever. This went on till the 23rd, when (though the fever became moderated) rheumatic gout complications set in, accompanied by extreme debility. Sir Andrew Clark was urgently summoned by telegram, but he could not attend. Apparently the crisis was now passed. But it was not till the 25th (after Lord Tennyson had had the best night since his attack, with quiet sleeping for two hours at a time) that there was any real alleviation of the grave anxiety in which his family and friends had been plunged. We are happy to say that, up to the time of going to press, the reports of his medical attendant, Dr. Hollis, become more and more favourable. There is still coughing, but it is now almost without the fatigue which a few days ago was so alarming. Nourishment is taken voluntarily and in more solid form, the temperature is normal, and the pulse regular at seventy-two. In a word, the poet's complete recovery may be confidently hoped for.

Literary Gossip.

MR. GLADSTONE has now all but finished his articles on the Old Testament for Good Words. The first, on 'The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture,' will appear in the April number, and this will be followed by others on 'The Creation Story,' 'The Mosaic Legislation,' 'The Psalms,' 'The Method of the Old Testament,' &c.

THE Manuscript Department of the British Museum has recently acquired a large collection of the correspondence and papers of Jeremy Bentham and of other members of the family, including his brother Sir Samuel, who, after attaining the rank of a brigadier-general in the Russian service, became civil architect and engineer of the navy of his own country. The collection is contained in about twenty-eight volumes.

MESSES. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish immediately a one-volume story by the Marchioness of Carmarthen, entitled 'A Lover of the Beautiful.'

THE annual general meeting of the Incorporated Society of Authors was held at 4 P.M. on Thursday in Willis's Rooms.

THE third volume of Stevens's 'Facsimiles of Manuscripts in European Archives relating to America, 1773-83,' which will be issued presently, continues the subject of the secret intelligence which the British Government obtained through its political agents and spies concerning American affairs, and especially with reference to the negotiations at Paris in 1777 and 1778. Directions are given as to one method of carrying on correspondence, by putting a bottle in a hole at the root of a tree in the Tuileries Garden. The volume contains also accounts of the doings of the American Commissioners, of the employment by the British of the American Capt. Joseph Hynson, and of the capture of despatches to Congress of the American Commissioners. King George had, it seems, a "settled opinion" that the spies were encouraged by Deane and Franklin, and gave intelligence only to deceive.

THE four volumes of original State papers of Sir Ralph Sadleir, Ambassador to Scotland in the time of Elizabeth, which formed part of the Burton Constable Library sold last year, have been acquired by the British Museum. As is well known, these valuable historical documents were examined by Sir Walter Scott, and he prefaced the selection that was published from them in 1809 with a biographical memoir of Sadleir.

THE proceedings at the anniversary meeting of the Royal Historical Society on Thursday in last week are of some interest. Seventy fellows were elected, many of them belonging to the Royal Geographical Society, and their candidature is considered as a tribute of respect to Lord Aberdare, late president of the Geographical and now president of the Historical. This accession was also due to the receipt of the Royal Charter of Incorporation obtained by the president. The increase of funds places the Society in easier circumstances, and there is a disposition to proceed with the design, long in hand, of enabling the Society to afford scope for discussions of the political sciences, for which we have no provision in the metropolis.

A PENSION of 100*l.* a year from the Civil List has been assigned to Mrs. Hatch, widow of the Rev. Dr. Edwin Hatch, of Oxford, in recognition of her late husband's contributions to Biblical theology and ecclesiastical history.

UNDER the title of "English Leaders of Religion" Messrs. Methuen propose to commence in the autumn the publication of a series of short biographies of the most noted leaders of religious life and thought in this century and the last. Mr. R. H. Hutton will write on Cardinal Newman; Mr. H. C. G. Moule on Charles Simeon; Canon Overton on John Wesley; Col. F. Maurice on F. D. Maurice; and Mrs. Oliphant on Thomas Chalmers.

THE death of Mr. John Lovell, editor of the Liverpool Mercury, removes one of the best-known figures in provincial journalism. Mr. Lovell was a typical provincial journalist of the highest class. A man of really great natural abilities, remarkable attainments, though largely self-educated, distinct force of character, and considerable personal attraction, he was much looked up to by journalists throughout the country. He was the first manager, and in a sense the founder, of the Press Association, an organization which effected many changes in the methods of provincial journalism. When he retired from the management the Press Association had reached an income of something like 50,000*l.* a year. In 1880 he undertook the editorship of the Mercury in Liverpool, got some well-known journalists about him (among them Mr. Hall Caine), and soon lifted the paper to a position of power in the political life of Lancashire and North Wales. Mr. Lovell's personal tastes, however, were literary; he was a collector of valuable books, chiefly Shakspearean, and had one of the largest and most varied of private libraries in the north of England.

MR. JAMES CLEGG, of Rochdale, has in preparation a new edition of his 'Directory of Second-Hand Booksellers and List of British and Foreign Public Libraries.' It will contain a comprehensive list of the fictitious and real names of authors and book illustrators, a glossary of technical terms used amongst publishers and booksellers, notes on books, bindings, and autographs, &c. The volume will be published during the present year at as early a date as is practicable.

A BRANCH of the Institute of Journalists for Edinburgh and the district is in process of formation, and a similar course is being adopted by the journalists of Glasgow.

MR. ANDREW LANG has written an introduction to Lamb's 'Adventures of Ulysses,' of which Mr. Edward Arnold will shortly publish an edition for the use of reading circles and schools.

THE Swedish writer Dr. Arvid Ahnfelt, known personally to many English men and women of letters, died suddenly of an apoplectic stroke in an hotel at Copenhagen on the 17th of February, at the age of forty-five. He was the editor of the literary magazine Ur Dagens Krönika, and the author of a very large number of volumes, mainly historical and biographical. His principal compilation was a huge 'History of the Literature of the World.' Dr. Ahnfelt contributed for several years the account of Swedish literature which appears annually in the Athenæum.

At the last meeting of the Historical and Archaeological Society of Geneva M. Louis Dufour, the cantonal archivist, communicated some details concerning the family of the revolutionist Jean Paul Marat. Marat's father lived in Geneva until 1742, when he removed to Boudry, in Neuchâtel, and there his famous son was born in 1744. The elder Marat afterwards returned to Geneva. He had six children. One son was a watch-maker, and built a factory in Geneva. Another son became a teacher in the Imperial Lyceum at Tsarkoë-Selo in Russia. The surname occurs in four different forms in the civil registers of Geneva and Neuchâtel—Maza, Massa, Marat, and Mara. As the father came originally from Cagliari in Sardinia, M. Dufour is inclined to think that the last (Mara) is the proper form of the surname.

MESSRS. SONNENSCHNEIN & Co. are adding to their "Social Science Series" a volume entitled 'Prince Bismarck and State Socialism in Germany,' by Mr. W. H. Dawson, author of 'German Socialism and Ferdinand Lassalle.'

THE first number of a new weekly newspaper will appear in Leicester on Tuesday next, entitled Leicester Light. It will devote attention to literary, political, and social subjects, and will be under the editorship of the Rev. J. Page Hopps, a well-known Unitarian preacher. The price will be one penny.

A VOLUME entitled 'Manx Names: a Handbook of Place and Surnames in the Isle of Man,' by Mr. A. W. Moore, with an introduction by Prof. Rhys, is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock for early publication by subscription.

MESSRS. TRUSLOVE & SHIRLEY are going to bring out an illustrated volume, 'Norwood and Dulwich,' by Mr. Allan M. Galer.

THE German authorities are much troubled by the popularity of French school-books in Alsace. They have established a severe censorship, but they find that in new editions of the books they have licensed matter that appears to them treasonable is inserted, or "chauvinistic emblems" are introduced in the binding! So they propose to meet this terrible danger by prohibiting the use of any French books at all if the publishers do not so mend their ways that even a Prussian bureaucrat can detect nothing objectionable in their works. This measure will apply to all schools, private as well as public.

A CURIOSITY of periodical literature is the publication of a monthly magazine at Thorshavn, in the language of the Faroe Islands. The first number appeared on the 2nd of February. It promises to occupy itself with "patriotic," or probably local, politics, and with the encouragement of "modern Faroe literature," of which it is to be hoped that a demand may create a supply. The title of the new venture is Føringatíðende.

LAST year not fewer than 17,986 works were published in Germany, being an increase of nearly 1,000 over those issued in 1888. Books belonging to the educational department head the list with 2,083 publications. The lowest figure is that of masonic works, which numbered twenty-two only.

M. E. AMÉLINEAU proposes to publish all the documents in Coptic literature relating to the history of the Coptic Church, either in the original or, where that is missing or defective, in an Arabic translation. The work will be published in annual volumes of 600 pages each, resembling in shape the memoirs of the Mission Archéologique du Caire. The whole number of volumes will be about fifteen. Two are in type, and over five more are ready for the press. The subscription will be sixty francs a volume, and M. Leroux, the well-known publisher in the Rue Bonaparte at Paris, will receive subscriptions.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are Trade and Navigation Accounts for January (5d.); Education, Scotland, Instructions to Inspectors (1d.); Woman's Suffrage, Local Government Return (1d.); Universities, Scotland, Returns of Rules (2d.); Imperial Defence Act, Ports and Coaling Stations, Account, 1888-9 (2d.); and Jamaica, Sugar Estates, Returns (1d.).

Scientific Papers of Asa Gray. Selected by Charles Sprague Sargent. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

A LIST of the writings of the late Dr. Asa Gray from 1834 to 1888 lies before us. It occupies forty-two octavo pages of small type. Naturally this record consists for the most part of memoirs published in the transactions of various learned societies or in the pages of journals devoted to science. A large portion is occupied with the enumeration of critical reviews of publications in various departments of botany, and no inconsiderable space is taken up with obituary notices of botanists, together with critical remarks on their achievements. Some of this huge mass of material was of passing interest only, almost all is of historical value, and most of it is of permanent importance. Papers and reviews, however, by no means constituted all, or even the main substance, of Asa Gray's work. The separate volumes that he published on various subjects connected with descriptive and educational botany are numerous. No one who knew him, even by reputation only, would venture to doubt that the quality of his work bore due proportion to its quantity. It is not unnatural to wish that his labours had been more fully concentrated on his unfinished 'Flora of the North American Continent'; but such wishes are now vain, and we must be grateful, as indeed we have cause to be, for the rich legacy he has bequeathed to us.

To Prof. Sargent, the Director of the Arnold Arboretum at Cambridge, U.S., it has fallen to gather together a selection from the scientific papers of his late friend and colleague. That Prof. Sargent had a difficult and embarrassing task will be obvious from what has been already stated. The work of elimination must have been easier than that of selection. The extremely numerous purely descriptive papers and monographs are partially superseded by, or rather are incorporated in, more comprehensive works on descriptive botany. Those that have not yet experienced that fate are, of course, certain to do so as the preparation of North American floras proceeds. Similarly the text-books and the works devoted to the popularization of science may fitly be put on one side for the present purpose. There remains a large collection of memoirs on general botany and phyto-biology, and a similarly extensive mass of bibliographical and of biographical notices. It is from these two categories that Prof. Sargent has made his selection, and he has done it so well that the present volumes may almost be taken as mirrors reflecting the history and progress of scientific botany for the last half century. It is true that several essays which grew directly out of the discussions on the Darwinian theory are not included in Prof. Sargent's reprint, for the sufficient reason that they have already been issued separately. Moreover, the vast influence which the Darwinian theory exerted in natural science is obvious enough in every page of many of the essays here republished. The omission, therefore, of the essays previously collected under the head of Darwiniana does not seriously affect the value of the present volumes as historical records.

It is, of course, impossible for us to do more than refer to these memoirs. Their number, their variety, and the space at our disposal alike preclude us from doing more than indicate their general nature and tendency. The first volume is occupied with Dr. Gray's reviews of several of the principal or standard botanical works issued from 1836 to 1888, beginning with Lindley's 'Natural System of Botany' and ending with Ball's 'Flora of the Peruvian Andes.' Some fifty of the more important publications are thus reviewed, and of these we can only say that we wish there were more.

The second volume comprises a series of essays constituting probably the most valuable part of the whole work, containing as they do the quintessence of the author's knowledge and opinions and their application to the great problems of plant-geology and geographical distribution. These are followed by a series of biographical sketches of naturalists from Augustine Pyrame de Candolle in 1841 to Louis Agassiz in 1886. These are mostly drawn up with rare skill and due proportion, so that the reader obtains, if not a complete, at least a just and, so far as it goes, an accurate insight into the character and life-work of the individual. This remark, however, does not apply to all the botanists mentioned. The accounts given of some, such as of Wight and Welwitsch, are inadequate, and though they may have served their purpose under the circumstances of the time, they were hardly worth reprinting in their present shape.

We turn now to Asa Gray's own work in science. Apart from the mere descriptive details relating to the plants of the North American continent and to those collected in Japan and the South Sea islands by various American collectors, the great work of the eminent botanist of Harvard as here set forth would seem to consist in the attempt to harmonize and adapt the botanical science of the first half of the century to the evolutionary views of the second. Gray, as is amply proven, was pre-eminently the right man to do this. Vast in learning, keen in apprehension, eager in receptivity, courageous, catholic and impartial in judgment, his criticisms proved as valuable from a constructive as from a subversive point of view. It was not to be expected that Gray should himself do much in those departments of minute anatomy and embryology from which we hope in the future to derive so much assistance in understanding the peculiarities and mode of action of various structures, and in tracing the genealogies and estimating the degree of affinity between existing species. Morphology and physiology must henceforth be studied by means and methods which were not till quite recently at the disposal of naturalists. Gray's work, then, like that of Bentham, with whom he was nearly contemporaneous, marks the close of one great epoch of botanical science and the uprise of another under the powerful impulse of Mr. Darwin's publications and example. Interesting as this period in the history of botany is already to those who are passing or have passed through it, it will become more and more so as science progresses, and the students of the future will feel themselves under even stronger obligations to Prof. Sargent than do those of the present.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

MR. H. M. STANLEY has written an article for Scribner's Magazine dealing with his recent journey across Africa for the relief of Emin Pasha.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co. will publish immediately a volume entitled 'Among the Selkirk Glaciers,' being an account of a rough survey in the Rocky Mountain regions of British Columbia, by the Rev. W. S. Green, whose book on the High Alps of New Zealand was very well received a few years ago. Mr. Green read a preliminary paper on his work among the Selkirk glaciers before the Royal Geographical Society last year. In the volume now to be issued he has endeavoured to give as complete a picture as possible of the more striking phenomena of the region visited.

Die Insel Leukas, von Dr. J. Partsch, recently published as a supplement to Petermann's Mittheilungen, is a valuable monograph on one of the Ionian Islands. The author principally pays attention to physical geography, but also deals with historical reminiscences and the present condition of the island, the prosperity of which still mainly depends upon the production of currants and wine. There is an excellent map, based upon our own Admiralty survey, but improved by the author's own observations.

Ethnographische Beiträge zur Kenntnis des Karolinen Archipels, von J. S. Kubary (Leyden, P. W. M. Trap), is published by direction of the Ethnographical Museum of Berlin, and edited by Dr. J. D. E. Schmeltz, formerly Keeper of the Goddefroy Museum at Hamburg. The author has resided in the Carolinas almost uninterruptedly since 1868, and previous publications show him to be a careful observer and able expositor. In the first instalment of the present work he deals with "Currency" and "House-building" in the island of Yap, furnishes an account of the "Commerce and Industry of the Ruk Islanders," and describes an excursion to the Western Carolinas. The concluding section of this important work is to be published in June, and will deal in a comprehensive manner with the industries of the Pelew Islanders.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER has been preparing for the press a new edition of his well-known essays.

One of these, which originally appeared in the Westminster Review for July, 1858, is on the nebular hypothesis, and of this he has had a number of separate copies printed and distributed amongst astronomers, both English and foreign. It has been, of course, necessary to have the calculations and statements revised in accordance with the progress of astronomy during the last thirty years, and this work has been performed for the author by Mr. Lynn, formerly of the Greenwich Observatory. The general result of the revision has been to bring out even more strongly than before the views suggested by Mr. Spencer in reference to the nebular hypothesis, or theory as it is now more commonly called. In particular, when the value of the density of Mars found from recent investigations (which is unquestionably more correct than that formerly accepted, though there is still some doubt about the exact value) is taken into account, that planet should, to agree with these views, have satellites, as it has since 1877 been known to have; and the distribution of cometary orbits according to their inclinations to the plane of the ecliptic points, when the results of recent discoveries are included, much more strongly than before to the existence of some relation to the axis of nebular rotation, and therefore to some intimate connexion with the solar system of a different kind from that of the planets, of which the inclinations of the orbits show great conformity with the plane of nebular rotation.

Mr. Spencer holds strongly the theory as to the genesis of the small planets (which evidently form a distinct class) which was first suggested by Olbers when only two were known, viz., that they are the result of the explosion into fragments of a planet of considerable size, formerly revolving between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. On this point it may be interesting to refer to the remark of Prof. Young, who in his recently published 'Elements of Astronomy,' alluding to this theory, says: "If so, there must have been not one, but many explosions; first of the original body and then of the separate pieces, for it is demonstrable that no single explosion could account for the present tangle of orbits."

To the 'Essay on the Nebular Hypothesis' Mr. Spencer has appended a shorter one on the 'Constitution of the Sun,' originally contributed to the Reader for February 25th, 1865, which is reproduced here chiefly to give place for mention of a phenomenon recently observed by the author, which appeared to be very elucidatory of the views expressed in the essay respecting the origin of the solar spots.

The planet Venus is now becoming visible after sunset, and will continue to be an evening star throughout the spring and summer and early part of the autumn, reaching her greatest eastern elongation on the 24th of September. Mars is in the constellation Scorpio, and rises now about midnight; he will be nearly due north (between 5° and 6° distant from it) of his namesake Antares on the 19th and 20th inst. Jupiter is in Capricornus, and only to be seen in the early morning; but Saturn, being in Leo, is visible throughout the night. He will at the end of the month pass within a distance of less than 2° from Regulus, the brightest star in that constellation.

Mr. Peek reports that observations have been regularly carried on during the past year by himself and his assistant, Mr. C. Grover, at the Rousdon Observatory, Lyme Regis, attention having been chiefly devoted to the variable stars, the light-curves of a considerable number of which are being investigated.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Feb. 13.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. Roach Smith presented, through the President, a marble oval medallion portrait of himself, done by Fontana in 1857. The President, in announcing the gift, referred to the great services rendered to the study of archaeology by Mr. Smith, and mentioned that a subscription list had been opened to raise a fund for striking a bronze memorial medal bearing on one side Mr. Roach Smith's portrait, and on the other (as at present proposed) a list of his principal works. So far the appeal had been well supported, and it was hoped that after defraying the cost of the medal there would be a surplus which could be handed over to Mr. Roach Smith.—Mr. Nightingale exhibited forty-two examples of pierced and embossed silver ewar-tongs, ranging in date from 1750 to 1800, all of them done by hand.—Mr. C. J. Jackson read a paper on the spoon, its history, its form, material, and development, more particularly in England. In illustration of Mr. Jackson's paper Her Majesty was pleased to lend to the Society the Coronation Spoon, a most notable example of English goldsmith's work of the early part of the thirteenth century.—Fine series of other spoons, English and foreign, were exhibited by the President, the Mercers' Company, and Messrs. Franks, Fortnum, Stanforth, Jackson, Drane, Cripps, Alma Tadema, and other gentlemen.

Feb. 20.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Chancellor Ferguson communicated an account of the recent fire at Carlisle Castle, which fortunately did not destroy any ancient remains.—Mr. Budge read a paper on some Egyptian bronze weapons in the collections of Mr. J. Evans and the British Museum.—In illustration of Mr. Budge's paper the President exhibited, amongst other things, a very fine spear-head and an axe-head with an inscription showing they had belonged to King Kames.—Mr. H. Price also exhibited an interesting series of Egyptian weapons and implements.

NUMISMATIC.—Feb. 20.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Messrs. W. R. Paton and E. J. Seltman were elected Members.—Mr. R. A. Hobly exhibited a leaden piece of Elizabeth having on the obverse a large rose crowned between the letters E and R, and the inscription GOD SAVE THE QVENE, and on the reverse a portcullis with chains crowned and ANNO DNI 1584.—Mr. Burstal exhibited a portcullis sixpence of Elizabeth found at Oxford.—Mr. Symonds three Roman large and second brass coins of Nero, Titus, and Antoninus Pius, found at Dorchester, and Mr. H. Montagu a small medal of Queen Victoria struck in palladium while Sir James Graham was Master of the Mint. This piece was remarkable for containing 900 times its own volume in hydrogen.—Dr. B. V. Head read a paper by Mr. H. H. Howorth on two gold coins bearing respectively the names of Andragoras and, according to Mr. Howorth, of Phrataphernes, the former in Greek, the latter in the Aramaic character. Mr. Howorth advanced strong reasons for supposing that Phrataphernes and Andragoras were, in point of fact, identical, the former being the Persian and the latter the Greek name of one and the same individual, who is mentioned by Justin under his Greek name Andragoras as having been appointed by Alexander the Great ruler or Satrap of the Parthians, and by Arrian under his Persian name, Phrataphernes, as Satrap of the Parthians and Hyrcanians about the same period.—Dr. Head, in commenting upon Mr. Howorth's suggestion, said that he had no doubt whatever that the two coins were absolutely contemporary. He thought that the writer had also adduced very strong presumptive evidence in favour of his proposed attribution, although it was unfortunate that his transliteration of the Aramaic characters on the obverse of the alleged coin of Phrataphernes left unexplained the remaining inscription on the reverse of the coin as well as that on a third gold coin which was evidently struck under the same ruler as the "Phrataphernes coin." Although the forms of the letters on these coins are perfectly clear, there was always considerable liability to confusion in Aramaic inscriptions between the daleth, the kaph, and the resh.—The discussion was continued by Mr. Montagu, Rev. G. F. Crowther, and Dr. Evans, who were all inclined to accept Mr. Howorth's reading.

STATISTICAL.—Feb. 18.—Dr. T. G. Balfour, President, in the chair.—The paper read was by Mr. N. A. Humphreys, 'Statistics of Insanity in England, with Special Reference to Evidence of its Increasing Prevalence.'—Dr. Hack Tuke, Dr. G. H. Savage, Mr. F. Hendriks, Dr. G. B. Longstaff, Mr. J. P. Richards, Dr. H. F. H. Newington, and the President took part in the discussion that followed.

LINNEAN.—Feb. 20.—Mr. W. Carruthers, President, in the chair.—Messrs. W. E. Clarke and J. H. Veitch were admitted Fellows, and Mr. J. Jack elected.—Mr. G. C. Druce exhibited specimens of Agrostis canina, var. scotica, and a small collection of flowering plants dried after treatment with sulphurous acid and alcohol, and showing a partial preservation of the natural colours of the flowers.—Mr. F. P. Pascoe exhibited a series of coleopterous and lepidopterous insects to show the great diversity between insects of the same family.—Sir John Lubbock gave an abstract of four memoirs which he had prepared, 'On the Fruit and Seed of the Juglandiæ,' 'On the Shape of the Oak Leaf,' 'On the Leaves of Viburnum,' and 'On the Presence and Functions of Stipules.'—An interesting discussion followed, in which Messrs. J. G. Baker, J. Fraser, D. Morris, and Prof. Marshall Ward took part.

Mivart, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. Tegetmeier exhibited and made remarks on two cats' skulls, out of the large quantity of remains of these animals recently brought to this country from Egypt.—Papers were read: by Mr. G. A. Boulenger, a report on the additions made to the lizard collection in the British Museum since the publication of the last volume of the British Museum Catalogue of this group; a list was given of ninety-one species new or previously unrepresented in the collection; ten species and three genera were described as new,—by Mr. P. L. Slater, on a guinea-fowl from the Zambesi, allied to Numida cristata, and on the recognized species of this group of gallinaceous birds,—by Dr. Mivart, on the genus Cyon, mainly based on an examination of the specimens of this genus of Canidae contained in the British Museum,—by Mr. P. L. Slater, on the characters of some new species of the family Formicariidae,—and by Dr. A. Henry, on the mountain antelopes of Central China (Nemorhedus argyrochætes and N. henricus).

Stanley Kipping,—'Semi-thiocarbazides,' by Dr. A. E. Dixon,—and 'Note on the Production of Ozone by Flames,' by Mr. J. T. Cundall.

METEOROLOGICAL.—Feb. 19.—Dr. Marcet, V.P., in the chair.—Messrs. O. B. Cuvilljé, W. Harpur, and H. J. Spooner were elected Fellows.—The following papers were read: 'Observations on the Motion of Dust, as illustrative of the Circulation of the Atmosphere, and of the Development of certain Cloud Forms,' by the Hon. R. Abercromby,—'Cloud Nomenclature,' by Capt. D. Wilson-Barker,—and 'An Optical Feature of the Lightning Flash,' by Mr. E. S. Bruce. It has been stated in the report of the Thunderstorm Committee of the Royal Meteorological Society that there is not the slightest evidence in the photographs of lightning flashes of the angular, zigzag, or forked forms commonly seen in pictures. The author, however, believes that this is an optical reality, as the clouds on which the projection of the flash is cast are often of the cumulus type, which, he says, afford an angular surface. In support of this theory he exhibited some lantern slides of lightning playing over clouds.

PHILOLOGICAL.—Feb. 21.—Mr. A. J. Ellis, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. H. Bradley, the editor of vol. iii.

of the Society's 'New English Dictionary.' E. F. G. made his yearly report on the progress of his work. Owing to the difficulty of getting assistants—part of the time he had only one—and to his re-editing of Stratmann's 'Early English Lexicon,' he had only put 250 pages in type, but now with Mr. F. S. Arnold's aid his pace would quicken. His chief helpers had been Dr. Murray, Dr. Fitz-Edward Hall, Mr. H. H. Gibbs, Rev. J. T. Fowler, M. L. Delbos, Mr. Stevenson, and Prof. P. Meyer, besides many specialists. The authorities of the British Museum had given him a special table, and been most helpful and kind. His chief labour had been in cutting down every article into half the space he wanted for it; the dictionary ought to be double or treble its present size. The beginning of E was not interesting work; the scientific words in e, en, epi, were sadly dull. O.F. entretiens, L. intertens, took in English the forms entertense, interdic, interdic, interduc, interbeam. Entertense was treated as a plural; a singular intertie was made from it. Epicure was from the Low Latin epicurius, and at first meant a philosopher, an atheist, then a liver in gross sensual pleasure, and thirdly, an enjoyer of refined and delicate pleasures. Ennem was en and Fr. nuer, to shade. In most an end, for the most part, an is the flexion of most; end is a part of a whole. Eneritite was invented by Hardenberg in 1729; two years earlier he proposed to call it a stone-ily. As to the history of senses, employ had not its Latin original sense at first, but was 'to fold upon,' to bend a thing, and was applied to a tool, to money, &c., before Shakespeare and others used it of a person. Enscam, first, to include; secondly, to introduce, came probably from E.E. inseme, together, or Ital. insieme. Mr. Bradley then dealt with engine, engineer, enthusiast, emmanchee, and some e-ghost-words. The thanks of the Society were voted to him for his work at its dictionary.

PHYSICAL.—Feb. 21.—Prof. G. Carey Foster, Past President, in the chair.—Mr. S. Evershed was elected a Member.—The following communications were read: 'On a Carbon Deposit in a Blake Telephone Transmitter,' by Mr. F. B. Hawes,—'The Geometrical Construction of Direct-Reading Scales for Reflecting Galvanometers,'—and 'A Parallel Motion suitable for Recording Instruments,' by Mr. A. P. Trotter. Owing to the absence of Prof. S. P. Thompson, his paper 'On Bertrand's Refractometer' was not read.

HELLENIC.—Feb. 24.—Mr. S. Colvin, V.P., in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. E. Gardner 'On Children in Greek Sculpture of the Fourth Century.' Mr. Gardner described and published a very interesting fragment of a stele found at Lerna, and now in the museum at Argos, which presents us with a portrait of a boy, whose name is given in an accompanying inscription as Cephisodotus. This portrait so closely resembles the head of a boy recently found at Paphos, and now in the British Museum, that the two heads must belong to the same age and school. Some archaeologists had attributed the Paphos boy to the Ptolemaic age; but as the date of the Cephisodotus stele is certainly the fourth century, we must now allow it to be of the time of the Praxitelean school. Mr. Gardner showed that in that time children were not always conventionally rendered, but sometimes with an approach to naturalism.—Mr. A. Evans cited a gem signed by Phrygillus, with a child driving a hoop, of about the age of Cephisodotus, and giving boyish proportions.—Mr. Farnell read parts of a paper 'On Works of the Pergamene Style, in which he first gave an account of his researches among the miscellaneous sculptures from Pergamum now in Berlin, whence, no less than from the great altar, we should form our idea of Pergamene style; and, secondly, discussed a number of works in various museums which show traces of the influence of that style.

THE Bakerian Lecture will be delivered before the Royal Society by Prof. Schuster on March 20th.

A MEMORIAL tablet has been placed on the house in Lothian Street, Edinburgh, in which Darwin lived when a student at the University.

MR. PRINCE has issued for 1889 the summary of weather observations which he has carried on for many years past at his elevated station on Crowborough Hill, Sussex. The temperature of the early part of the year was somewhat below the average, though the frost was not at any time severe, the cold being most intense on the morning of the 12th of February, when the thermometer registered 18°·2 of Fahrenheit. The mean temperature of April was considerably below the average, yet higher than that of the corresponding month of 1888. May was a warm and very genial spring month, and June was, upon the whole, exceedingly dry, warm, and pleasant, though a thunderstorm of exceptional severity, accompanied by hail in some localities (the damage occasioned thereby in Tunbridge Wells and its vicinity was greater than on any instance recorded in that neighbourhood), occurred on the 7th of that month. A very wet period commenced on the 7th of July (preceded by a fall of temperature on the 6th), which continued, with a short intermission, until the fourth week in August. Although September was a fine, dry, and pleasant month, yet the mean temperature was scarcely equal to the average (probably owing to a prevalence of north-east wind during a third part of the month), whilst that of October was rather more than one degree below the average. In November, on the other hand, the mean temperature was higher than usual, and no trace of frost was observable until the 26th. Severe frosts, however, during the first and last weeks of December contributed to depress its mean temperature considerably below the average, and that month was remarkable for the large amount of fog and generally misty condition of the atmosphere. Mr. Prince concludes his report with some remarks upon the unusual prevalence of north-east winds during the last five years.

FINE ARTS

The Art of Wood-Engraving in Italy in the Fifteenth Century. By F. Lippmann. Illustrated. (Quaritch.)

(Second Notice.)

THE production of separate prints was not, says Dr. Lippmann, considerable nor continuous in Italy, but a special operation directed to special ends. Even the few examples which remain are manifestly, as he rightly points out, the work of able artists, deficient sometimes in technical skill, that is, in specialized skill, and they accord closely with contemporary developments of painting. So exactly true is this that the early Florentine and the early Venetian woodcuts differ precisely as the pictorial art of Florence differs from that of Venice. In fact, they were the works of painters, many of whom had won a reputation with the brush before they took the graving tool in hand. "On the other hand, there is a decided absence in Italy of great masters like Wolgemuth and Dürer, who treated wood-engraving as an essential part of their artistic function." Dr. Lippmann ought to have added that both these masters failed as painters exactly where they approached most nearly to engraving. We cannot agree with him in thinking that the consummate technical skill shown in the Van Eycks, and "never achieved in equal measure by any of their successors," is paralleled in the history of printing by the achievements of the Germans. It is true that Fust and Schoeffer's Psalter of 1457 is a typographical monument of the highest order, and Dr. Lippmann's enthusiasm prompts him to say that it has "remained unequalled in or out of Germany." This is going too far, and the comparison between Flemish painting and German printing cannot be sustained, even if we limit it to members of the school of the Van Eycks, several of whom were technically not much, if at all, the inferiors of their chiefs. The inferiority was in other matters.

There is much sound criticism in the passages relating to the connexion between engraving and painting in Italy:—

"The connexion between the art of wood-engraving in Italy and the labours of the contemporary schools of painting, can be traced only in the larger and more prominent features of each; the peculiar characteristics of the painter's work are very seldom visible in that of the men who produced woodcuts. Metal engravings are distinguished from the latter, in exhibiting a clearer and more intimate relation to the local type of pictorial art."

We should expect this, for early Italian engravers were chasers as well as painters, or pupils of workers in bronze or the precious metals. Nevertheless, in modern times wood-engraving is more pictorial than metal engraving. Dr. Lippmann fancies that many of the miniaturists, whose employment had been extinguished by the printing-press, may have turned to the production of designs for the woodblock. Against this it may be urged that early designs on wood are far from resembling miniatures, that the progress of printing was comparatively slow, and that at first spaces were left in printed pages for draughtsmen to fill with their designs; so that the art of the miniaturist was not extinguished in the manner or with the rapidity suggested. It is more to the point that, whereas paintings and metal engravings are due severally to one artist, not so wood engravings, for the craftsman who cut and the draughtsman who designed on the block were entirely different persons, and (as, until lately, most of our best modern designers on wood found to their cost) the work was almost equally divided between half a dozen wood engravers. Dr. Lippmann does not touch on a question which has vexed many students of Albert Dürer, whether that master cut his own blocks or left them to the tender mercies of the Formschneider. It is certain that, whatever may be the truth, no long time elapsed before the draughtsman who was an artist, and the cutter who was a craftsman, ceased to be one. The excellent technique of Dürer's 'Dance of Death' indicates that the cutter was no new hand at his work. This consideration, apart from anything else, we have always held to be decisive against the notion that Albert was his own Formschneider. It is true that the craftsman often modified the character of the artist's work without scruple.

"Designs by men of widely different characteristics were frequently made to assume a general artistic resemblance under the levelling influence of the woodcutter's hand; and the busy ateliers which turned out large quantities of woodcuts, produced among their workmen such a uniformity of style that we find, for instance, Zoan Andrea's studio in Venice stamping its own peculiar impress upon the productions of a whole school and epoch of art."

No doubt here is the key to many inequalities and differences often observed in the output of woodcutting botteghe. The history of etchings bearing Rembrandt's name, and yet differing in marked degrees of character and quality, supplies analogies to the doings of Zoan Andrea.

The occurrence of German qualities in certain woodcuts published in Rome by Ulrich Hahn is cleverly accounted for by Dr. Lippmann's suggestion that this worthy employed Germans to cut his blocks. The woodcuts of the 'Meditationes' of Cardinal Torquemada (1467) were obviously due to Germans transplanted to Rome; and Johann Neumeister, who published an edition of the work at Foligno in 1479, was apparently a German. These facts attest the influence of Germany on Italian xylography. But so early as 1481 dissatisfaction with the rude dulness of the cuts of the Teutonic draughtsmen induced J. P. de Lignamine to employ an Italian of very evident skill and ability to draw for him. The result was a manifest improvement. The fine 'Opuscula Philippi de Barberiis' which followed in 1494 belongs to an artist of the school of Ghirlandajo. Nevertheless great artists did not design for the comparatively rude works intended to be sold cheaply. Nicolo Tedesco, another German, produced the first book with designs engraved on metal plates in Florence, the 'Monte Santo di Dio'; and the designs have been, like a great many more, ascribed to the very questionable Baccio Baldini, of whom so much is written, but so little is known. Dr. Lippmann is probably correct in affirming that "German workmen, if not absolutely the first introducers of engraving on metal and wood [as they probably were], exercised at least a most important influence upon its early development in Italy." We may accept this remark as regards woodcuts for books without extending it to metal engraving, unless the term "development" is taken in a narrow sense.

However this may be, it is evident the Florentines soon found better art than that of the German workmen. Francesco di Dino's edition of Cavalca's 'Specchio della Croce,' 1490, is Italian to all intents and purposes, and, artistically speaking, is incomparably superior to its forerunners. Its illustrations remind us of Lippi, and Petri of Metz might have cut the blocks, but never designed them. He was a die-sinker and type-cutter with an nebulous and questionable record. We think history does not confirm the author's suggestion on p. 30 that the technical excellence of book illustrations published after 1490 proves the existence of equally meritorious works of an earlier date, but now lost. It may be that better artists directed their attention to channels of design until then despised. The notion that superior men had been attracted to such work, as opposed to the notion of a development on older lines proper to woodcutting, seems to be supported by the fact that the authors of the cuts in Jacobus de Cessoli's 'Giucoco degli Scacchi' (Florence, 1493), and the great view of Florence, of which Dr. Lippmann supplies a facsimile, alike aimed at the production of "colour"—a pictorial desideratum unsought for till then, and quite sufficient to suggest to experts familiar with painting that a painter was using means proper to his art, and quite different from those in vogue among the older xylographers. This does not indicate a progressive development, although it is evidence of new powers being brought to use. The view of Florence here referred to (c. 1486-9) is expounded and illustrated by Dr. Lippmann with much spirit and ingenuity. The woodcutter, apart from the designer, was evidently not new to his work. If the figure in the foreground is, as here suggested, really the artist who drew the view and the man to whom we owe various curious topographical details of the Tuscan city in the fifteenth century, the fact tells in favour of the work being by an Italian; he is not a bit like a German. The only surviving name of an artist producing at this epoch woodcuts in the Florentine manner is that of Johannes de Francfordia; but the style of the cut thus signed—it is in the British Museum—is decidedly Italian, and very far indeed from being Teutonic. It is a sort of a version of a design of Pollaiuolo showing naked men fighting in a wood.

We have perhaps said enough in praise of the acute criticisms and insight of Dr. Lippmann, who has produced a curious and readable monograph on a subject which might easily be made excessively dry and dull. We can also speak highly of the technical knowledge shown in 'Wood-Engraving in Italy in the Fifteenth Century.'

The Year's Art, 1890 (Virtue & Co.), has made itself indispensable on a thousand subjects. Besides the ordinary functions of a calendar it includes an account of institutions connected with art, such as parliamentary matters, art teaching, charities, and sales (a wonderfully rich record). Among the best sections is a copious directory of artists, and so useful is this, we wish it were extended so as to include the addresses of "outsiders" who are not artists, yet are intimately associated with design. Such a work had long been desired, and it is wonderful men waited till 1817, when the original compilation of the sort was published in the 'Annals of the Fine Arts,' which contains a very good directory of artists. After a time this ceased to appear, and not till 1850, when Messrs. Rowney & Co. issued the 'Fine Arts Almanack' with a directory, was such a thing again to be had. The memoranda of anniversaries ought to be increased to embrace such important events as the openings of the early London picture exhibitions, e.g., the Society of Artists of Great Britain, May 9th, 1761. The title of the first exhibition opened in London (at the Society of Arts' Great Room) is erroneously given as that of the "Society of Incorporated Artists." No society was "incorporated" till long after this date, and the works there shown (from April 21st, 1760) were described as "of the Present Artists." The portraits are not so good as those of last year, but they are welcome.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION.

(Sixth Notice.—Remaining Pictures of the British School.)

THE primitive mood and style of G. Morland's picture of The Mask (No. 59) are charming; this simplicity and Englishness are due to the influence of the long war, which, at the time it was executed, had prevented our artists from going abroad. Morland never painted better, seldom so well. The antithesis of Morland in taste and style, as well as in his training, life, and death, was R. Wilson, whose Italian Landscape (18) Lord Wantage has lent. Artificial, conventional, and academical in the highest degree, this beautiful work charms every visitor of taste by its dignity. In fact, Wilson is at his best in this lovely picture. Sion House (157) is another very fine Wilson. The Duke of Northumberland's mansion is in the mid-distance. The foreground is occupied by the smoothest of sward, partly shaded by trees, and the whole bathed in sunlight, in which a tender mist softens every outline, attenuates the shadows, and permits neither sparkle nor glare. This is, we believe, the picture, a commission for the king, which caused Lord Bute to remark that the price (sixty guineas) was too high; to which Wilson replied fiercely that if his Majesty could not pay that sum all at once he would take it in instalments, an explosion that is said to have cost the unlucky painter the patronage of the Court. It was, we fancy, No. 182 in the British Institution collection of Wilsons, 1814, and was called 'View of Sion House from Kew Gardens.' It was, we understand, sold in 1878, with Mr. Munro's collection, for 283*l.* There is another 'Sion House' which, in 1824, belonged to Mr. Sheffield, and was preferred by some of the best judges to the picture intended for George III. The reputation of no English landscape painter will gain more by this exhibition than Callcott's, whose Fishing Boats becalmed off Cowes (2), thanks to its good composition, airy distance, and harmony, is almost worthy of Van Goyen. His large picture The Shrimper (44) has points borrowed from Turner; for instance, the finely treated foreground and its clear waves breaking on the beach, the harmonious middle distance, and the pervading warmth. It is unusually dark for a Callcott, but under a good deal of varnish we detect his equable silvery tints and somewhat empty forms. If in 'The Shrimper' the painter was somewhat audaciously matching himself with Turner, then in his "Linlithgow" period, it is not possible to avoid seeing that in his otherwise admirable Hampstead Heath (161), in Gallery III., which is oddly placed between a Romney and a Reynolds, Callcott was trying what he could do in comparison with John Linnell, his next-door neighbour and quondam friend. Yet No. 161, although it is now hot and somewhat murky, ought not to be contemned. It has many acceptable and a few fine points.

John Linnell is well represented here by five pictures, all of high merit. The finest is his noble Cornfield (37), lent by the Rev. B. Gibbons, a comparatively early view of a country divided by ridges and masses of light and shadow parallel to the picture plane, dignified and simple, and handled with the firmest of touches in a choice style. It has lost none of its original sentiment, although the foreground has darkened and the distance has faded to a degree very unusual in Linnells. The same owner's Barking Trees (19) is dated 1817, and its brilliant technique, its warm and silvery greenness, and somewhat conventional, or rather timid composition, indicate that the artist was still under the influence of Varley and Mulready, his guides in appreciating nature. The trunks of trees lying in the beautifully conceived and admirably executed vista of the open glade which supplied the artist with a subject are somewhat artificially grouped, while the touch depicting the attenuated and quivering foliage of the birches and beeches of the wood is almost mechanical, in the way in which Creswick's foliage is mechanically dotted to give the look of leaves without much study. These defects do not materially injure the charms of the picture's airiness and glow, the spaciousness of the prospect, and the romantic distance, a line of sunlit uplands. It is painful to think that the painter of such sincere and beautiful landscapes as this was nearly as much neglected as Wilson had been, and, lacking recognition, had scores of unsold pictures lying in his studio. St. John the Baptist Preaching (25)—a much later work—shows how profoundly Linnell had been influenced by Titian and by the poetic motives of the Venetian school of landscape. It is a study for the famous large picture of the same subject, which in its broad and effective arrangements it fairly well epitomizes. The idea of placing a vast crowd of persons addressed by an enthusiastic speaker in a narrow valley between magnificent cliffs clad in foliage of a thousand rich and sober hues, while huge clouds are rolling above the hilltops, and light and shade of the most massive character distinguishes the view, is realized with noble force and dignity. The conception may be called Titianic. A Windmill (32), a much later work, is the original of a highly attractive etching published not long since, and the small version of an important work. Effective and dignified as it is, the visitor prefers the simpler and less obvious sentiment of 'Barking Trees' or the solemn beauty and repose of the somewhat austere 'Cornfield.' The Rev. B. Gibbons's Sunset (46), another Linnell, the date of which lies between 'Barking Trees' and 'St. John Preaching,' is most beautiful and grand. It proves that neither figures nor a dramatic effect and design are essential to poetry in landscape.

We shall notice the remaining contents of Gallery I. in the order of the Catalogue, grouping each man's works. One of the best known, but far from one of the best, of Landseers is the so-called Highland Whisky-Still (12), which the Duke of Wellington has lent. It belongs to the year 1829, when it was exhibited at the Academy, not, as the Catalogue says, to 1846, confusing it with the 'Highland Shepherd's Home,' which now belongs to Mr. Coope, and was painted in 1842. R. Graves and J. Stephenson engraved No. 12, which is one of the very few Landseers not included in the great collection that filled these rooms in 1873. The prints do no more than justice to its breadth of effect and richness and depth of tone, but they could not get rid of the swaggering air of the Highlander, nor the stageyness of the old crone near him. Jocko (15), a capital design, painted in 1828, was No. 438 in the Academy of 1873. Until then it had not been exhibited, but it is the subject of a very fine print. The vigorous, firm, and sweeping touch proves that in his six-and-twentieth year the young painter had attained a mastery even Snyders hardly reached and never surpassed. Would that Landseer had retained this noble and sincere method! The vigour of the execution is equalled by the spirit of the design. The poetry of the background, a lake darkened by an impending storm, is a very valuable element. The In- truding Puppies (16), which originally bore the awkward title 'Impertinent Puppies dismissed by a Monkey,' and is signed and dated 1821, was engraved in 1827 by Thomas Landseer. It was painted, Mr. Algernon Graves tells us, for Lord De Tabley, and, with his collection, sold in 1827 for 173*l.* 5*s.* to Mr. Merryweather; it afterwards belonged to Mr. J. C. Cankrien, who in 1853 parted with it to Mr. Wallis for 650*l.* It passed to Mr. R. Johnson, who lent it as No. 204 to the Academy in 1873. Technically, this picture illustrates an intermediate stage of Landseer's art. Its colouring is rather spotty, and in this respect it differs from Landseer's work before and after the date of its execution, and, as a whole, it differs materially from Lord Durham's 'Ratcatchers' of the same year, the technique of which is firmer, more stringent and searching. After 'Fighting Dogs getting Wind,' with which the youth won his spurs at the exhibition in Spring Gardens in 1818, 'Ratcatchers' and the picture before us were his best achievements. Nothing so good was exhibited until 'The Cat's Paw,' now at Cassiobury, went to the British Institution in 1824, and astonished a world which, since he had made his début at the Academy with 'A Portrait of a Mule,' had never failed to look with attention at whatever Landseer did, and to read eagerly all Elmes, John Landseer, Haydon, the Hunts, and the Hazlitts were pleased to write about him.

Very wholesome and sincere, yet undeniably weak and commonplace, is Webster's popular work The Slide (23), well known by the engravings and woodcuts which have kept its fame alive since 1849, when half the visitors to Trafalgar Square accepted it as the picture of the year. It has not been sold since that time, but in the same year the sketch for it was acquired by Messrs. Agnew for 145*l.*, a great sum in those days for such a thing. As it is the least sentimental of a numerous series of rustic genre subjects, we have always regarded it as Webster's best work. An agreeable surprise to those who, like ourselves, never saw it before, and had little knowledge of Turner as a painter of life-size portraits, is the likeness of Mr. Robert Williams (24), a rubicund, genial old gentleman, in a blue coat and brass buttons, and wearing white gloves, who holds a telescope in a highly nautical manner, and appears to be standing on the beach, bareheaded in the sunlight. It reminds us of Turner's style c. 1818 or 1820, and is a study of light such as few could rival, firmly painted, bright, pure, broad, and harmonious, and the sky is admirable. Its condition is excellent, and the picture has never been exhibited before. Turner's small and solidly-painted Sea-piece (48), which belongs to the Rev. B. Gibbons, is so rich in matter that a man who had never seen the sea might learn a great deal from it. The design embodies some of the elements and all the motives of a sea-piece in the 'Liber Studiorum,' to which (in this its touch and style agree) the picture owes its existence. It was probably painted at Hammersmith c. 1809, the year of 'Spithead.' To the same owner we are indebted for a sight of Mulready's Horses Baiting (28), dated 1810, which was at the Academy in 1811, an early work betraying the influence of Varley. It evinces rare feeling for atmospheric truth and delicate gradations of light and tone such as Ruysdael would prize. The foreground is a little weak, and the shadows, as was common with Mulready at the period, are a little black. The same criticism applies to a technically similar Landscape (33), which is dated 1809, and is doubtless the 'Cottage and Figures,' No. 131 of the Academy in 1811, while Landscape No. 34 before us is the other 'Cottage and Figures,' No. 248 of the same exhibition. It has the true silvery charm. No. 33 is even better than No. 28, being broader, warmer, and in better keeping. Constable might have painted that gleam of sunlight on the tall white gable of a cottage which the drifting rain-cloud, now making it more brilliant, will soon shut out. Lord Brasse's Cows (29), by J. Ward, warm, solid, learnedly and yet boldly modelled, shows that masculine artist at his best; its refined manner is all the more welcome because not always present in Ward's smaller, and seldom seen in his larger animal paintings. His Horses (31) is luminous, clear, solid, and fine in execution; but the coloration might be more agreeable. There is some garishness about the golden bay horse on a hillock, placed in Ward's way, which was not always a happy way, quite parallel to the picture plane. The distance, however, is airy, and the whole has the charm of a finished surface such as in Wards we often look for in vain.

No. 36, A Ship on Fire, is a favourable specimen of the melodramatic mood in which Francis Danby delighted. Shortly after retiring to Exmouth in 1851, where the calm waters of the beautiful estuary favoured the subjects on which his mind had long been set, Danby sent to the Academy, as No. 581, 'A Ship on Fire, a calm Moonlight far at Sea.' It deserves to be reckoned among the masterpieces of the English school. The impressiveness of the tragedy which it embodies with irresistible pathos is more than enough to overcome the distaste we have for the hardness, smoothness, and laboured polish of the surface, almost fit to be called "teaboard," which is the sole offence of an artist whose reputation will surely revive when the public study this fine picture and its neighbour, No. 40, from the same collection, The Grave of the Excommunicated. Many of those who looked at the latter when it was exhibited knew circumstances attaching to the picture which accentuated its pathos. Since 1851 'A Ship on Fire' has remained in the collection to which it belongs. Danby must have witnessed some scene of the kind, or he could hardly have depicted so finely this tragedy at sea. A few melodramatic artifices are as nothing in regard to the real passion, terror, and dignity it exhibits. 'The Grave of the Excommunicated,' a moonlight view on a wild heath, under labouring clouds, is quite after Danby's heart; and although the design is less epical than that of the 'Ship on Fire' or 'The Evening Gun,' it is so because the elements dealt with are less simple.

Another of Mr. Gibbons's treasures is Mother and Child (38), a beautiful Raphaellesque composition, one of the best and most spontaneous of C. R. Leslie's designs. The energy of the young mother's action is conspicuous. The draperies are disposed in broad, simple, and well-studied masses, the breadth of the light and shade is worthy of an old master, and the coloration is thoroughly good, especially the dark olive-green gown, the white linen, and the rosy carnations. Beatrice (56), by the same master, is one of those small figures of beautiful ladies, graceful in attitude, and painted in an unaffected and perfectly simple fashion, in which the artist was always happy. The picture seems to us comparable in nearly every respect with a similar piece—one of Leslie's purest and best—called 'Juliet,' which belonged to the late T. O. Barlow, R.A. The Sheep-washing (125) was painted by Sir D. Wilkie in 1816 (not 1817 as the Catalogue says), while he was fresh from the study in Holland during the previous year of Tenierses, Cuyp, and Wouvermanses, then freshly returned from Paris, by whose silveriness this picture is pervaded. He told Beaumont that he painted it "from a sketch made in Wiltshire," and "it is, of course, being a landscape, entirely new to me." It was Wilkie's only landscape. It was sold to Sir T. Baring for 200 guineas, and in 1848, when his collection was dispersed, it was resold for 693*l*. The sketch, which belonged to Mr. Allnutt, fetched in 1863 126*l*.; in 1865, 105*l*.; again, at the Mendell sale in 1875, 199*l*. 10*s*. The tender greys, the warmth and serenity of the picture, are worthy of Mulready or Linnell at an earlier period than 1816, while the graceful trees and the soft autumnal air, and the light and crisp touch of the painter, are not surpassed in the best of their works, although, it must be owned, Wilkie's art was obviously less sincere, searching, and studious. 'Sheep-washing' was exhibited at the British Institution in 1817 as No. 55, with a quotation from Thompson beginning:—

They drive the troubled flocks, by many a dog
Compell'd, to where the many cunning brook
Forms a deep pool, this bank abrupt and high,
And that fair spreading in a pebbled shore.

Near it hung a very different masterpiece, the 'Bulls Fighting' of James Ward; Turner's noble 'Temple of Jupiter in Egina,' which Pye engraved; Martin's 'Joshua commanding the Sun to Stand Still'; and Wilkie's 'Pedlar.' Could the world show a more diverse collection of works, the fame of which eighty years have not dimmed?

Constable's Chain Pier at Brighton (55) is one of many fine versions of a subject which he delighted to paint with a frank and vigorous brush, illustrating various effects of light and air. It is a beautiful study of white clouds loading an autumnal sky, and in colour, breadth, and solidity a really noble specimen of art. The Sea-piece, with Jetty (52), by the same artist, is more finished, however, and its charm is more subtle. The spaciousness of its aerial perspective, its simplicity, breadth, and reposeful sentiment, make it, though small, one of the best pictures of its kind. Dedham Lock, or the Leaping Horse (159), also by Constable, is the "new six-foot canvas" he admired so much, "a canal scene," he called it in January, 1825, "and full of the bustle incident to such a scene when four or five boats are passing in company; with dogs, horses, boys, men, women, and children, and, best of all, old timber, props, water-plants, willows, stumps, sedges, old nets," &c. "My 'Lock' is now," he wrote again, "on the easel; it is silvery, windy, and delicious; all health, and the absence of anything stagnant, and is wonderfully got together; the print will be fine." The print is that which S. W. Reynolds began, but did not live to complete. Reynolds, a most competent critic in a matter involving the tonality and chiaroscuro of a picture, admired 'The Lock' or 'Leaping Horse' hugely, and wrote warmly of it as unequalled "since the days of Gainborough and Wilson, painted with so much truth and originality, so much art, so little artifice." "The chief object in the foreground," said Leslie, when describing his friend's picture, "is a horse mounted by a boy, leaping one of the barriers which cross the towing-paths along the Stour (for it is that river, and not a canal), to prevent the cattle from quitting their bounds. As these bars are without gates, the horses, which are of a much finer race, and kept in better condition than the wretched animals that tow the barges near London, are all taught to leap; their harness ornamented over the collar with crimson fringe adds to their picturesque appearance, and Constable, by availing himself of these advantages, and relieving the horse, which is of a dark colour, upon a bright sky, made him a very imposing object." The picture was at the Academy, one of three severally entitled 'Landscape.' Few took notice of them, although at this very time the 'White Horse,' following the 'Hay Wain,' now in the National Gallery, was being exhibited in the Louvre, won for him a gold medal, and introduced naturalistic landscape into France. When 'The Leaping Horse' was returned unsold from Somerset House the painter improved it in many respects to his satisfaction, and afterwards reduced it to please "Jack Bannister" (the comedian who sat for Leslie's 'Uncle Toby'), who, going to the then No. 35, Upper Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square, where this picture was painted, to see the work and others then on the easel, met two chimney-sweepers at the door, and cried out, "What, brothers of the brush!" D. Lucas produced a capital engraving from 'The Leaping Horse,' which was Constable's diploma picture, a vigorous, sumptuous, and "dewy" example, but heavy in many places, hot in the shadows throughout, and exceedingly so in those of the foreground. Within the last twenty years 'The Leaping Horse' has lost much of the light with which it was, much to the painter's satisfaction, saturated.

NEW PRINTS.

Mr. H. C. DICKINS, Regent Street, has sent us a vellum proof with the remarque (a plough, its team and their driver), etched by M. F. Jacque after Millet's 'L'Angelus,' or one of the versions that artist produced of the work which, after a memorable battle of the auction room, is now in New York. It has been many times engraved, but not, so far as we know, ever before more finely than in this large and important etching. M. Jacque has reproduced the sentiment of the two figures. It must have been a difficult task to translate the fine technical qualities of his original, and M. Jacque is to be congratulated upon giving us a work so sympathetic, and, so far as it goes, extremely excellent. Apart from this we fancy the print at large is a trifle sooty, while the ridges of the ploughed field which is the foreground are a little too distinct; the shadows cast by the low sun into their furrows would be improved if they were massed in a simpler arrangement, and the whole landscape proper should be made rather lighter, so that the wheelbarrow and the basket near the figures should have their right places in the scene. At present the basket is almost lost, and the barrow does not detach itself from the woman's figure, while the reflected lights on the sacks, as well as those on the legs of the man, are somewhat too bright. If the effect and chiaroscuro of the whole were simplified in the way we venture to suggest, it might be our duty to say this capital translation of a masterpiece is faultless.

From the Autotype Company we have received a copy of a recent drawing by Mr. F. Shields called 'The Angel Guardian,' representing a fair and somewhat chubby English child walking forwards, treading on a snake at the end furthest from the reptile's head—for which action Mr. Shields cannot have Scriptural authority—and bearing a lantern, the light of which reveals the dangers of a rocky and narrow path between two abysses. The angel guardian stoops over and assists the infant to bear the lamp and a cross. The graceful sentimentality and obvious meaning of the design, as well as the pathos of the faces and actions, will attract admirers who care not although the whole represents what is really an anachronism of inspiration and invention, in producing which Mr. Shields appeals to "other times, other manners" than those of 1890. This is not by any means his best work. From the same firm come to us four excellent autogravures of pictures by Mr. Holman Hunt, being 'Rienzi vowing Vengeance for the Murder of his Brother,' 'Early Christian Missionaries fleeing from the Druids,' 'Valentine and Sylvia,' from 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona,' and 'A Tuscan Girl.' The best of these transcripts is from 'Valentine and Sylvia,' the best of the pictures. They are all desirable as memoranda of the fine works in question. In addition to the above we have received from the Autotype Company a capital reproduction of Mr. H. J. Draper's graceful fresco 'Spring,' youths and children amid trees, conversing and gathering flowers and decorating themselves with them. Mr. Draper was decorated at the Royal Academy and commissioned to paint on a wall at Guy's Hospital. The picture here very fortunately reproduced is the result of the commission, and attests not only the excellent teaching by which the painter has profited, but his own accomplishments, good taste, and honourable care. His composition is skilful, his design well considered and natural, without ceasing to be decorative in the best sense. He is a capital draughtsman of the nude, has studied draperies with zeal and intelligence, and altogether done so well that it gives us pleasure to say he has deserved his success.

FINE-ART SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the Society of Painters in Water Colours held late on Thursday of last week, Mrs. Allingham and Mr. Hodson, associate exhibitors, were elected full members, and Mr. C. N. Hemy was chosen an associate exhibitor from among sixty-seven candidates, with whose works sent in competition for election the large room in Pall Mall was full. It appears that Mr. Hemy was chosen "on his merits," and without having sent any drawings. There can be no doubt about the excellence of Mr. Hemy's art, as every one is aware who has seen his works in the gallery of the Institute of Water-Colour Painters, in Piccadilly, and elsewhere. It seems, however, to us that if Mr. Hemy was eligible for election "on his merits," other candidates, many of whom are persons of distinction, ought not to have been required to send "specimens of their abilities." The election of Mr. Hemy under such conditions will appear to many something like an indignity to his brother artists, unless it is distinctly stated that the Society leaves it to the judgment of those who are willing to join its ranks whether they will send drawings or not. The selection of an artist most of whose work has been in oil indicates a change in the position taken up by the Society.

TO-DAY (Saturday) will be sold at Christie's some interesting pictures, including A. Solomon's 'First Class,' known by a popular print; Linnell's 'Flight into Egypt' (1841); Macleise's 'Snap-Apple Night' (1833); three South American landscapes of great merit by L. R. Mignot; Mr. Brett's 'Etna' (1870); Mr. R. W. Macbeth's 'Ca' the Cattle' (1875); W. Collins's much admired 'Shrimp Boys at Cromer' (1816), and three others; a portrait of Opie, by himself; and Owen's 'Beggars,' which C. Turner engraved. On the 8th inst. the pictures of Mr. W. Millward will be sold in King Street, which include not fewer than twenty-four works, many being of note, by the late Henry Dawson. On the same day will be dispersed the water-colour drawings collected by Mr. J. Beattie, deceased, comprising works of G. Dodgson and Mr. G. A. Fripp, with pictures in oil by Messrs. Brett, Fulleylove, Webster, and others.

A DISTINGUISHED Royal Academician has addressed the following remonstrance to us:—

"There is a grievance amongst artists at the present time which seems to call for redress, and the Athenæum, as an unillustrated periodical, might aptly lend its valuable assistance in the matter. I allude to the prevailing custom that the managers of numbers of illustrated publications have of obtaining the inventions and designs of artists without giving any remuneration for them. In the month of March, just amidst the worry and hard work of finishing their pictures for exhibition, artists are pestered with applications for permission to reproduce their works in every variety of way by enterprising publishers. Many of these so-called art publications owe their entire interest to the talents and inventions of the artists who have been induced to gratuitously allow their works to be therein reproduced. In some cases especial line drawings are executed, which are not always expected to be returned; and even where photography is employed much valuable time is lost and inconvenience incurred. Pictures do not sell at the present day so readily as could be wished, and it seems to me all the more hard that original genius should have no share in the profits which are no doubt largely reaped at its expense. The advantages of advertisement and the fear of offending those who hold the power of criticism in their hands are the forces brought to bear on the poor artist. It is a most one-sided sort of transaction, and if something like a strike could be brought about, no doubt a proper remuneration would before long have to be accorded to the artists for the use of their talents and labour."

THE present head of the house of P. & D. Colnaghi writes about the noble series of drawings by Janet and others of the French school, portraits of members of the Court of Paris, to which we lately referred as having been sold to the Duc d'Aumale (see p. 124):—

"In the year 1868 Admiral Howard, afterwards Lord Lanerton, brought to me a volume bound in parchment, and a kind of portfolio, or rather a pocket made of leather, both containing drawings. Admiral Howard said that [Frederick] the fifth Earl of Carlisle had bought the whole lot many years ago in Italy for 20*l.* The volume had a title-page written in Italian stating that the contents were portraits by Holbein of royal and celebrated persons of his time. It required no great knowledge to acquaint the admiral that the drawings both in volume and folio were by Janet, and that their value was very great. There are 171. I enclose the entry made in my day-book of what I did as to arrangement. The new edition of Bryan's 'Stanley' states that at Castle Howard there are eighty-eight. I do not think that I can be wrong. The paper on which the drawings in the pocket were made is the beautiful old French paper. I have no recollection of any other hand than Janet's, and my account makes no mention of any.—A. MCKAY."

We described several of these drawings in "The Private Collections of England," No. XXV, Athen. No. 2551, September 10th, 1873, and then repeated information given to us at Castle Howard, to the effect that the total number of them was 314. Probably other collections than those to which our correspondent refers were previously or afterwards obtained by Earl Frederick. Various bodies of similar works by French crayonneurs exist, as at Windsor, in the Louvre, at the British Museum (all of mixed character and various dates, and including specimens by the Du Moustier family and more than one Clouet), and at Stafford House. Mariette had a collection which in 1729 he showed to Henrietta, Countess of Pomfret, as she related to her friend Frances, Countess of Hertford: "I was also at the house of an old man [Mariette] who sells prints and drawings, and whose family for three generations have made it their business to collect all that is curious in that way. He is a good historian and a great connoisseur, and will only part with duplicates; among which I could not persuade him to reckon a book of original drawings of the portraits of Francis I. and all the considerable personages, male and female, of his court, or I would have sent them as a present to you" ('Hertford and Pomfret Correspondence,' 1806, vol. i. p. 83; see likewise p. 94).

THE following gentlemen have been elected Associates of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers, viz., Messrs. A. W. Bayes, W. Boucher, C. F. Robinson, and F. S. Walker.

THE Vicar of Chapel-en-le-Frith seems determined to destroy the chance of his church—a chance of peculiar interest, which it is quite practicable to preserve, and which the Archaeological Society of his own county has implored him to spare. At a parish tea meeting held at Chapel-en-le-Frith last week he concluded an angry speech thus: "Nothing under heaven will ever induce me to alter my determination to pull it [the chance] down. Down it shall come at all cost, down it shall come." Clergymen who interpret their duty thus are doing their best to bring about the disestablishment of the Church. The nation will not always be willing to allow the monuments of its past history to be wantonly destroyed by those to whose guardianship they are entrusted.

THE Fine-Art Exhibition at Dundee has had a prosperous career, the sum announced as the result of sales amounting to 6,386*l.*

THE Fine-Art Society has appointed to-day (Saturday) for the private view of a collection of pictures of Japan by Mr. A. East. The public will be admitted on Monday next.

THE death on the 18th ult. is announced of Miss Maude Naftel, daughter of Mr. P. Naftel, whose pupil she was, and an accomplished artist in water colours, lately elected an associate exhibitor of the Old Society.

DR. WALSTEIN argued, in the last conference held at the American School in Athens, that the bas-reliefs found two years ago at Mantinea, representing the musical contest between Apollo and Marsyas, are the same as those mentioned by Pausanias as the work of Praxiteles.

THE Berlin Museum has now on loan a remarkable painting on panel dating from about 1440, and representing the raising of Lazarus, until recently in the possession of a member of the Balbi family at Genoa, to one of whose ancestors it is said to have been presented by a king of Spain. Dr. Scheibler believes it to be the picture by Albert van Oudewater mentioned by Van Mander in his 'Schilder-Boeck' as having been taken away from Haarlem at the time of the siege of that city by the Spaniards. If this be really the case it is a remarkable find.

WE regret to record the death, on the 21st ult., of M. Ernest Cheneau, a French art critic, who was conspicuous in calling the attention of his countrymen to the characteristics and to some of the merits of modern British artists. His 'History of English Painting' was an honest and intelligent attempt to deal with its subject. In France he was known as the author of a book on French military life, drawn from his own experience as a soldier; also of 'Les Petits Romantiques,' a collection of lives of painters, not including those of Delacroix and Delaroche, but of others who, without attaining to the reputation of those leaders, did interesting and excellent work.

THE death is announced of M. Oliva, a sculptor patronized by Napoleon III.; also of M. F. Cinot, a Parisian painter of genre and military subjects, and M. Carl Bloch, the well-known Danish artist. M. Bloch obtained a first-class medal at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, and the Legion of Honour in the same year.

ALTHOUGH we cannot, of course, test the permanency of the pigments sent to us for review by the Aston Chemical Company, Lichfield Works, Birmingham, of whose "Eyekium," a vehicle of many good qualities, we have already spoken, we can say that nearly all the tubes in question contain examples which are exceptionally pure and bright, possessed of excellent body, and work freely with brushes. The tints bear new names, such as "Perfect White," which, so far as we have means of knowing, has the best qualities of "Flake White" and none of its shortcomings. It is guaranteed to contain no lead, yet works softly with ample substance, favouring the employment of copal and other vehicles; it certainly has no thinness of body nor the coldness of colour which is objectionable in "Zinc White." It seems to suit a firm touch better than "Barytic White." The company's "Venetian Red" is very nearly the same as the time-honoured pigment, and otherwise inclines, but very slightly, to orange. "Titus Red," a semi-opaque material, is likely to be acceptable on account of its brownness infused to brick-red. "Libyan Red" promises well, and has a soupeur of purple somewhat paler than that of "Indian Red"; it does not seem to have so much body as that potent pigment possesses. Chromatically speaking, "Primrose Yellow" justifies its name in exhibiting a dash of green with the delicate paleness of "Light Chrome." "Chrome Green, Opaque Oxide," takes kindly to the brush, and, with much body, spreads well without losing substance. "Cobalt Black" is a little oily; this may be due to the grinder, but its brilliancy and intensity of what Sir Thomas Browne called "nigritude" are obvious. Its permanency and drying are averred to be thorough. The bluish green called "Holly Leaf" is pleasant, but, so far as its tint goes, is well within the compass of palettes already current. Other tubes contain "Sparrow Brown," which is chromatically desirable; "Terra Cotta"; "Shadow Drab," a promising article with new qualities it would be difficult to imitate; "Cinnamon Brown"; "Roan Brown," which is clear and reddish; and "Golden Brown," which is a little lighter than the local tint of "Bone Brown," and has more body. The promoters say much in favour of their "Bariocyanin," a blue between ultramarine and Prussian blue with a sub-tint of green; it certainly has a good and firm body. Speaking generally, and entirely within the unavoidable limits of our examination of these pigments, we are able to recommend them to painters as worthy of careful trials. Mr. H. C. Standage is the godfather of the materials, which were manufactured under his superintendence, and from minerals alone, without having recourse to organic compounds of any kind whatever, such as sepia, cochineal, dragon's blood, and gamboge. Of course, we know that even gamboge, when properly "locked up" in copal, has stood unchanged for forty years. When Reynolds—awful to relate—actually compounded a glaze of gamboge and dragon's blood we do not know what he expected would happen, but there is a sad residuum in all the pictures in which he employed this marvellous composition.

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—London Symphony Concerts. The Bach Choir.

MR. HENSCHEL should be congratulated upon the highly satisfactory termination of the fourth season of his Symphony Concerts. An excellent programme again attracted a large audience, and the orchestral playing was, on the whole, superior to that at any previous concert. The first part consisted of Brahms's 'Akademische' Overture and Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, both of which received a large amount of justice; but the greatest triumph was won in Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' which we have rarely heard more delicately played even under Herr Richter. Mr. Henschel's first violins are not, on the whole, of the best quality, but on this occasion the ensemble was almost perfect. The 'Charfreitagszauber' from 'Parsifal' and the 'Kaiser March' completed the programme. A further series of concerts is announced to take place next winter, and it is understood that Mr. Henschel will dispense with the support of a guarantee fund. This is so far satisfactory, and if he is careful in the selection of his programmes, and maintains the standard of excellence in performance attained at the last two or three concerts, there need be no fear of the result.

The concert given by the Bach Choir on Tuesday evening was in every respect worthy of the society. The programme was uncompromising, consisting as it did entirely of Bach's music; but the audience was not only large, but evidently interested in the work presented, much of which was new to the general public. The last remark applies to the first item, the church cantata for Easter Day, "Christ lag in Todesbanden." This was probably written in 1724, the year after Bach's appointment in Leipzig, and, though not among the most effective in an æsthetic sense, it illustrates his genius as well as any of the church cantatas. Taking as his text a choral which existed in a modified form as far back as the twelfth century, he has made it the basis of six movements, all in the same key, E minor, but differing widely in general character. In the first and fourth the choral is used as a canto fermo by the soprano and alto respectively, the other voices supplying florid counterpoint. In the second the theme is cut into fragments, which form the material of a soprano and alto duet. In the third it becomes a tenor solo with florid accompaniment, and in the fifth a bass solo, likewise with florid accompaniment, but quite different in style. The sixth might almost be termed a two-part fugue for soprano and tenor with independent accompaniment, and then the last verse of the hymn is sung in four-part harmony, according to Bach's usual custom. An essay might be written upon the marvellous ingenuity displayed in this series of variations, but the work is not only remarkable for its wealth of contrivance; the words are expressively illustrated in a variety of ways, of which one may be mentioned. In the bass solo, at the word "death," the voices have to skip the unusual interval of a diminished twelfth from B above the staff to E sharp below it. With a number of fine, sonorous voices the effect of this would be startling. Unfortunately, the Bach Choir basses were feeble and uncertain, as were the tenors in this work. Another novelty, however, the eight-part unaccompanied motet "Der Geist hilft unser Schwachheit auf," written for the funeral of Ernesti, the rector of St. Thomas's Church, in 1729, received an excellent interpretation. The balance was good, and notwithstanding the length and elaboration of the piece, the pitch was well maintained. The cantata 'Wachet auf,' first performed last season (Athen. No. 3202), was worthy of repetition, as it is one of the most beautiful and generally effective of the entire series. The duets for soprano and baritone were expressively sung by Miss Liza Lehmann and Mr. Plunket Greene; and it may also be mentioned that Miss Lehmann gave an effective rendering of the air "Ich will dir mein Herze schenken," with oboi d'amore accompaniment, from the St. Matthew Passion music. To complete the programme, Herr Joachim gave an extraordinarily fine performance of the Violin Sonata in C, and joined his former pupil Mr. Richard Gompertz in the Concerto in D minor for two violins. Prof. Villiers Stanford conducted the concert, which was, on the whole, one of the most interesting ever given by the Bach Choir.

Musical Gossip.

THERE is little to be said concerning the Popular Concerts on Saturday and Monday last. On the former occasion the instrumental works were Mozart's Quartet in C, No. 6; Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Op. 97; and Tartini's violin sonata, 'Il Trillo del Diavolo,' which Herr Joachim might well allow to rest for a time. Miss Zimmermann, who was the pianist at this concert, played Schumann's Toccata in C, Op. 7, and the Romance in F sharp, Op. 28, No. 2, in a manner that certainly calls for no adverse remark; and Mrs.

Henschel sang Liszt's song 'Die Lorelei' with charming expression.

ON Monday the most interesting item was Brahms's Sonata in D minor for piano and violin, Op. 108. We have commented upon this musicianly and, as regards the second and third movements, inspired example of the greatest of living German composers, and have, therefore, merely to record a singularly intelligent performance by Miss Fanny Davies and Herr Joachim. The audience had again to content itself with trifling pianoforte solos, Miss Davies playing two of Mendelssohn's smaller pieces. Beethoven's Quartet in B flat, Op. 18, No. 6, and Mozart's Trio in E, No. 6, were included in the programme. Mr. Norman Salmond seemed ill at ease in his first song, but he sang two of Schumann's Lieder with refinement, though with scarcely sufficient expression.

LAST Saturday's Crystal Palace programme contained little worthy of note. It commenced with Mr. Edward German's Overture to 'Richard III,' composed for the recent revival at the Globe Theatre. The piece contains some excellent ideas treated in a musicianly manner, but the scoring is rather monotonous, little effective use being made of the wood wind. The symphony was Schumann's in C, No. 2, the performance of which was superb; and Lady Halle played Spohr's 'Scena Cantata' and Handel's Violin Sonata in A in a manner equally above criticism. The vocalist was Miss Lucile Hill, who displayed a powerful soprano voice in 'Hear ye, Israel,' and the waltz from Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette.' The fact that she sang out of tune at times was probably attributable to nervousness.

THE concert given by the Royal Academy of Music in St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon was, on the whole, creditable to the institution. Miss Grace Henshaw (Liszt Scholar) and Miss Maud Rihl (Thalberg Scholar) were the most promising of the pianists, and Miss Florence Hughes, soprano, Miss Helen Saunders, mezzo-soprano, and Mr. Edwin Houghton, tenor, of the vocalists. The three students last named should develop into competent artists. A careful performance of Mendelssohn's Quartet in B minor, Op. 3, by Messrs. Fox, Walenn, Dyson, and Parker, deserves mention. We note that a committee of the students has decided to issue a monthly paper, to be called the Overture, dealing principally with the affairs of the Academy. The idea is a good one, and as Mr. Corder is to be the editor, the publication is certain to be conducted with spirit. The first number will appear in March.

MISS GEISLER-SCHUBERT and Miss Fillunger gave the second of their chamber concerts at the Princes' Hall on Wednesday afternoon before a large audience. The pianist was heard to much greater advantage in some of Schubert's Impromptus than in Beethoven's great Trio in B flat, Op. 97, which demands more breadth and intellectuality as well as more physical power than are at her command. Miss Fillunger's rendering of three Lieder by Beethoven and three by Schubert deserves unstinted praise.

MR. DANNREUTHER's twentieth series of Musical Evenings came to an end on Thursday, the programme including Sgambati's Quintet in B flat, Op. 5, Brahms's in F minor, Op. 34, Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, and a duet from Berlioz's 'Les Troyens.'

THE Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society gave their second concert for the present season at St. James's Hall on Saturday last. Highly commendable performances were given of Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, the Overture to 'Preciosa,' &c., under Mr. Norfolk Megone's direction. The Society continues to make satisfactory progress.

THE seven weeks' season of the Carl Rosa Company at Liverpool ended last Saturday, and is said to have been highly successful artistically and financially. We have already noted the additions to the repertory, which, however, did not include Bizet's 'Pearl Fishers' or Balfe's 'Talisman,' as promised in the prospectus. Next week the company go to Manchester for a month, and will then come to London, for the first time since 1887. It is probable that the season at Drury Lane will open on Easter Eve instead of Easter Monday.

We have received the fourth issue of Mr. Hermann Klein's Musical Notes (Novello, Ewer & Co.). It gives an admirable survey of musical work in London during last year, and its value has been increased by the addition of a series of notes from several provincial centres, including Birmingham, Bristol, Cambridge, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, Oxford, and Yorkshire. As a work of reference, the usefulness of the book is, of course, considerable, and it is written in a fluent, readable style, which adds to its attractiveness.

The programme of Sir Charles Halle's Manchester concert on Thursday included Raff's 'Winter' Symphony, the last work written by the deceased composer; Bach's Concerto for two violins; and Spohr's Duo Concertante for violins, the last two works played by Herr Joachim and Lady Halle.

THE production of 'Lohengrin' at the Argentina Theatre, Rome, is said to be a fiasco in consequence of the deplorable nature of the chorus and orchestra. Those who are acquainted with the general condition of Italian lyric theatres at the present time can easily believe this statement.

A NEW theatre is to be built at Barcelona in memory of the late Signor Gayerre. It will, of course, bear his name.

It is stated that a mass by Cimarosa, quite unknown to European musicians, has lately been performed at San Francisco. It is written for solo voices, organ, strings, and horns.

HERR RICHTER will conduct the Lower Rhine Festival, which will be held this year in Düsseldorf.

THE WEEK.

GARRICK.—'A Pair of Spectacles,' a Comedy in Three Acts. From the French by Sydney Grundy.—Revival of 'Dream Faces,' a Dramatic Fancy in One Act. By Wynn Miller.

ST. JAMES'S.—'As You Like It.'

A LINE in 'Les Petits Oiseaux' of MM. Labiche and Delacour has supplied Mr. Grundy with a title for his adaptation of that piece, and also with a change of motive that converts into fantasy what in the original is exaggeration. Blandinet, the hero of a comedy first produced at the Vaudeville on April 1st, 1862, says in self-defence to his wife, "La vie est une promenade... j'ai reconnu que le chemin était mauvais... et je porte des lunettes." The work in which these words occur depicts the meeting between two brothers after an interval of some years. One, who is retired from business and has married a young wife, is of an indiscreet and effusive generosity, believing and trusting every one around him; the other, a manufacturer at Elboeuf, a hardened worshipper of the practical, believes no more than he sees. In the brief intercourse that follows the worldly nature, for a while at least, obtains the ascendancy. Finding that he has been deceived in one or two cases, Blandinet, the Benjamin Goldfinch of Mr. Grundy's adaptation, grows suspicious of all around him, and is on the point of becoming as great a churl as his brother. Fortunately a report that financial disaster has befallen him gets accidentally spread abroad, and such proofs of generosity and affection are showered upon him as compulsorily restore his former faith. Here is a simple and, it must be confessed, not very convincing theory of existence. By the use of spectacles Mr. Grundy evolves a piece with a sort of underlying element of diablerie, as in 'La Canne de M. de Balzac.' Benjamin Goldfinch enters on the stage with a pair of gold spectacles of portentous size through which the world presents itself in roseate hues. These he loses in the course of a rather convivial dinner at Brébant's, and as he is unable to dispense with glasses, he borrows the horn spectacles of his brother. Through these the world seems pitiful and base, and he hardens his heart against it, finding a delight even in tracing out the meannesses of those around him and impaling as specimens the degraded creatures with whom he deals. With the recovery of his old glasses comes the restoration of ancient faith. His brother Gregory, meanwhile, deprived temporarily of the noxious lenses, acquires some humanizing traits, and in the end puts in some claim to our sympathy.

The piece thus obtained is curious. Farcical it is to be feared in teaching, and approaching caricature in characterization, it is none the less tender as well as amusing, and the laughter which it provokes is now and then interrupted by a sigh. Mr. Grundy has gone beyond his original in the happiness of his dialogue; he has dropped some risky scenes without supplying anything very intelligible in their place, and has accentuated both characters and incidents. He has produced, however, a play which is decidedly entertaining and is well acted. Mr. Hare's Benjamin Goldfinch is an admirable representation, thoroughly artistic and capable. Nothing yet done by an actor who has a special gift of producing breadth of effect by means of minuteness of detail has been quite so good as this performance. Mr. Charles Groves was effective as Uncle Gregory. The prototypes of these two characters were "created" by MM. Numa and Parade. Mr. Sydney Brough was seen to advantage in a juvenile rôle first taken by M. Saint-Germain, but reduced in the English version to comparative insignificance. Miss Kate Rorke and other members of the company took part in a representation that can be highly praised.

In 'Dream Faces,' by Mr. Wynn Miller, which had been previously seen at Terry's Theatre on the afternoon of November 1st, 1888, Mr. Forbes Robertson and Miss Carlotta Addison also played in excellent style. The play, if slight, is touching, and with the interpretation afforded it distinctly strengthens the bill. Mr. Hare is to be congratulated upon setting before the public performances which no foreign theatre need wish to disown.

The representation of 'As You Like It' at the St. James's Theatre is much better than was to be expected when the conditions were taken into account. Intelligent supervision has been exercised, the mounting is tasteful and appropriate without being burdensome, the general disposition is capable, and the acting competent. Much of the praise for this is due to Mr. Wingfield, who has insisted upon restorations of the text and dismissal of the abuses which have slowly crept into the acting version. During her long absence Mrs. Langtry has improved to a remarkable extent. Taking her departure as a novice of promise, she returns an actress. The aroma with which one or two actresses have invested Rosalind she does not seek to give. In her hands Rosalind is a handsome, high-spirited woman, passionately enamoured; but the passion is human and convincing, and noways ethereal. There is poetry in the conception, though it is not the poetry we are accustomed to find, and there is a good deal of brightness and fascination. Of the remaining characters most were competent, though few call for special notice. Mr. Arthur Bourchier was a pleasing and an unconventional Jaques; Mr. Sugden's Touchstone had character, though some of the lines were haltingly delivered; and Miss McNeil, Miss Lamb, Mr. Cautley, Mr. Canning, Mr. Everill, and other actors were seen to advantage. The Audrey of Miss Marion Lea was a complete revelation. So much comedy and prettiness of an appropriately bucolic kind have not in our memory been assigned the character. By the restoration of Hymen and by the pretty concluding dance Mr. Wingfield adds greatly to the attractions of the play.

Dramatic Gossip.

'ADRIENNE LECOUCREUR' was given for a benefit on Tuesday afternoon at the Globe, with Miss Wallis as the heroine, with Mr. F. Terry as Maurice de Saxe, and Mr. Julian Cross as Michonnet. After this Misses Vera Beringer and Minnie Terry recited very touchingly 'On a Doorstep,' a pathetic poem, imitated by Mr. Clement Scott from Mrs. Browning's 'Cry of the Children.'

MRS. BERNARD BEERE, who watched on Saturday the changed programme at the Garrick, started the following morning for Monte Carlo to recruit after the exhausting run of 'La Tosca.'

MR. ARTHUR ROBERTS has withdrawn from the management of the Royalty Theatre, which is now closed.

MR. ALEXANDER's engagement at the Adelphi terminates on the 14th inst., and on the following day he will appear at the Avenue as Dr. Bill. Mr. Frederick Terry, who is thus set at liberty, is engaged at the Haymarket for Mr. Grundy's new piece, to be expected about Easter.

'NIXIE,' an extended version of 'Editha's Burglar,' is to be given on the afternoon of the 7th of April at Terry's Theatre, with Miss Lucy Webling as the child heroine.

'THE OLD HOMESTEAD,' a drama which has obtained much success in New York, is, it is said, to be given during the coming season in London.

LITERATURE

Oliver Cromwell, the Protector: an Appreciation based on Contemporary Evidence.
By Reginald F. D. Palgrave. (Sampson Low & Co.)

It is somewhere about five-and-forty years since Carlyle published the first edition of 'The Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell.' From the time of the Protector's death until the appearance of those memorable volumes there had always been a few who had cherished a loving reverence for the memory of that great ruler, but it must be admitted that they were very few indeed. Every foul term that malignity could invent, every foul story that profligacy could imagine, has been heaped upon his memory. It would be difficult to find any more marked instance of malignity long continued. The Tories hated him as a king-killer and an enemy of the Established Church. Whigs and reformers were well-nigh as violent, because he had not that reverence for republican forms which in their opinion was necessary to constitute a hero. Carlyle's book caused a great sensation—praise and blame were bestowed on it in abundance. It has taken its place in literature, and it is not in any way our duty to criticize it; we must remark, however, that though it removed a mass of falsehood and prejudice which it is terrible to contemplate, and convinced careful readers that whatever Oliver may have been he was a real man, not a mere incarnation of evil, hero-worshippers such as Carlyle are unfitted to write history, and his 'Cromwell,' beautiful as many passages in it are, is neither biography nor history in any coherent sense. In the first place, his depreciation of the sources for the Protector's biography is absurd in the extreme. The pamphlets of the day, though mostly the work of fierce partisans, are of priceless value; and even Clarendon—one of the most inaccurate of mortals, to use no stronger term—gives a picture of the times in which Oliver lived which no serious student can afford to overlook. The 'Letters and Speeches' are not "doctored," though there is here and there an instance of the meaning of a sentence being misapprehended; but the commentary which forms their setting is from end to end a tissue of violent laudation, calculated to do harm to the hero's memory with most readers who do not make history a serious study.

Though we do not remember that Mr. Palgrave anywhere says so, the book before us seems to have been written as an answer to Carlyle and the succeeding writers who have followed in his steps. Mr. Palgrave is no novice in the study of the history of the seventeenth century, and his learning and accomplishments are too well known to need panegyric. As was to be expected, his volume shows much reading and long study. We feel certain that for the time it will be widely read and assiduously quoted; yet we cannot believe that it, any more than its predecessor, will be considered to contain an impartial estimate of Cromwell's character.

Mr. Palgrave is as far as possible from imitating Carlyle's style; but his own is nearly as far removed from every-day English as that of his predecessor. This is, of course, but a slight drawback, which ought on no account to weigh with the student, but it must affect the feelings of that vague person "the general reader." It is not at all with Mr. Palgrave's style that we are inclined to quarrel; it is with his conclusions.

The introductory chapter, called "The Beginning of the Great Rebellion," is the only one to which we can give almost unlimited praise. In it Mr. Palgrave brings vividly before his readers the terrible dread of "Popery" which haunted the minds of men in a way which we can hardly conceive, though it will not seem so very strange to the old men we have still among us whose memories go back to the times immediately before Catholic Emancipation became an accomplished fact. There was, however, some excuse for Protestants becoming wild who had been told and believed that the Gunpowder Plot was a regularly organized Catholic conspiracy, in which clergy and laity were alike guilty accomplices, and whose only acquaintance with the horrors of the St. Bartholomew murders was derived from bitterly hostile sources. Not only was the hatred of the old religion extreme, but it was thought that the Roman Catholic population was much larger and more powerful than it was. We would in no way whatever endeavour to excuse the wild talk of the time; but remembering what was the state of nearly the whole of Europe during the seventeenth century, we may be thankful that England was spared the horrors of those long-continued religious wars which desolated France and Germany. It must be borne in mind moreover that the bickerings between Charles I. and his people did not relate to the Catholics only. That the High Churchmen of his days had any leanings towards Rome is certainly untrue; but men of the school of Hampden and Pym undoubtedly thought they had. More than all, there was the dread that Charles was doing his best by the aid of a most powerful and astute minister to establish a despotism. There were several Englishmen as well as Selden who were versed in continental history. They knew well enough that first one state on the Continent and then another had forfeited their liberties to their kings. These three causes were quite sufficient to make the Long Parliament no impartial judge of the situation, and to go very far towards destroying that sentiment of loyalty which in peaceful times was natural to the English people.

Mr. Palgrave does not begin his monograph with the commencement of the war. The fighting was over and Oliver Cromwell had been made Protector at the time when he takes up his career, therefore we are not troubled with the discussion of the moral or legal aspects of the king's trial and execution. The author judiciously assumes that his readers know the general history of Oliver's battles and of his dismissal of the Long Parliament. Yet had he found it necessary for his plan to follow the career of the future Protector from Charles's endeavour to seize the five members onwards, he would, we hope, have refrained from calling him a coward. This is what Mr. Palgrave says: "His [Cromwell's] tricks, evasions, his dodges to obtain delay, his abject submission in the end, showed that he was afraid. A trickster may command obedience, but not a coward." Of course when he writes thus Mr. Palgrave is thinking of moral, not physical cowardice. The two usually go together; but surely, whatever we may say of Cromwell's conduct in battle, the dissolution of the Long Parliament is one of the bravest actions with which history makes us acquainted. Not only did it manifest great physical courage—for all the members wore swords and knew how to use them, and many of them were fanatics to whom fear was unknown—but Cromwell must have known that when the action was done he had to make his case good to the army and to the nation—a task which before it was accomplished must have seemed to him one of extreme difficulty and danger.

Oliver's enemies have called him many ugly names, but since the ebullition of frenzy which distracted England on the return of the Stuarts, we do not remember that any one has ever ventured quite so far before in the way of depreciation as Mr. Palgrave has done in the volume before us. He often uses the word drudge with regard to Oliver in no complimentary manner. We believe on one occasion he used it of himself, meaning to imply the undoubted fact that he was wearing himself out in the service of his country. Gregory VII. (Hildebrand), Innocent III., and, if we remember aright, Thomas Beckett employed similar words—in Latin, of course—about themselves. No one thinks the worse of them for it. Why, then, should we interpret it in some evil sense of Oliver? Mr. Palgrave says that in the eyes of his contemporaries, "that he should be their drudge to them seemed in no way prodigious, for he seemed to them no prodigy." Perhaps not. Oliver is not the first person who has sacrificed his peace, health, and life for the good of his fellow creatures, and has not had flattering speeches made about him in return. That "the three great ones" who were around him were sometimes in opposition is true, that they never saw him as we see him is probable; but there is such a thing as historical perspective, and it is no paradox to say that, with the amount of evidence that exists as to his career, it may be not only possible, but probable, that one who has carefully studied his life with all the modern light, printed and manuscript, that has been handed down, may be a better judge of his character than many of those who saw him every day. It would, however, be very easy to produce a large mass of contemporary writing to show that there were many who admired and loved him while he was yet ruling. If we produced evidence of this sort it might well be called flattery. Every one knows what stupid stuff has been written about kings and even prime ministers whose only virtue has been that they have tickled the ears of a mob. Whatever his faults may have been, Oliver was no flatterer, neither was he a lover of flattery. After his death opinion was shackled for many years, and we are consequently debarred from everything but outpourings of the odious kind of which Heath's works are a type; but though men could not print, they could talk and write. Charnock, the Puritan divine, after the catastrophe of the Restoration had come about, was accustomed to "express his persuasion that God would one day own the Cromwellian family." And a sincere but moderate Dissenter, the author of the 'Life of Ambrose Barnes,' which was printed from the original MS. by the Surtees Society in 1867, speaks in terms of respect, indeed almost of admiration, of the Protector.

It is impossible to follow Mr. Palgrave in all his charges. A reply would require a volume far larger than the work before us. It will have to be done some time, but it will be a long and wearisome labour. Where all is black it is very difficult to know where to begin. The conception that Mr. Palgrave has formed of Cromwell seems to be that he was of a nature so ambitious that no evil action stood in the way of his endeavours to gain the throne and establish his family thereon. The whole of his short reign was full of desperate plots, some to murder the Protector, all with the ultimate end either of putting the young man over the water on the throne, or of establishing a sort of democratic government which no one can believe would have held together for many months. Though Mr. Palgrave appears to believe that he was cruel, we find him in many cases pardoning plotters some of whom cannot have been spies. The truth of the matter is simply this. The Cavaliers were enraged at defeat, and especially by the trial and execution of the king, and took to murder when they saw there was no chance of overthrowing the Government by lawful warfare. Has Mr. Palgrave forgotten the murder of Dorislaus at the Hague, of Rainborowe at Doncaster, Lisle in Switzerland, and Manning at Dymwald? That the Protector employed spies is true; but will any one in his senses blame a chief magistrate, king, protector, or president, for taking the necessary measures to preserve his own life and the safety of the State? The soldier who had fought through years of battle, often amid the greatest personal danger, cannot have been a coward, but he would have been an idiot had he not taken means for his own protection.

Mr. Palgrave thinks that because we have Thurloe's State Papers we have all the documents which relate to Oliver's correspondence. Here he is surely mistaken. Oliver's private papers, we fear, have perished. If the documents that remained in his own custody should ever be found—a thing too miraculous to hope for—much that is now dark might be made light. We have, however, sufficient already to make us certain that the Protectoral government was carried on in a manner very much more just and mild than that of succeeding times. We believe we are correct in stating, though we have mislaid the reference to the authority, that during the reign of Oliver traitors were simply hanged or beheaded, and that the horrible death by torture for that crime was one of the blessings England recovered by the Restoration.

That Oliver was much more tolerant than those who went before him is certainly true. If Challoner's list may be trusted, as we believe it may, there was but one Catholic priest—John Southworth—put to death during his reign. The same authority gives five for 1616, eight for 1642, seven for 1646. Upwards of twenty priests and laymen suffered for their religion on account of the Popish Plot. In early life, of course, Cromwell was a strict Calvinist, but in later years his opinions seem to have become less rigid. He was certainly far too tender-hearted to shed blood in England when he did not feel absolutely bound to do so. The real blot on his otherwise noble character was the terrible Irish campaign; exaggerated they have been, but nothing can excuse the atrocities which he sometimes ordered and at others could have hindered. An explanation can, of course, be given of these things, but they are beyond excuse.

Mr. Palgrave thinks that at the last Cromwell was baffled, and that if death had not released him from his toils power would have slipped from his hands. No doubt he could hardly have maintained his then position. He had, we feel sure, a very strong desire to avoid the kingly title, yet events were moving in that direction, and there is reason to believe that if his life had been spared a few months longer he would have assumed the title of king or, as some of his well-informed contemporaries thought, of emperor.

Echoes from the 'Oxford Magazine.' (Frowde.)

It is not long since a collection of Cambridge wit and humour, entitled 'In Cap and Gown,' was reviewed in these columns; and now the public is presented with a volume of a similar character from the sister university. There is this difference between them, however, that whereas the Cambridge selection ranges over three centuries, the Oxford volume is confined to the last seven years, and thus represents little more than a single generation of university life. It is not given to every generation to produce a Calverley or Trevelyan, and there is nothing in this collection which is quite equal to the standard of the first named, at any rate; but it contains several pieces of high merit, and is distinctly amusing throughout.

There are two writers whose names predominate in this volume, and to whom it owes its general character and most of its merit. The first is "Q" (Mr. A. T. Q. Couch, of Trinity), who is already known as the author of certain ingenious and readable romances in the styles of Mr. Stevenson and other novelists; and the other is Mr. A. D. Godley, of Magdalen. The strong point of both is parody, but their domains are different; for while "Q," as his novels might have led one to suspect, has a pretty gift in catching the manner of an English author, Mr. Godley's preference is for the ancient classical writers, whom he reproduces with great dexterity, whether in their original tongue or in the guise of fictitious translation. From "Q" we get the tones of Wordsworth, Browning, Lord Tennyson, Cowper (an ingenious reproduction of a style not very easy to catch), Poe, Whitman, Fraed, and many more; Mr. Godley gives us Homer, Aristotle, Tacitus, and Virgil. They meet on common ground in Bret Harte; and here it must be admitted that Mr. Godley has the advantage.

Parodies of classical authors, however, particularly when veiled in the decent obscurity of a learned language, do not appeal forcibly to the world at large; and to this it must be added that there is a large number of local allusions which will only be fully intelligible to those who have been resident at Oxford within the last few years. Who that has forgotten (or, perchance, never knew) his 'Ethics,' and is unacquainted with the epidemic growth of golf among the senior members of the University (so that it is said that even heads of houses have been heard "full of strange oaths" on the links at Cowley), will fully appreciate the beauty of the following Aristotelian fragment?—

"Again, every art and every method, and likewise every action and intention aims at the good. Some, therefore, making a syllogism, aim at a Professor: for Professors, they say, are good (because dry things are good for men, as has been said in the 'Ethics'), and this is a Professor: but perhaps they make a wrong use of the major premise. At any rate, having hit him, it is better to act in some such way as this, not, as tragedians, seek a recognition (ἀπαγορεύσις); for this is most unpleasant (μυρόν), and perhaps leads to a catastrophe. It is doubted, whether the man who killed his tutor with a golf-ball acted voluntarily or involuntarily; for on the one hand he did not do it deliberately, since no one deliberates about the results of chance, as, for instance, whether one will hit the ball this time at any rate or not: yet he wished to kill him, and was glad having done it: and probably on the whole it was a mixed action."

The best of all Mr. Godley's contributions, in our judgment, is a certain fragment on a recent disturbance at New College, which is the most perfect parody of the style of Tacitus that we have ever seen; but the allusions in this are too esoteric to be generally comprehensible. The 'Carmen Qualiteri Map,' however, should appeal to all, and we must quote most of it:—

Otiosus homo sum: cano laudes oti:
Qui laborem cupiunt procul sint remoti:
Ipse sum adversus hunc rationi toti:
Pariter insaniant ac si essent poti.

Nota discunt alii remigandi iura,
Qua premendus arte sit venter inter crura:
Hec est vite ratio longe nimis dura:
Nulla nobis cutis est deterenda cura.

Habitu levissim o magna pars induto
Pellunt pilas pedibus, concidunt in luto:
Hos, si potest fieri, stultiores puto
Atque tantum similes animali bruto.

Mihi cum ut subeam Moderationes
Tutor suadet anxius, "Frustra," inquam, "mones:
Per me licet ignibus universas dones
Æschyli palmaris emendationes!"

Ego insanissimos reor insanorum
Mane tempus esse qui dicunt laborum:
Optimum omnium bonorum:
Ante diem medium non relinquo torum.

Ergo iam donabimus hoc præceptum gratis
Vobis membris omnibus Universitatis,
Dominis Doctoribus, Undergraduatibus—
I professores cura sit omnes ut fiat.

To return to our mother tongue. The best of the verse pieces, as we said above, are by "Q," and many of these are undeniably clever. It is a mistake, however, to attempt to reproduce such authors as Calverley and Praed. It is impossible to parody them, in the proper sense of the term; and to write verses in a similar style on a similar subject is to court unfavourable comparisons. Hence one of "Q's" least successful pieces is his 'Letter' of invitation to Commemoration, which is a close imitation of 'Our Ball.' The answer of the young lady thus invited, which is signed "X. Y. Z." (a pseudonym of which no interpretation is given), is a much happier composition, as it less distinctly challenges comparison with Praed. Far more favourable specimens of Mr. Couch's gifts are found in the parodies on Browning, Cowper, and Wordsworth. The former is entitled 'Caliban upon Rudiments; or, Autoschediastic Theology in a Hole,' wherein, as a note informs us, Caliban museth of the now extinct examination in the Rudiments of Faith and Religion (an examination, it may be explained, in elementary Biblical knowledge, which produced more than its fair share of voluntary and involuntary humour):—

Rudiments, Rudiments, and Rudiments!

'Thinketh one made them i' the fit o' the blues.

'Thinketh, one made them with the "tips" to match,

But not the answers; 'doubteth there be none,
Only Guides, Helps, Analyses, such as that:
Also this Beast, that groweth sleek thereon,
And snow-white bands that round the neck o' the same.

'Thinketh, it came of being ill at ease.

'Hath heard that Satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands, and the rest o'. That's the case.
Also 'hath heard they pop the names i' the hat,
Toss out a brace, a dozen stick inside;
Let forty through and plough the sorry rest.

'Thinketh, such shows nor right nor wrong in them,
Only their strength, being made o' sloth i' the main—

'Am strong myself compared to yonder names
O' Jewish towns i' the paper. Watch th' event—
'Let twenty pass, 'have a shot at the twenty-first,
'Miss Ramoth-Gilead, 'take Jehoiakim,
'Let Abner by and spot Melchizedek,
Knowing not, caring not, just choosing so,
As it likes me each time, I do; so they.

'Will say a plain word if he gets a plough.

Mr. Couch has one gift, in common with Calverley and Praed, which is a sign of powers beyond that of mere parody—that, namely, of interweaving lines of real beauty among his humorous verses. This is exemplified in two pretty seventeenth century lyrics, and in the concluding verses of 'Kenmare River':—

'Twas pretty to be by blue Killarney,

'Twas pretty to hear the linnet's call,
But whist! for I cannot attend their blarney
Nor whistle in answer at all, at all.

For the voice that he swore 'ad out-call the linnet's
Is cracked intirely, an' out of chune,
Since the clock-work missed it by thirteen minutes
An' scattered me Phelim around the moon
Aroon, Aroon!

A volume of this kind is necessarily of a somewhat esoteric character, and will be most enjoyed by university men, and especially by those who have had experience of the past decade of Oxford life. It is not likely that any of the pieces contained in it will become classical, but there are many which contain real humour and talent.

What are perhaps the best of all, the classical parodies of Mr. Godley, necessarily appeal to the smallest audience. The selection must, on the whole, have been made with judgment, as there are not many pieces in the volume which one would wish away, and considering the different ideas which different people have as to what is humorous, this is perhaps surprising. On the other hand, there are several pieces in addition to those already quoted which are distinctly above the average of university wit and humour. Among these may be enumerated the English compositions of Mr. Godley, which, though not so unique as his classical work, are always amusing; two happy Chaucerian character-sketches by Mr. C. G. Fagan, of Queen's; two Baconian essays by Mr. C. E. Montague, of Balliol; and a ballad (somewhat obscure to the uninitiated) in the manner of Hans Breitmann relating to the newly established mounted infantry and cyclist corps, by "S. T." (Mr. Greene, of Magdalen). Since the days of the Oxford Spectator and the Sholover Papers there has been no equally satisfactory publication of the kind at Oxford, and Cambridge, with Sir George Trevelyan and 'Horace at Athens,' and Mr. Hilton and the Light Green, has taken a decided lead. The present volume does much to redress the balance, which, if Calverley (who, it may be remembered, belonged to both universities) be eliminated from the calculation, is, on the whole, fairly even.

Trial by Combat. By George Neilson. (Glasgow, Hodge & Co.)

In the 350 pages of this book a plain, straightforward attempt is made, so far as Great Britain is concerned, to write the history of a remarkable European institution. Mr. Neilson has secured a new theme, for there has not previously been any monograph in English on trial by combat. The book that he has produced is sufficient for the purpose. It bears constant proof of careful and discriminating reading, and will prove convenient and useful as a handbook for reference. Moreover, it is well and tersely written, and, as there is not an ounce of padding, the brief chapters make a telling narrative. Even certain students of English and Scotch history will probably be surprised by the nature, frequency, and long survival of these legal appeals to the duel, whilst the ordinary reader will be almost startled at the weird customs and gruesome incidents revealed in these pages, though all garnishment or word painting seems studiously avoided. "Trial by combat," says Mr. Neilson,

"came into existence—no tradition knows when. It had attained a vigorous manhood among the tribes of northern Europe before their written history began. It reached its legal prime in the early feudal ages, and enjoyed a new era of activity under the auspices of later chivalry. Its hardy constitution enabled it to set at naught the attacks of time, religion, and civilization, till it was a hoary-headed anachronism long surviving its usefulness. Ordeals of various kinds, in their essence a passive appeal to the power of nature as the voice of God, once formed part of the judicial system of almost every nation, whether of the east or west. Trial by combat, on the contrary, in which the litigants were instruments in the appeal as well as subjects of it, had no such universality. Angry men have fought from the beginning, and will fight until the end. But trial by combat, a deliberate staking of a plea upon the issue of a duel, is a different and far higher thing. It was not known to the Oriental races until after contact with the nascent chivalry of the west. It did not exist among the ancient Egyptians. We must reject, as Pope Nicholas I. did in the year 867, the argument that it was divinely instituted when David with his sling slew the mighty man of war of the Philistines. It was not practised by the Greeks. It was a department of jurisprudence which found no place in the codes of Roman emperors or in the treatises of Roman jurists. It is true that it comes to the front in history at a time when the mistress of the world began to 'droop and slowly die upon her throne,' but it was not a growth likely to spring from the decaying tissues of a high civilization grown corrupt. Its roots must be sought in lands inhabited by a people not yet advanced beyond the barbarian stage."

But whatever its origin, this trial by combat held its ground firmly both in England and Scotland for centuries; and though its strictly legal nature began to decay in the fourteenth century, it was long in the dying, for it was put in practice in the sixteenth century, and saved more than one criminal from the gallows within the memory of men now living. The most remarkable and perhaps least known feature of this custom was the use made of it in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries towards men who betrayed their accomplices and became king's evidence. The approver was turned into a quasi-officer of justice, and had to prove the truth of his charge, and presumably also the sincerity of his own repentance, by giving battle to his former companion or companions in crime. But a further development of the duties of approver strikes us as decidedly astonishing. The king could grant life and limb to a confessed criminal contingently on his ridding the country of five malefactors in as many battles. Such successive battles were by no means unusual. We have referred to the Patent Rolls in a case quoted by Mr. Neilson of the year 1213, and find that at Stafford one Hobbe-the-Werewede, an approver, engaged in legal combat with Walter-in-the-Grove, and was successful, but that he was vanquished by Thomas-with-Gold in the second combat, and his life forfeited. In 1221 a horse stealer actually fought five battles with as many malefactors, claimed his pardon, and was permitted to go into exile.

Interesting particulars are given in these pages of the case that is considered the last approver's duel, which was fought in 1456. Whithorn, a thief, was imprisoned at Winchester. To save his life he made a series of appeals against honest men, some of whom were hanged. He received three-halfpence a day from the king, a salary which he drew for nearly three years whilst still in gaol as a general approver. At last he falsely charged James Fisher, who challenged him to combat. The judge, according to Lord Mayor Gregory's account printed by the Camden Society, laid down remarkable conditions. If Whithorn prevailed, he would go back to prison, but have better fare than before, being allowed twopence per day. The combatants were to be clad all over in white sheep's leather, and to be armed with a staff of green ash three feet long, provided at one end with a sharp horn of iron. If Fisher prevailed to the extent of killing Whithorn, he was to be hanged for manslaughter, "by soo moche that he hathe slayne the kyngys prover." When the combat began the defendant broke his staff at the first blow, but the officers took away the approver's weapon after he had struck one return blow. Then ensued a sickening contest, sickeningly described—too much, we should think, even for the taste of the Pelican Club. The men fought with their fists and rested, and then fought and rested again. Then "they wente togedyr by the neckys," and with their teeth tore each other's leathern coats and the flesh beneath. The end seemed to have come when Whithorn cast Fisher on the ground; but in the deadly wrestle, more by hap than strength, "that innocent recoveryd up on his kneys, and toke that fals peler (appealer) by the nose with hys tethe, and put hys thombe in hys yee, that the peler cryde owte and prayde hym of marcy, for he was fals unto God and unto hym." Thus ended the duel, and the judge pronounced sentence upon the approver, whose fate is thus piously recorded,—“and thenn he was confesseyd ande hanggyd, of whos soule God have marcy. Amen.”

This wretched quasi-judicial struggle died out in actual practice in the sixteenth century. In Spain the last judicial duel was fought in 1522, and long afterwards formed the subject of a play of Calderon's; whilst in France the language gained a new phrase, the coup de Jarnac, in 1547, from the underhand blow which decided the last legal duel in that kingdom. The Council of Trent solemnly condemned the wager of battle, and hence it disappeared in the countries subject to the Roman obedience. This is the real reason, not mentioned by Mr. Neilson, why trial by combat disappeared on the Continent and lingered on in Great Britain. It was reserved to Scotland to have the questionable honour of being the last European country in which a judicial battle was fought. So late as February, 1597, Adam Bruntfeld engaged James Carmichael, for the charge of murdering his brother, at Barnbogill Links, before five thousand gentlemen, and, though "bot ane yong man and of mean stature," slew the said James, "he being as abill a like man as was leving."

Though no part of Great Britain or Ireland was the scene of an actual judicial combat later than 1597, the law permitting trial per corpus as well as per patriam remained in force for more than two centuries later. In Ireland, in 1815, a murderer named Clancy escaped the gallows by a sudden offer of battle that was not accepted. When a like wager of battle was made in England before Lord Ellenborough on November 17th, 1817, Abraham Thornton challenging the brother of Mary Ashford, whom he was accused of murdering, and thus escaping, it was found to be high time to alter the law. In 1819, 59 Geo. III. cap. 46 put an end not only to trial by battle, but to the possibility of pleading it. The private duel yet lingers in some states of Europe on a quasi-legal basis, but probably this, too, will before long follow trial by combat into the limbo of the antiquated past.

A longer study of documents at the Public Record Office might have given Mr. Neilson a little more trustworthy information with regard to some of the famous cases he cites—as, for instance, in the celebrated encounter in 1350 between Sir John de Visconti and Sir Thomas de la Marche, "bastardus de Francie," or in the case of the lawyers' duel at Smithfield before the boy king Henry VI. in 1430. Further search in that repository might have brought other interesting cases to light not hitherto named, such as the duel at Carlisle in 1403 between two Englishmen and two Scotchmen on a question of calumny, with the Earl of Westmoreland and his son John as judges; but quite enough has been given to make a good book, and to fill a place hitherto left vacant.

'DULCIBEL' is evidently the work of a beginner, and Miss Hayward would have done much better if she had restricted to one volume her pretty little domestic chronicle of the loves and sufferings of some very young and inexperienced people, whose intentions are all excellent, and whose mistakes are such as might be expected from their tender years and romantic leanings. Those who live long enough, however, appear to become satisfactorily wiser as they grow older. The reader, who must all along suffer from an oppressive sense of his own maturity if over twenty-one, is greatly relieved to find that a day dawns at last for the bereaved heroine when her most desirable admirer no longer seems immeasurably removed from her by the weight of eight years' difference in their ages and his six or seven and twenty summers. Miss Hayward must guard against an evident tendency to morbidness which is observable throughout the book. The whole episode of the dying Chris Jocelyn's engagement to the heroine is a shock to grown-up sensibilities and principles. There is all the difference between mere sentimentality and real pathos in this part of the story, and in the short and much stronger account of Mr. Carwinion's bereavement which occurs early in the first volume. Michael Carwinion is well though slightly sketched.

"Cecil Darrell died at Mont le Bandau before his haughty brother could reach him, or, at least, after he was speechless." We should hardly have inferred from this sentence that Lemaire the usurer intended to convey that Cecil was speechless before his brother could reach him, but such seems to have been his purpose. As a matter of fact, Cecil did not die, and the calculations of Lemaire and others were entirely wrong. There is nothing to distinguish Miss Drewry's story from other more or less ingenious tales of incident, except the rather frequent recurrence of such conundrums as the above, and the curious persistence with which Max Darrell hunts down the man who wrecked his younger brother's happiness. All the elaborate process of tempting Digby Arden to play, advancing him money under a false name, &c., is very unlike the chivalrous character "dear Max" is supposed to be. A shorter course with Madeline's seducer would have been quite consistent with Max's pledge to his dying mother; and when all his stage business and mystery is over, he is just in the same position, as far as one can see, as if he had never concealed the fact of his brother's existence—only he has given his wife good cause for bitter indignation. However, the story would be nothing without all the gushing between the brothers, and some people may read it without any sense of repugnance. All the characters belong to the great world, and it is interesting to know these magnificent people speak cheap French and bad English, and that to be seen walking down Highgate Hill at midnight is sufficient to destroy the moral reputation of an earl.

Mr. Hudson tells his readers what they are to expect when he describes his new novel as a story of the stable and the stage. The hero of 'Running Double,' who is an Irishman with a comfortable little property and a decided taste for London, owns a few horses, and is part proprietor of the Apollo Theatre. Two volumes are filled with the details of his fortune in both capacities; and the only other question of interest is how Mr. Hudson tells his tale. The theatrical chapters are concerned mainly with the barmaids, the pretty programme sellers, the dissipated "mashers" who ply the latter with drink, and the "curs" of critics who represent disreputable papers. The author's pictures from the front of the house may possibly be accurate enough, and they seem to be drawn from the life. So, no doubt, are the Irish scenes, which are by far the best part of the story. There is, in fact, a notable contrast between the English and Irish sections, the one being as natural and attractive as the other is garish and repellent.

It almost savours of sacrilege to attempt to criticize a work which is dedicated to a Russian grand duke, and bears on the title-page an awe-inspiring combination of initials. As it is with the exterior so is it also with the contents of 'Prince Maurice of Statland,' which are all concerned with royalties, princes, and peers of high degree. In order to lend actuality to his narrative, the writer has laid the recent domestic history of the courts of Austria and Bulgaria heavily under contribution. This is in questionable taste, and the abilities of the author are not of that commanding character which blinds one to such defects. The moral of the story is that morganatic marriages are a failure. Apart from that the author seems to have had the intention of rehabilitating the memory of the late Crown Prince of Austria through the medium of romance. Misery, suffering, and deception form the texture of this dreary tale, the motto of which, from the point of view of the commoner, is, "Put not your trust in princes."

There is a great deal of reading in 'Miss Miles,' but it does not amount to much in the way of a novel. The characters are somewhat commonplace, and their adventures are not specially romantic; and that, no doubt, is just what the author intended. Mary Taylor manifestly writes of what she has known and seen—which need not be taken as a suggestion that she has lived her threescore years and ten. Some of the surrounding circumstances—the clamming of the West Riding folk, for instance, the rivalry of a young and ardent Wesleyanism with a sleepy Church, and the invasion of a prim countryside by a brand-new mill—may be only matters of tradition with the author; but she has relied on personal observation in her studies of Yorkshire customs, character, and dialect. In this part of her work she is unquestionably successful, and any one who knows the West Riding will recognize her success at once. There is a thoroughness in the reproduction which strongly commends it, and the quiet, homely scenes are painted by the laborious hand of a genuine artist. Once fairly engaged with the story, a discerning reader will find it quite as interesting as any mere romance of incident or match-making. Indeed, what may be spoken of as the starvation chapters—and especially two, "In the Valley of the Shadow" and "The Tumult of the People"—are strongly pathetic and effective.

Facts as old as human nature strike successive generations of emotional young men and women with the force of a special and supernatural revelation; and the result is seen in ill-considered and inchoate stories like 'From Cloister to Altar.' When Claud cools down he will be quite competent to write a readable novel. His first attempt is too hyperbolic.

The dramatization of a novel is extremely common; but it is not often that the reverse process is heard of. In 'Judge Lynch' Mr. Jessop has "novelized" a drama written by him and Mr. Brander Matthews, and one would guess that the task must in both cases have been extremely simple. The incidents in the story are undoubtedly dramatic, according to the standard which is ordinarily satisfying to playgoers. Accidents happen in the most convenient and unlikely ways, while people are found to be in unlikely places at the requisite moment, and human nature is varied from time to time to meet the desperate necessities of the story. There is no limit to the possibility of coincidences, though an able writer avoids a strain in this direction, and men and women may be inconsistent, but human nature is not. A modern dramatist nearly always has a fine disregard for these simple truths, and a modern novelist is often not much wiser; but the novelist has better chances of offering some sort of an explanation, and therefore, probably, Mr. Jessop's novel is better than the play from which he has borrowed. Although there is not much to be said for Mr. Jessop's Californians of the stage, it may, at all events, be said in his favour that he tells his story with briskness and spirit.

'Only a Singer' proceeds apparently from the "wild pen" of one of the many who rush into print with nothing to say, and absolutely no knowledge of the art that makes of nothing—something. The author seems to aim at an intense yet cynical frame of mind, and is, instead, exceedingly silly and very prosaic. "Only a Singer" is a young person named Diana, who falls in love, and flings herself with hideous and uncalled-for energy at the head of something or somebody with a rich voice and a prior claim on its affections. Of course she is a glorious creature, and has "views" and ways of her own. It is to be hoped some of them are strictly her own, for they are most reprehensible and vulgar; others the novel-reader knows, alas! too well. When, "with a gesture peculiar to herself, she draws herself to her full height," he recognizes that the gesture is only peculiar to some thousands of heroines of romance. It is no wonder that "a conventional call struck her as strangely out of character with the general conditions of the acquaintance." Of course it seems to her more natural and rational when the rich voice enters "by a long window," and says, "Your sweet brow is the seat of nobler thoughts than my mind can reflect." Such a high sense of the fitness of things had Diana—truly the "artist nature."

It is to be hoped that a class of readers exists to whom 'Glenathole' will not seem as a tale told in vain, for there is a pains-taking air about its suggestive of a "young mind" which rather believes in itself and its works than otherwise; and to the young mind it is probably intended to appeal, for it is principally concerned with young people and their occupations and "temptations," with a good deal about the dangers of the stage, regarding which the author seems to know somewhat less than nothing. Real life also as it is conducted in 'Glenathole' wears an air of unreality; the Scots tongue is, however, better than might be expected. There is a young man so beautiful that to see and to love him are with beholders synonymous sensations. Trouble results, and two lives at least—those of a "high-born Scottish lady" and an actress—are irreparably wrecked. 'Glenathole' is an innocent, badly written, and somewhat sickly tale, in which the "quiet tomb" plays no inconsiderable part, and where the young of both sexes are more than usually addicted to blushing and silliness of manner and deportment. There is a good deal about ancestral homes, noble lineage, aristocratic features, and, in the background, some suppressed smuggling and underhand villainy.

In 'Through the Crowd' the problem is to guess at the kind of readers who may derive pleasure or profit from it. Those minded to set up a public-house might get a "wrinkle or two" on the right way to select a locality and then "work it up." Commercial travellers, too, and commission agents of all sorts and kinds, farmers, bailiffs, even keepers of low lodging-houses, might by applying hear of something to their advantage. But not the ordinary reader. Mr. Simmonds's acquaintances seem to be a strange and not particularly reputable crew, and they live and move and have their being under all sorts of unknown conditions and phases of a curious enough character. And yet the vulgarity and prosaicism of these people and their surroundings, and Mr. Simmonds's own bald and matter-of-fact manner, are amongst the strangest part of it all.

Under the execrable title 'Idylle et Drame de Salon' M. Henry Rabusson gives us a new volume, in which none figure but ladies and gentlemen, and in which the style of Octave Feuillet is as closely followed as in M. Rabusson's previous books. The story would have suited M. A. Delpit's title 'Comme dans la Vie,' because, as in real life, all does not turn out as we at one time hope. The most interesting and the best of the women in the novel, a lovely widow, remains a widow at the end, and a widow with a heart-ache undeserved. M. Rabusson's work in parts is a tractate against waltzing, and will not be to the taste of ball-goers or ball-givers. It has the common French fault of the day, the introduction of real persons under a thin disguise. We notice also in it an enormous number of those slight errors ascribed to "printers" by writers who do not trouble to correct their proofs, always more common in French books than in those of other countries. They are so far printers' errors that a good reader would correct them.

M. Hector Malot's 'Mère' is one of his best books. In part based upon the well-known Henriot case, the novel is full of incident, but it contains also much careful study of character, of industrial enterprise, of the seamy side of horseracing, and of the French lunacy laws.

M. René Bazin has produced in 'Les Noëlets' an excellent example of what the French disparagingly call "un petit conte moral," which deserves encouragement.

Free Trade in Capital; or, Free Competition in the Supply of Capital to Labour, and its Bearings on the Political and Social Questions of the Day. By A. Egmont Hake and O. E. Wesslau. (Remington & Co.)

MR. A. E. HAKE—who is the chairman of the Free Trade in Capital League, a body which, if we may draw any conclusions from its chairman's writings, must possess some highly erratic views on many rather extensive subjects—has published this volume with the intention of showing the errors in our existing financial arrangements. He objects strongly to bimetallicism, and he objects strongly also to nearly the whole of our present monetary system. The headings of a few of the chapters will suffice to show this: "How our Banking System divorces Capital and Labour," "How our Banking System destroys Profits and promotes Poverty," are only two out of many. Even the sweating system (p. 161) is attributed to there being "something wrong with the channels through which labour and capital should meet—namely, banking." Were banking, the mainspring of our entire organization, but in good order, all difficulties would cease. The "Irish Question" would be solved, the "Egyptian Question" would be settled, for it is "no exaggeration to say that when we have introduced Free Banking into Egypt we shall have established a free system of division of labour which will present all the advantages of the ancient compulsory system plus all the advantages of our modern civilization, without the disadvantages of either. The results will be enormous progress, unprecedented prosperity, advancement of the sciences and arts, spread of education and refinement, elevation in religion, and a gigantic trade with England."

Mr. Hake extends his theory to the colonies. When once these countries enjoy free trade in capital, in unison with Great Britain and Ireland, we are to see accomplished the

"conception of an Empire spread all over the world, containing incalculable latent wealth, with immense reserve territories, co-operating unimpeded by the errors and prejudices of the past, conferring on every British subject the highest liberty, the greatest scope for his work, and the best chances of happiness ever possessed by man—an Empire possessing free organization of labour surpassing in completeness and productiveness the organizations of the ancient Empires, but offering to personal invention, exertion, and genius all the incentive of a purely individual system."

These wonderful visions are brought before our minds by Mr. Hake, but when we proceed to examine the systems which he denounces, and those which he proposes, we are utterly at a loss to see either why the present methods do the harm, or how the suggested substitutes could do the good, attributed to them. Thus Mr. Hake supposes that the wealthy have the monopoly of loans, but he may be assured that in practice banking is carried on with every consideration both for small and for large borrowers, that the welfare of the "deposit banker" is as closely bound up as that of the "issuing banker" with the prosperity of the district in which he works. Mr. Bagehot's 'Lombard Street' describes the process very clearly. Nor is this country in respect to facilities for the diffusion of capital at any such disadvantage as compared with France as Mr. Hake imagines. The French banquier, whose operations Mr. Hake describes in an interesting chapter, has been, to a great extent, superseded in England by branch offices of larger establishments. The particular class of small bills, in discounting which the banquier, as Mr. Hake says, gives great facilities to local trade and the employment of labour, has been to a great extent superseded among us by a larger supply of ready money; but a similar business exists here, and is equally useful to local trade. Mr. Hake refers also to Italy and "the new banks established on the Schulze-Delitzsche principle." In this he touches on a highly interesting subject. The system of "Popular Banks" established by Signor Luzzatti in Italy has been of great service to that country. It is one of the means—most important to the welfare of the population, but little known out of Italy—which have enabled that country to bear the crushing load of taxation with a power which could never have been expected. And here we are glad to find ourselves on ground on which we can be in accord with Mr. Hake. However crude his views on many branches of economic study, and in particular on the application of economic rules to banking, may be, he lays down one great principle with considerable force: he sees that self-help is the best help, and that State interference may readily be carried too far. It will assist him materially in unravelling the other difficult problems he has undertaken to explain, if he keeps this principle clearly before his mind.

FAIRY TALES.

Sayings and Doings in Fairyland. By Dorothy Sinclair. (Jarrold & Sons.)—This is a tolerably successful attempt to fit fairy tales to the nursery rhymes and jingles so dear to childhood. The stories are pretty and pleasant to read, especially 'The Crooked Man' and 'The Fiddle-stick and Dancing Shoe'; but the moral is, perhaps, occasionally a little too obtrusive, and the author should have refrained from certain modern touches which mar the effect. Bakers are dismissed because they put alum in their bread, princesses walk in the royal gardens and shrubberies and sit down to afternoon tea, and when a prince becomes engaged to a princess his father is invited to come and pay a visit in order that he may "make the acquaintance of the bride before the marriage should take place." In the time-honoured fairy tales which have become classics princesses are married with about as much regard to observances of this kind as must have been shown in the case of the "wench married in an afternoon as she went to the garden for parsley to stuff a rabbit." In one story the author, though a lady, seems to confuse spinning with weaving, and to think that if a woman, royal or otherwise, sits down to her spinning-wheel a woven web of linen grows beneath her fingers. Mr. Paul Hardy's illustrations are very good indeed, and add much to the attraction of the book.

Fairy Tales and Stories. By Hans Andersen. Edited by A. Gardiner. (John Heywood.)—Andersen's stories are always delightful, though they have never yet found a translator who thought them quite good enough to be left as Andersen wrote them. One and all have added little touches of explanation and amplification, which tend to deprive the original of one of its greatest charms—the amount of humour which is with so little effort, or probably with no effort at all, packed in a few words. This translation errs in the same way, though it reads pleasantly enough. At the same time, unless some one could be found to give the stories in Andersen's own words without weakening them by additions, however trifling, we do not see that a new translation was needed. According to Mr. Gardiner's preface, his reason for undertaking this was that he might "add such explanations as will make the tales thoroughly understandable by English children." With this object he, assisted by "two ladies of Leeds," has supplied notes which will, he hopes, be found helpful; but the English child is poor indeed in understanding of its own, or in the quality of its father, mother, or even nurse, if when it reads "Be reasonable, or I shall call the guard," it requires a note which tells it "That is, the soldiers who guarded the palace." Mr. Gardiner's notes were also written with the intention of "pointing out the particular lesson taught by some of the tales." In Andersen's tales, however, the suggestion of a moral is so subtle, so delicate, so certain to make its way slowly, and therefore surely, into a thoughtful child's mind, that it needs no heavy-handed editor to add such a note as this, for example, on that beautiful and fanciful story 'The Shadow':

"This curious tale teaches us that we often attach great importance to the mere semblance of things—consider the shadow (i. e., wealth and position) of more value than the substance (i. e., honesty of heart and uprightness of conduct). However pure, good, noble, and sincere our intentions may be, if we are slighted because of the less important things we do not seem to possess, we often fail to do justice to ourselves, and, against our better nature, fall. The Learned Man allowed his shadow to leave him—in fact, told it to go on a somewhat dishonourable prying expedition. By so doing he placed himself in its power, and, as a consequence, the shadow became master, and caused the downfall of the man. It is scarcely necessary to try and find a lesson in each separate incident of the story."

It is almost surprising that Mr. Gardiner should come to this conclusion. The above is, however, a sample of some of his notes. We wonder if he thinks that this particular note makes it easier for a child to understand the moral of 'The Shadow.' To our mind stories ought to be stories, and such moral as they have ought to be kept in the background. Children require intellectual amusement as much as their elders. Besides this, those who want stories full of high moral teaching can find them by thousands, and with their moral teaching so plainly given that no puerile notes are needed to make it apparent. The other notes to this book, though often useful, are occasionally misleading, for the information they give is not always correct. The same may be said of the spelling of foreign words; and when we read of Ambrosius Stubs, "the founder of lyrical poetry in Denmark" that "he corresponds nearest to our Mrs. Hemans," we think that some fault may be found with the English.

The Floating Prince, and other Fairy Tales. by F. R. Stockton (Ward & Downey), comes to us warmly recommended as the work of the author of 'Rudder Grange.' 'The Floating Prince' comprises a very funny story of a reformed pirate who was "condensed," that is made small, and who, by the magical power he had accidentally acquired, reduced certain persons and places to his own size, and other matters too recondite for describing here. The little cuts are very clever indeed; the tales are bewitching.

The four pretty little volumes of Folk-lore and Legends: Germany, Scotland, Ireland, Oriental (Gibbings), are the first of a series in which selections from the folk-lore and legends of various countries will be presented in a handy form. They are clearly printed and pleasant to read, and, on the whole, the selection has been fairly well made, though many such volumes would have to be filled before an adequate idea of the folk-lore of Germany could be given, not to mention that of some other countries. The compiler, however, seems frequently to fall between two stools, and, while dressing up his stories too much to make them of any value to persons whom he calls "lorists," prints some which are a little too gruesome for children. In the volume devoted to Germany a large number are taken from Grimm's 'Kinder- und Hausmärchen,' from the notes to them, and from the 'Deutsche Sagen'; but the translator has taken great liberties with the text—sometimes in the interest of youth, but at others for no apparent reason. The preface to the German volume seems to imply a wish to make a contribution to folk-lore, but any one who works with that view must work with absolute fidelity, and also on a system. There is no system here; the stories are taken haphazard from various more or less well-known sources, but the names of the original compilers are scarcely ever named, and this renders the books valueless to students. Some of the Irish stories are charming, and will be as great a delight to the children of the present day as they were to those of a past generation; and the same may be said of one or two of the Eastern tales, notably 'The Cobbler Astrologer' and 'The Man who never Laughed.' We shall look with a certain amount of curiosity for the English volume, as our stock of national stories is, unfortunately, small. 'Jack the Giant Killer' is one of the best of them, but it is extremely difficult to procure a good version of it. It is curious to find one of its most telling incidents in the Eastern tale 'Ameen and the Ghoul.' If the compiler would faithfully reproduce the stories as told by the most trustworthy authorities, and never print one without indicating the source from which it has been drawn, his books would be really valuable.

Atlantis, and other Poems. By Horace G. Groser. (Hutchinson.)

THE author of 'The Silence of Dean Maitland'—so lauded by certain critics—has produced a volume of verse calling itself 'Westminster Chimes, and other Poems.' It is not likely, in our opinion, to add much to whatsoever reputation, real or phantasmal, its author may have already acquired. To speak briefly—and without entering on any definition of what a "poem" should be—it hardly seems as though it had a right to the title of "poems" at all, as it is in great part made up of the kind of verse a critic is usually warned off as being printed "for private circulation only." Yet one fancies one can trace a latent ambition about it too. Amongst other things we find an address to 'The Skylark' beginning "Lover of Heaven"; and there are attempts at reproducing old French artificial verse-forms which may, or perhaps may not, be prized by amateurs of these tours de force. For the rest we find no touch—or if there, it escapes us—of real poetry or inspiration, nor, what one might perhaps have looked for, any touch of original observation on things natural or human. Many of the subjects treated are of the "homely" order—no fault in itself, but a misfortune, especially for the reader, when they are handled by a writer who has none of the power which can transmute trivial things and clothe them with charm and significance. Amongst the poor, and tame, and thin of the collection 'A Game of Chess' takes the palm. It is dreadfully poverty-stricken and hopelessly trivial; and it must be confessed the reader is not much better pleased when "higher ground" is broken, and reflective verses and "thoughtful" sonnets are the result.

A preface informs us that Lord Rosslyn's volume 'Sonnets and Poems' may be considered a more or less complete collection of his poetical works. There is no undue vanity in the author's putting forth such a collection; for his verse, especially in the sonnets, is thoughtful and refined in purport and of very fair quality in execution. He has no gift of imagination, none of creation—indeed, he seems quite unable to conceive a poem without some real person of his acquaintance, some incident he has witnessed, some emotion of his own, to give him a theme—but he has poetic feeling, dignified and simple expression, and very gracious manly tenderness. His poetry does not inspire the reader, but it is likable.

There are distinct prettinesses in Mrs. Wilson's book, a certain faint charm, a certain amount of poetic sensibility. Some sketches of interiors, such as 'At Home,' 'To Laura,' 'Wednesday,' are done with a neat touch, and there are some pleasant descriptions of New Zealand scenery. The work at its best is slight, and seems to have been written somewhat too flowingly. Yet the little book is pleasant enough to turn over, and at least has no pretentiousness, but is content to be quiet and simple.

There is considerable power in the Rev. William Wilfrid Campbell's 'Lake Lyrics'—sketches, really brilliant, of the great Canadian lakes. Descriptive pieces are usually unreadable; good they may be, in their way, or bad, but at least unreadable. Mr. Campbell's descriptions are sufficiently humanized for human beings to find them interesting. It is their singular merit that they do not suggest guide-books versified. They even seem to have been written chiefly for the sake of their poetry. And that, while not always quite individual, is, as minor poets go, of a fairly high order. Mr. Campbell has a genuine passion for his lakes, and in his verse they become wonderfully significant, impressive. The changes of the seasons around them, their own changes under varying skies, the flight of the gulls over them, the sound of the birds calling in the forests—all these things, so strange to us often, have passed expressively into the verses in which Mr. Campbell has sung of his world of "vapour and blue." Among the "other poems" are some pieces of real power and interest, such, for instance, as the 'Ballade of Two Riders' and 'The Phantoms of the Boughs on the Window'—pieces which cannot be called entirely satisfactory, but which have almost all the elements of really fine poems.

Mr. Young's 'Lyrics' are, on the whole, rather lofty and empty, though not without certain accomplishments. Mr. Young has made a number of attempts, more or less vague, with more or less vague ideas as to what he was attempting. He writes of Popocatepetl, Tong Taloung, the New and Vulgar Rich, in various headstrong metres, and, without much greater calmness, on some subjects more generally appreciated. His book leaves on the mind a curiously confused sensation, hardly worth defining.

Mr. Ira Billman is a most singular person who has certainly mistaken his vocation, though there is probably some vocation—one hardly knows what—in which he might do much; perhaps something in the prophetic line. He has a great many curious, original, if sometimes rather confused thoughts on a great many subjects; he has observed certain things closely; he can hit, now and again, on a quaintly expressive turn of phrase; but why should he try to be a poet? Here is Mr. Billman on a theme of war: on the whole, one prefers one's Tennyson:—

In the nick of time,
On the tick of time,
At a cost sublime,
For ten minutes' time,
Rode the brave three hundred!

It is painful to see a host of ingenious ideas endeavouring vainly to make their way through what the author himself calls the "oft dark, umbrageous woods" of his verse. It may, however, be said, with literal truth, that the book is a weighty one. Indeed, it weighs very nearly two pounds.

On turning to Mr. Allan's 'Northern Lights' we find verse of a very different calibre, fluent, simple, easy-going, but showing something of a real knack of versifying. Mr. Allan has a cheery, facile manner, which intimates that his verses were pleasant writing—nor are they unpleasant reading in default of anything more important. Nearly half of the book is in the Scotch dialect, and this part, though not so easy to read, is of the two the more worth reading. Some pieces in it are decidedly pretty.

Mr. Groser's poems are not specially remarkable, but few of them are altogether worthless. Some of his ballads are spirited, and there are capital sketches of village life, with really admirable pictures, here and there, of natural aspects. One of the best is the poem in two stanzas, 'A March Midnight.' It is not alone in dealing faithfully and delicately with nature.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. G. W. CABLE is the ablest writer of fiction of the Southern States. He has invested New Orleans and Louisiana generally with a peculiar charm, to which, it should be admitted, Mrs. Hodgson Burnett has added something. One can easily understand the zeal with which he has collected and edited a number of Strange True Tales of Louisiana (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.). He has laboured over his materials with the energy and sound judgment which distinguish the modern school of historians in dealing with unpublished authentic documents. In the case of some of his stories it is not quite easy to sympathize with his enthusiasm; but the diary of a lady who was in Vicksburg during the memorable siege is a piece of work of the highest interest, and is to be read only with breathless excitement, so completely vivid and so simple is the narrative. As for the stories of the old days in Louisiana, one could wish that Mr. Cable had been content to use his materials as the foundation for tales in which he might have given free play to his great gifts of pathos and romantic charm.

MR. J. W. CROMBIE has published a pleasant volume on The Poets and Peoples of Foreign Lands (Stock). The most interesting paper is that on Mistral. There is also a good criticism on Klaus Groth, who is not a man of Mistral's genius, yet is a true poet within a limited range. There is an agreeable if somewhat slight sketch, reprinted from Macmillan, of Al-Motamed; and the notice of 'The Folk-Poetry of Spain' is worth reading. The worst thing about the volume is its title.

MISS MORISON'S courageous attempt, in Sordello: an Outline Analysis (Blackwood & Sons), to make Mr. Browning's most difficult poem intelligible may prove helpful, but Miss Morison would have succeeded better had she not followed Mr. Browning so closely, and had rearranged the story more in chronological order. Mrs. Orr's chapter on 'Sordello' throws more light on the poem than this analysis.

GYP, who has just set her name to a picture-book wholly unworthy of her, 'Une Election à Tigre sur Mer,' gives us in O Province! published through M. Calmann Lévy, a collection of short stories of the usual kind, hardly up to her ordinary level. Some of these little tales have appeared before.

We have received what seems to be in fact the second volume of the Bookworm (Stock), though the publisher appears still to call each volume a series. This second instalment at all events repeats the sins, negligences, and ignorances to which we have already called attention. Editor and printers seem still quite incapable of printing English, much less Latin or French, correctly. Thus, in a notice (marked by very great ignorance of the subject) of some early German fair catalogues, we find the title of one of Willer's catalogues printed: "Collectio in unum Corpus, omnium librorum Hembæorum, Græcorum necnon Germanicæ, Italicæ, Gallicæ & Hispanicæ scriptorum, qui in nundinis Francofurtensibus, &c.;" and on the same page (p. 77) occurs this extraordinary piece of Latin: "Catalogus universalis pro nundinis Francofurtibus Georgij Willeri civis et [sic] Bibliopole Augustani, venales habentur.....Hoc est designatio omnium librorum qui istis nundinisvel noir vel emendationes aut auctiores prodisrunt," &c. Now even if these errors stood in the originals, it was surely the editor's duty either to have indicated that they were so printed, or to have amended them. But there are even worse things in a paper on the Elzevirs professedly based on Willems. It says: "The second part is a catalogue raisonné [sic]"; and goes on to quote (!) Willems to this effect: "Ce but [the high-water mark] il ne l'atteignent qu'après [no accent!] neufs [sic] années d'efforts persévérants [only one accent!]: le César, le Plaine et le Ténence de 1635 marquent l'apogée [omitting de leurs] succès et n'ont pas été [omitting final accent] surpassés depuis." It is difficult to imagine that any one can find any satisfaction in doing such slipshod and inaccurate work, and it is still more difficult to understand what class of readers there can be to appreciate it. The fault we animadverted upon in our notice of the former volume, of reprinting long extracts from modern books and contemporary magazines as substantial articles, sometimes with exceedingly scant acknowledgment, has also not been amended.

The Classical Review has begun its fourth volume. One of the new numbers contains an interesting account of 'Classical Education in the United States,' by Mr. Wright, of Harvard. Scholarship has made striking progress in America of late years. Its main weakness at present is a slavish admiration of the Germans. —Education, of which the first number is before us (Roper & Drowley), promises to be a useful addition to the number of educational journals. —We have also on our table some numbers of two new magazines owned and edited by Mr. David Balsillie. The first of these, The Children's Guide, is excellently designed to serve as a reader in schools. The illustrations are its only weak point. The Social Pioneer covers a wide extent of ground, and will meet the wants of many of those who are endeavouring to educate themselves. It contains a number of articles by men of mark, and is conducted with much spirit.

We have on our table the Reports of the Free Libraries at Clerkenwell and Salford, and that of Astor Library, as well as the Second Supplement to the Catalogue of the Free Library at Bootle-cum-Linacre, compiled by the librarian, Mr. Ogle. The libraries both at Clerkenwell and Salford seem to be extremely prosperous.

We have also received the three numbers for January, February, and March of the excellent series of Messrs. Hatchard, Dignitaries of the Church. The choice of subjects is judiciously varied and the photographs are excellent.

The Bristol Mercury has celebrated its centenary by a reprint of its first number. Sepe faciat. It has also reprinted the first issue extant of the Weekly Mercury, December 1st, 1716.

We have on our table The Life Work of the Author of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin', by F. T. McCray (Funk & Wagnalls). —Rhigas Pheraios, the Protomartyr of Greek Independence, by Mrs. Edmonds (Longmans). —The Origin and Growth of the English Constitution, by H. THE SOURCE OF 'THE ANCIENT MARINER.'

Central Free Library, King Street, Bristol, Feb. 26, 1890.

I HAVE before me a copy of a 12mo. pamphlet of eighty-eight pages, by Mr. Ivor James, Cardiff, 1890, entitled 'The Source of "The Ancient Mariner."' On p. 14 it is remarked : "On the shelves of the Bristol Library there is a small quarto of some 140 pages, now extremely rare, entitled 'The Strange and Dangerous Voyage of Captain Thomas James,' printed in London by John Legatt for John Partridge in 1633." In a note to this passage the writer says : "My authority for this statement is Mr. Nicholl [sic], the former librarian." Without adverting to several other inaccuracies (besides misspelling of name) in the same long note, I may say that there is no evidence that the copy of Capt. James's 'Voyage' referred to was in the Bristol Library in Coleridge's time, but that there is indisputable reason to show that it was acquired between 1856 and 1868 by Mr. George Pryce, F.S.A., as affirmed by his book-plate, in the formation of a special collection of Bristol books, of which I am now custodian. I do not enlarge on this point, though Mr. James lays much stress on it; for if Coleridge did not consult this particular copy, he may have seen its reprint in Churchill's 'Collection of Voyages and Travels' (vol. ii., 1732) or Harris's (1764), both which works are contained in the Bristol Library, of which Coleridge was a member. Whatever may be the worth of Mr. Ivor James's argument—and I think it very inconclusive—I think that in mentioning Mr. J. F. Nicholls he should have stated that his (Mr. James's) theory had been already advanced by Mr. Nicholls, who in a tract (second edition, Bristol, 1876, p. 76) on 'Capt. Thomas James,' after quoting the passage (also used by Mr. Ivor James) beginning,

And now there came both mist and snow, down to

Like noises in a swound!

proceeds : "It is very likely, indeed, that S. T. Coleridge, who was a regular and daily frequenter of our old City Library, derived his marrow-chilling scenes depicted in that unique and immortal poem 'The Ancient Mariner' from Capt. James's strange and dangerous voyage." I believe I am correct in saying that I presented Mr. Ivor James with a copy of Mr. J. F. Nicholls's pamphlet, so that he is without excuse.

MR. HENLEY'S SONG.

OUR attention has been called to a statement respecting the authorship of Mr. William Ernest Henley's song, "Oh, Falmouth is a fine town, with ships in the bay," made by Mr. J. Runciman in his article 'King Plagiarism and his Court,' published in the current Fortnightly Review. We have Mr. Henley's authority for denying either that he received the traditional stanza of this song from Mr. Runciman, or that the latter "wrote two lines." It is somewhat singular that Mr. Runciman, whilst mentioning the fact that he made use of this song in an article written by him for the St. James's Gazette, should have omitted all reference to the similar article in the Family Herald.

As several imperfect or garbled versions of this song have got into circulation, we beg to state that the only genuine form is that found on p. 93 of Mr. Henley's 'Book of Verses,' of which we published the first edition in 1888, and the second edition in 1889.

THE FABLES OF KYBZIOX.

THE reviewer of Mr. Jacobs's excellent preface to the 'Fables of Æsop' (Athen., March 1st, p. 273) seems to accept as plausible the theory that the Kobsim (כובסים) fables mentioned in Talmudic literature together with the "fables of the foxes" may mean the fables of the Libyan Kufuros. No doubt the confusion between כובסים and כובסים is quite admissible in Hebrew characters, and this was indeed proposed some time ago, as Mr. Jacobs himself states. But there are three objections: (1) that some early texts read כובסים for כובסים, which proves that the word was taken at an early period as a plural form of כובס, either "of washermen" or "of trees" (dates): sayings of washermen are quoted in Talmudic literature, as well as "fables of trees"; (2) the Greek κ is invariably transliterated in Hebrew writings by κ , and not by κ ; (3) it can scarcely be admitted that the rabbis could have known the Libyan fables even from hearsay, and certainly not by the name of their author, who has been unearthed by modern researches. The parallelism to the "fables of foxes" requires fables of "an object," and not of an author, not to speak of the unusual termination of κ in κ in Talmudic literature.

The identity of Berachiah the Nakdan with Benedictus le Puncteur, the author of a collection of Hebrew fables, and the dragoman of Alfred the Englishman—identifications of which the reviewer says that "it is difficult to believe that they will be refuted"—I cannot discuss here. I refer those who are interested in the matter to my full discussion of it which will appear in the April number of the Jewish Quarterly Review. I shall try to show there that chronology is against this identification.

A. NEUBAUER.

 We hardly can be said to have accepted Mr. Jacobs's ingenious speculation.

THE OLDEST REGIMENTAL RECORD.

THE "Vellum Book" of the Honourable Artillery Company, which is the oldest surviving record of the Society through the unfortunate loss of its earliest muniments during the Commonwealth, is in effect a muster book of the corps during the greater part of the seventeenth century, though it may also be regarded as a roll of honour for the preservation of distinguished names connected with the Company, and as a precedent book of much antiquarian interest. As a regimental record it is certainly unique, for there is probably no military body in this country which could produce more than a fragment of a muster roll previous to the year 1682, in which this volume concludes. The antiquity of the Company has recently been successfully vindicated by the collection of many evidences from records through the zealous investigations of one of its field officers, himself one of the most learned military antiquaries of this day. Therefore the Court of Assistants wisely determined to ensure the preservation of the "Vellum Book" by timely repairs, which have now been successfully executed, while a companion volume has been designed as a modern precedent book.

The ancient volume under notice is a folio bound in leather black with age, and ornamented with brass plates and clasps finely engraved with the arms of the Company and military figures of the reign of Charles I. It contains 165 parchment pages, most of which are occupied with the admittances of members between 1611 and 1682. At the beginning of the book are several secondary compilations, such as the "Names of such gents y^e haue bene Presidents," those who have commanded the Company, and the captains and treasurers. At the end are similar lists, notably a "Remembrance of legacies and gifts given to this Soecyety by divers well-disposed gents," and a list of "those worthise persons that were Stewards" between 1663 and 1682, and who "were nobly pleased" to bear all the charges of the annual feast.

But perhaps the most interesting feature of the volume consists in the probably unequalled collection of historical autographs of the Restoration period. These are contained in ten folios, which appear to have been originally left blank, after the initial list of the "Gents preferred to the government of the Company and command in the field," for the signatures of the distinguished visitors to the feasts. There are some three hundred of these signatures inscribed here: royal personages from Prince Rupert to Prince George of Denmark, including most of Charles II.'s natural children, and great officers of state and of the household, together with courtiers and wits like Sheffield and Villiers. There are also admirals and sea captains, generals and colonels, without number; ambassadors and men of science; a bishop, and last, but by no means least, the civic fathers aforesaid, who were "nobly pleased" to pay for the whole entertainment. Sometimes the name of a distinguished foreigner occurs. Thus Vauban, the great engineer of Louis XIV., signs in the company of plain John Churchill, who was destined to demolish so many of his masterpieces; and the younger Opdam sat at table with the rough sea-dogs who a few years before had boasted of having sent the great Dutch admiral to the bottom of the sea. These names lead to two interesting conclusions: first, that it was an object of much importance to the Crown to secure the good-will of this formidable body, and obtain a share in its government; and secondly, that a large proportion of the visitors were attached to the suites of the more exalted guests. This is very apparent in the case of the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, Albemarle, and Lord Dartmouth amongst naval and military commanders, to whose introduction we may owe the signatures of Pepys and other civilian administrators, as well as those of the veterans of the Dutch wars and Tangiers, besides rising men like Russell and Herbert, Reresby and Kirke. The name of Legge is also responsible for a strong muster from the Tower, while Danby brings many a North-country magnate, and Ormonde still more Irish colonels. The Hydcs are strongly represented, and later still the Royalist element is strengthened by politicians like Perth, Preston, and Sunderland. This is not a tithe of the names of the foremost men of action of that day inscribed in these venerable pages. The fact of the signatures being upon vellum is a feature of additional interest, though as a note of time and place it should be added that several have unmistakably been entered after dinner. On separate folios, beautifully illuminated, are the autographs of the Captains General of the Company, all of them princes or reigning sovereigns, from Prince Charles in 1641 to our own Prince of Wales in 1861.

PROF. FRANZ DELITZSCH.

THE University of Leipzig has lost a great Orientalist as well as theologian by the death of F. Delitzsch. Born in 1813 at Leipzig, where he graduated, he became a privatim docens in 1842, was called as Professor Ordinarius of Theology to Rostock in 1846, then to Erlangen in 1850, and returned in the same quality to Leipzig in 1867. He began his literary career with Rabbinical subjects, viz., the catalogue of the Hebrew MSS. in the Senatorial Library of Leipzig and the history of Jewish poetry, both issued in 1836. He was such a master of Rabbinical language and literature—in which he had only his equal among Christians in Dr. Pusey—that he was considered by many to be a converted Jew, which was not the case; he was the son of Christian parents. In spite of his later leaning towards the exegesis of the Old and New Testaments, which he began with Habakkuk in 1843 and continued with the commentaries on Canticles, Genesis, Psalms, Isaiah, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Daniel, &c. (most of which commentaries have been translated into English), he never gave up his first love of Rabbinical literature. Within the last few years he translated the New Testament from the Greek into late Hebrew for the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the book has reached a fourth edition. Although inclined to favour the conversion of the Jews, the late professor did it in a very friendly way, viz., by showing his great esteem and love for the Talmud and Jewish literature. He broke many a lance for the Jews against enraged anti-Semites like Rohling and Stöcker, exposing their ignorance of Rabbinical literature and language. He also wrote on Jewish and Mohammedan medieval philosophy (in 1841), and successfully attacked the Masorah by editing with Dr. S. Baer a revised Masoretic text of many books of the Old Testament. Neither did the professor neglect the New Testament; for he wrote commentaries on the Epistles to the Hebrews and the Romans, as well as on the origin of the New Testament canon. There is great variety in his other writings, which prove his wide genius. Of these we shall only mention the following: a system of Biblical psychology, a system of Christian apologetics, on the history of the Complutensian Polyglot, 'Jesus and Hillel,' a monograph on the state of national culture in the time of Christ, besides a great number of smaller or larger essays on the subjects of the Old and New Testaments, many of which have been translated into English (see the notice of his 'Iris,' Athenæum, February 15th). Space forbids us to enumerate the articles scattered throughout weekly, monthly, and quarterly journals in German and English. In the matter of philology we have to make an exception to our general praise. Delitzsch's views concerning the relations between the Semitic and Indo-Germanic languages, as laid down in the 'Jesurun' (1838) and in Fürst's concordance, were erroneous, and we believe that the author looked in later years on these contributions as youthful attempts. But the greatness of the deceased lay in his exegesis of the Old Testament, and his straightforwardness is evident by his disclaiming his old views of the Pentateuch and Isaiah in the last edition of his commentaries on Genesis and Isaiah. As a man F. Delitzsch was humanity and kindness personified, and a true guide for his numerous pupils, who will not forget their faithful shepherd.

Literary Gossip.

THE next volume of the 'Dictionary of National Biography' will bear upon its title-page the words "edited by Leslie Stephen and Sidney Lee." It is probably not known outside a narrow circle that Mr. Lee has for some years most ably exercised the office of assistant editor to Mr. Stephen. His share in the work has long been so important that it is a mere act of justice that he should now be placed in the higher position of co-editor.

It is rumoured that Messrs. Longman will be the English, and Messrs. Scribner the American, publishers of Mr. William O'Brien's novel, which, in spite of the reputation of the author, is said to be unpolitical. The scene, however, is laid in the Bantry district, and the hero is an Irishman, so it is not improbable that English readers will find a stronger political view expressed than the writer is at all aware of. Except for an unlucky accident the book would now be in the press; but after the manuscript was completed Mr. O'Brien had the misfortune to lose or mislay five chapters. He is now busily engaged in making good his loss, and still hopes to have the book ready for the spring publishing season.

MR. ANDREW LANG'S amusing lecture 'How to Fail in Literature,' which in a few days will appear in cheap form from the Leadenhall Press, has been practically rewritten, and, "like the kiss which the lady returned to Rodolphe, is revu, corrigé et considérablement augmenté."

THE success of the 'Blue Fairy Book' has been such that Mr. Lang will very likely present the public with a new fairy book next Christmas. Meanwhile he has attracted the censure of some Presbyterians in the North by an article on St. Andrews, and is being denounced as an "Anglified Scotsman."

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will shortly publish a new novel, in three volumes, entitled 'The Heriots,' by Sir Henry Cunningham, whose 'Chronicles of Dustypore' are well known to fame. This time the author has laid his scene in London. The same publishers have in the press a new tale entitled 'The Miner's Right,' by Mr. Rolf Boldrewood, author of that successful story 'Robbery under Arms.'

MR. BARNUM, whose reputation as a raconteur has become widely spread during his recent visit to London, has for some time past been engaged in making a collection of the best and wittiest of his stories. Messrs. Routledge & Sons are to be the publishers.

MR. GLADSTONE has taken advantage of his recent indisposition to read some novels, among them Mr. Hall Caine's 'Bondman,' of which he has addressed the following critique to the publisher:—

"I have been so far favoured by a short indisposition that it has enabled me to complete the perusal of 'The Bondman.' I thank you very much for presenting me with a work of which I recognize the freshness, vigour, and sustained interest no less than its integrity of aim. I do not know whether there are other works tending to establish the connexion of race between the Isle of Man and Scandinavia, in which I have long been disposed to believe."

WE have much pleasure in printing the following letter from Messrs. Hurst & Blackett:—

"Our attention has been drawn to several paragraphs which have appeared to the effect that Miss Beatrice Whitby (author of 'The Awakening of Mary Fenwick' and 'Part of the Property') is dead. We had a letter this morning from the young lady, who is apparently in the best of health."

THE dinner of the booksellers this (Saturday) evening, which we mentioned some weeks ago, is likely to be of a representative character. A large number of letters of regret have had to be posted to members of the trade, because the invitations are limited to two hundred and fifty. We hear that Mr. T. P. Du Chaillu, Mr. H. Rider Haggard, Dr. Evans, Mr. Archibald Grove, Mr. H. O. Arnold Forster, and others will be present.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD will retire from the editorship of Murray's Magazine after the issue of the April number. Mr. Arnold has been most reluctantly compelled to sever his connexion with the magazine (of which he has been editor from its foundation) in order to devote himself entirely to the work of the new publishing business he has recently started in Warwick Square.

A RELATIVE of Wordsworth, Mrs. Dorothy (Wordsworth) Harrison, died last week at Ambleside, in her eighty-ninth year. Wordsworth lost his mother when he was eight years old, and his father when he was about fourteen; and then his paternal uncle, Richard Wordsworth, and his maternal uncle, Christopher Crackanthorpe, became his guardians, and sent him to Cambridge. This Richard Wordsworth was the grandfather of the old lady just dead.

THE accounts of Messrs. Cassell & Co., Limited, show a sum of 43,126*l.* to the good. From this an interim distribution of 5 per cent. has been made. The amount now to be divided will show a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, besides a small bonus and a sum of 4,500*l.* carried to the reserve fund.

THE annual meeting of the Newsvendors' Benevolent and Provident Society will take place on Tuesday week (March 18th). Mr. J. Lobb will take the chair. It is proposed to make the John Francis Memorial Fund and the Royal Victoria Pension Fund separate investments.

MESSRS. BELL have in the press a revised and enlarged edition of the somewhat indifferent English translation of Teuffel's 'History of Roman Literature' which was published by them in 1873. The German work has now reached its fifth edition, with very large and valuable additions by the well-known scholar Dr. L. Schwabe, to whom it was entrusted after Prof. Teuffel's death. Prof. Warr, of King's College, is the editor of the new English version, in which the old translation will be thoroughly revised, and all the additional matter from the latest German edition incorporated. The first volume will be published in September.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLEY M'CARTHY, who has been for some years an ardent and enthusiastic student of the period of the French Revolution, is about to publish the first instalment of the results of his researches. The aim of the author has been to produce a history of the French Revolution which shall be at the same time exhaustive, thorough, and popular, and the two volumes about to be brought out by Messrs. Chatto & Windus form only one half of the entire work.

MR. MORFILL'S inaugural lecture on the importance of the study of the Slavonic languages, delivered before the University of Oxford in January last, will appear in print in a day or two.

THE REV. GEORGE LESTER is going to issue a monograph on 'Grimsby Methodism, and the Wesleys in Lincolnshire.' The three chapters devoted to the latter subject will deal with (1) Samuel Wesley at South Ormsby, (2) Samuel Wesley at Epworth, (3) John Wesley's curacy in the Isle of Axholme. Dr. Rigg will contribute an introductory note.

A VOLUME of Australian "bush" stories, entitled 'Under the Gum Tree,' edited by Mrs. Patchett Martin, is now in the printer's hands, and will shortly be published. Several of the stories are from the "Never-never" country of Queensland, and among the writers are Mrs. Campbell Praed, "Tasma," Mrs. Patchett Martin, Mr. Hume Nisbet, Mr. Marriott Watson, Dr. Manington Caffyn, and others.

MR. W. H. SMITH has ordered a grant of 200*l.* to be made from the Royal Bounty Fund to Sir George Duckett, in recognition of his literary labours. Sir George has been before the public as an author for nearly fifty years, his first appearance in print being made in 1841. Among his chief works have been his 'Technological Military Dictionary, German, English, and French,' dedicated by permission to the Prince Consort, which took the author sixteen years to compile, and obtained for him gold medals from France, Prussia, and Austria; his two volumes on the 'Penal Laws and Test Act: Questions touching their Repeal propounded by James II. to the Deputy Lords Lieutenant and Magistrates of the several Counties of England and Wales'; and his 'Monasticon Cluniacense Anglicanum: Charters and Records of the several Cluniac Foundations in England and Scotland,' for which the French Government awarded him the Palmes d'Or.

AN attempt has been made to found a college magazine for Trinity, Cambridge, on a basis sufficiently firm to enable it to survive the customary slaughter of journalistic innocents at the end of the May term. The Trident will appear three times a year, will be edited by undergraduates, but will be under the regular supervision of a committee of resident fellows of the College. One of its chief features will be free but considerate discussion of college reforms and of college politics generally. The first editors will be Mr. W. Hepburn Buckler and Mr. Malcolm MacNaghten, whose names, however, will not appear in the magazine. For the first number Mr. Burn has written his reminiscences of Bishop Lightfoot, and Mr. Sedley Taylor his of Whewell. Mr. James Payn, in response to a preliminary letter asking for sympathy, is said to have written, "I wish the best of luck for the Trident, and may it spare the good and spear the wicked."

IN addition to the Yasna MS. presented to the Bodleian, Destoor Jamaspiji Minocherji, Hon. D.C.L. Oxon., has sent to Dr. Mills for collation a very ancient Yasna MS. with Sanskrit translation, written soon after the death of the celebrated Parsi commentator Neryosangh (probably in the fourteenth century). This MS. is in a most fragile condition, and parts of it are to be photographed, the Librarian of the Bodleian having made a grant for that purpose. A later Yasna MS., with Sanskrit translation, made by one of the Destoor's ancestors in the seventeenth century, has also been sent, together with a MS. of the 'Vendidad' with Pahlavi translation. The learned Destoor Darab Peshotan Sanjana has sent a valuable, but not particularly ancient MS. of the Yasna with Pahlavi translation.

THE forthcoming volume of the Collectanea published by the Oxford Historical Society will contain, amongst other papers, notes on the Jews in Oxford by Dr. Neubauer.

THE free library movement appears to be making progress in the smaller towns in Scotland. In the remote northern town of Peterhead, at a meeting of the ratepayers, it was decided unanimously to adopt the Free Libraries Act.

MR. DUNCAN MACLACHLAN, the well-known publisher and bookseller of Edinburgh, has been appointed to the post of sub-librarian in the reference department of the Edinburgh Public Library.

MANY are aware that in Constantinople ancient literary processes come in contact with the modern forms of the West, and this is exemplified by the following. Vebhi Effendi is a Turkish journalist, editor of a leading daily paper and of a marine journal. Five war vessels having lately been launched from the Admiralty, Vebhi Effendi celebrated the occasion with a poem. It is a chronogram, the verses of which are composed of the names of the five ships, and so arranged as to be a panegyric on the Sultan, at the same time that the numeral letters give the present year of the Hejira 1307. Sometimes a minister of state is invited to compose a chronogram to decorate a new public building. It is fortunate that no such feat is demanded of a member of the Cabinet in England.

It is expected that the Riga'sche Zeitung, which can boast of an existence of 112 years, will shortly cease to appear. The cessation will be brought about by the Russian Government's persistent refusal to sanction the appointment of any editor proposed for the post. The publication of the Nordische Rundschau has already been stopped.

MR. JAMES HOGG is bringing out a series of papers on eschatology, commencing with an article of De Quincey's which appeared in the Instructor in January, 1853, and excited a good deal of horror in Edinburgh at the time. A bibliography of the literature of eschatology is appended to the volume.

DR. FRANCIS WARNER (physician to the London Hospital, &c.) has prepared for publication his lectures on 'The Growth of Intellectual Faculty,' delivered for the Teachers' Training Syndicate in Cambridge during the Lent Term in 1888 and 1889. The author insists on the necessity of observing physical facts, their causes and effects, when considering mental and moral questions, and has worked out a system of observing pupils in school. Special attention is given to such states as "attention, nervousness, sleep, fidgetiness, disobedience, lying, headache, low development, &c." Observations made in schools are largely referred to, and the notes of many cases are given. The book, which is illustrated with diagrams, will be issued shortly by the Cambridge University Press.

THE death is announced of Mr. H. Davies, the veteran editor of the Cheltenham Looker-On, which he started some fifty-seven years ago; and also those of Sir Edward Baines, whose name has been so long known in connexion with the Leeds Mercury, and of M. Charton, the founder of the Magasin Pittoresque.

GERMAN papers report that Tolstoi's work 'The Kreutzer Sonata,' which has been forbidden in Russia, will shortly appear at Berlin in the original language, as well as in German, English, and French translations.

THE late Count Andrassy is said to have left ready for the press a collection of his speeches. The expectation of finding his memoirs among his papers has not been fulfilled.

SIGNOR SAKKELION is about to publish in Athens his catalogue of the MSS. of the library of the celebrated monastery of Patmos, containing a list of 730 codices, and enriched with lithographic plates of facsimiles of the writing of different centuries.

SCIENCE

ATLASES AND MAPS.

THE Atlas of Commercial Geography, by J. G. Bartholomew, with Introductory Notes by Dr. H. R. Mill (Cambridge, University Press), is more especially intended to give prominence to those "physical conditions of the earth which directly affect commerce," as also to exhibit the geographical distribution of commodities. There are altogether forty-seven distinct maps, on twenty-seven plates. Many of these are physical or political maps, such as may be found in most atlases; but others—and these from the point of view of the compilers perhaps the more important—may be described as statistical diagrams illustrating the geographical distribution of commercial products and the existent commercial facilities. The atlas is not intended to supersede ordinary works of reference, but supplies in a comprehensive and, upon the whole, trustworthy manner a vast mass of information, which is certain to prove acceptable to all students of commercial geography.

The Library Reference Atlas of the World, by John Bartholomew (Macmillan & Co.), consists of eighty-four maps, accompanied by a very full index, and may fairly be described as one of the most complete and trustworthy works of the kind available at a moderate price. Many, perhaps most, of the maps have been published before, but all have been carefully corrected to date. Among the new maps we would more especially draw attention to one of India in three sheets, the nomenclature of which has been brought into harmony with the spelling adopted in Dr. Hunter's 'Gazetteer.'

The Century Atlas and Gazetteer of the World, edited by J. G. Bartholomew (Walker & Co.), is a useful collection of maps, well printed, handsomely bound, and sold at a surprisingly small price.

The most remarkable feature of Stanford's Map of the British Possessions in West Africa (Stanford) is the extension given to "British Colonies and Protectorates" and to regions "under British influence." The latter stretch right from the Gold Coast to Agades in the Sahara, and include nearly the whole of the powerful empire of Sokoto and a part of Bornu. The French, on the other hand, are credited with "influencing" a far less extensive region than they actually claim, and apparently with some justice. Whydah, by-the-by, is no longer claimed by the Portuguese.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL NOTES.

The principal paper in the fifth part of the second volume of the Internationales Archiv für Ethnographie is by Herr F. Grabowsky on the death and burial customs, the tiwah or burial feast, and the ideas about the next world of the Dayaks of Borneo (in German). The body is placed in a temporary coffin or raung, raised from the earth on a small scaffold covered with a sloping roof. A remarkable painted tablet in the Museum at Berlin, representing two gorgeously decorated ships in full sail, throws light upon their religious beliefs. The family vault or structure in which the temporary coffins are fixed is called "sandong raung"; that in which the bones are preserved after cremation, the "sandong tulang." These are decorated with wooden figures of the deceased, and representations of birds and other animals. Where he has distinguished himself in the national sport of head-hunting, skulls also adorn the corners of the sandong, or are raised on poles around it. A stand of weapons and a flag form part of the decorations.

Mr. F. S. A. de Clercq furnishes an interesting account (in Dutch) of the "dodadi ma-taoe en goma ma-taoe," or abodes for souls, built by the natives of the district of Tobelo, in North Halmahera. The custom of praying to the souls of ancestors is falling into disuse with the suppression of piracy and decapitating expeditions, but is still frequently practised in the district in question, where a small, highly ornamented house is set apart for the reception of souls. Food is placed there for them, and propitiatory offerings of tobacco made when they are invoked. Those who die a natural death are excluded from these honours, and therefore women rarely share in them. These people believe also in a great spirit dwelling in unknown space, and in good and evil spirits of various kinds.

Prof. H. H. Giglioli contributes an account (in English) of a singular obsidian scraper used at present by some of the Galla tribes in Southern Shoa; and Dr. E. Modigliani a paper (in French) on the bucklers of the Nias.

The first part of the new review L'Anthropologie, to appear every alternate month under the editorship of MM. Cartailhac, Hamy, and Topinard, and to take the place of the Matériaux pour l'Histoire de l'Homme, the Revue d'Ethnographie, and the Revue d'Anthropologie, formerly conducted by them respectively, has been issued. It contains 156 pages of letterpress and ten plates, the latter illustrating a paper by M. Oscar Montelius on the bronze age in Egypt. Dr. Topinard opens the review with an elaborate essay in craniometry on the text of the skull of Charlotte Corday, exhibited by Prince Roland Bonaparte at the late Exposition. The result of a patient investigation is that the skull is that of a typical Parisian female, but the forehead somewhat low and the vault flat. Dr. Hamy contributes a short notice of the works of Alexander Brunias, an English artist, who at the close of the last century published some ethnographical plates representing natives of Dominica and other West India islands. M. Salomon Reinach furnishes an article on a remarkable tomb recently discovered in the Morea. The reviews of current anthropological publications, under the heading "Mouvement Scientifique," are numerous and careful. Particular attention is given to recent publications of the Geological Society of London. The notice of Mr. Anouctchine's work in Russian on the geographical distribution of height in the male population of Russia is especially full and valuable. An account of the proceedings at the recent International Congress of Prehistoric Anthropology and Archaeology, in which Dr. John Evans was the only English anthropologist of note who took part, is given in anticipation of the official records.

On January 24th Dr. Hamy was elected an Academician by the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres.

the Weald, and on the Genesis of the Thames,' by Prof. J. Prestwich.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Feb. 27.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—A paper by Messrs. G. E. Fox and W. H. St. John Hope was read on the desirability of the complete and systematic excavation of the site of Silchester. After a brief description of the site, and of the results of previous excavations under the direction of the late Rev. Mr. Joyce, the writers pointed out the very small portion of the hundred acres forming the area within the walls which had been excavated, and the immense additions to our knowledge of a Romano-British city, its public and private buildings, and its inhabitants, which would be gained by a thorough and systematic excavation, by sections, of the whole of the site. A scheme for doing this by subscription, under the direction of the Society of Antiquaries, had been drawn up by the writers, and submitted by General Pitt-Rivers to the owner, the Duke of Wellington, who had been pleased to express his entire approval of it. The manner in which the excavations should be carried on was fully described, and it was suggested that the most desirable thing to do first was the entire excavation of one of the squares into which the city is known to be divided by lines of streets intersecting at right angles. Owing to the destructive effects of frost and rain, it was not proposed to leave anything permanently exposed after excavation, unless of a very special character, and then it would be roofed in. The owner and the tenant having already consented to the work, there is no reason why the excavations should not be resumed this summer.—A discussion followed, in which the President, Prof. Middleton, Messrs. H. Price, Fortnum, Howarth, and others took part.—Dr. Freshfield suggested that perhaps gentlemen might be induced to defray the cost of excavating special sections or squares. The general feeling was wholly in favour of the undertaking, and it was ultimately unanimously resolved, on the proposal of Prof. Middleton, seconded by Mr. H. Price, "That a systematic and complete examination of the site of the Roman city at Silchester is desirable, and that the Council be requested to consider the steps necessary for continuing excavations upon the spot."

O. Burge; 2, 'The Construction of the Dufferin Bridge over the Ganges at Benares,' by Mr. F. T. G. Walton; and 3, 'The New Bridge of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company over the Thames at Blackfriars,' by Mr. G. E. W. Cruttwell.

Creighton, and Max Müller were elected Vice-Presidents; Messrs. H. Haines, H. Hall, and J. S. Stuart Glennie, and Dr. Zerffi were elected Members of the Council.—Seventy Fellows were elected.

ARISTOTELIAN.—March 3.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. G. F. Stout read a paper 'On Association Controversies.' He criticized at some length the theory of association by similarity and association by contiguity advocated by Bain, and also the theory of identity advocated by Steinthal, Ward, and Bradley, which he considered was to be preferred to it, though inadequate. The real parting of the ways which lead respectively in the direction of routine and of creative construction is to be found not in the distinction between associa-
